These newes did much offend the people of Carthage; who crucified their Cap-50 taine, as both a Traitour and Coward; and fent a Fleet and Armie to beliege Mef-(ana, as a Townethat rebelled, having once beene theirs. Hieron, the new-made King of Syracuse (to gratifie his people, incensed with the smart of injuries lately receiued) added his forces to the Carthaginians, with whom hee entred into a league, for exterminating the Mamertines out of Sicil. So the Mamertines on all fides were Ddddd 2 closed up within Messar: the Carthaginians lying with a Nauie at Sea, and with an Armic on the one side of the Towne, while It thereon with his Syracusians, lay before it on the other side.

In this their great danger, came Appins Claudius, the Roman Confull, with an Armiete the fireights of Sud: which paffing by night with notable audacitie, hee put himselfe into the Towne, and fending Meifingers to the Carthaginars, and to Misro, required them to depart; fignifying vnto them, that the Mamerines were now become confederate with the people of Rome, and that therefore hee was come to give them protection, cuen by force of warre, if reason would not prevaile.

This meffage was vtterly neglected; And 60 beganne the warre betweene Rome 10 and Carthage; wherein, it will then be time to shew, on which part was the justice of the quarrell, when some actions of the Romans, lately foregoing this, have beene first considered.

ò. III.

The beginning of the first Punick warre. That it was unjustly undertaken by the Romans.

Hen Pyrhus beganne his warres in Halie, the Citie of Rhegium, being the well alfected to Rome, and not only fearing to be taken by the Epirot, but much more diffuriffing the Caribagnians, as likely to feize vponit in that buffer time, fought aide from the Romans, and obtained from them a Legion, confliting of foure thoufand Souldiers, where the

But after a while, this Robard Garrifon, confidering at good lessing, the Robard Garrifon, confidering at good lessing, the Robard Garrifon, and no otherwise dissided than by a narrow Sen, which concern to from India) and rather weighing the greaterfle of the bootic, than the 30 orders from the Robard Garrifon, and the weighing the greaterfle of the bootic, than the 30 orders from the Robard Garrifon of the Robard Garrifon of the Robard Garrifon of the Robard Garrifon of the Robard Garrifon of R

When complaint was made to the Senate & people of Rome, of this outrage, they finding their honour thereby greatly fainted (for no Nation in the world made a more flater profession of justice, than they did, during all the time of their growing greatness) refolued, after a while, to take revenge upon the oftenders. And that they performed flortly after, when they had guenched the fires, kindled instain, by prime. For, now this flanding that those Romanin sheetom (as men for 40 the folkenssis of their fast, hopelesse of pardon) defended themselves with an obstitute resolution: yet in the end, the affailants forced from 13 and those which estaged the prefens furing, were brought bound to Rome, where after the viball torments by whipping inflicted, according to the ensome of the Countrie, they had their heads stricken from their shoulders; and the people of Rongium were againe restored to their former liberties and clittes.

This execution of justice being newly performed, and the fame thereof founding honourably through all quarters of Italie - mellengers came to Theme, from a readinesse to the the purishment upon the Mancrimes, that were in a readinesse to insist the kike purishment upon the Mancrimes, for the like offence, 50 An impudent request it was, which they made: who basing both guien example of that vilanie, to the Remmo Souldiers, and holpen them with joynt forces to make it good; intreat the Judges to giuethem that affishance, which they were wont to receive from their fellow the cuese.

The Romans could not fuddenly refolue, whether the way of boneflie, or of profit, were to be followed; they enemore pretended the one, but they many times walked in the other. They confidered, how contrarie the course of fuccouring the Mamertines was, to their former counfells, and actions: sleeing for the fame of ence they had lately put to torment, and to the fword, their owne Souldiers, and retored the opperfied to their libertie. Yet when they beheld the defeription of the red the oppressed to their libertie. Yet when they beheld the description of the Carthaginum Dominion, and that they were alreadic Lords of the best parts of Assistance as of the Mediterran Ilands, of a great part of Spain, and some part of Spain while that Syraes set therein seated (a Citic in beautie and riches,

10 little, at that time, inferiour to Carlbage, and farre fuperiour to Rome it feite) might become theirs; the fafetie of their owne effact faske for thele Mamerimes: who, if they (driuen to despaire by the Roman Jibould deliuer vp. Messen, with those other holds, that they had, into the hands of the Carlbagnians, then would nothing fland betweene Carlbage, and the Lordhip of all Sidil; for Systade it felte could not, for want of fuccour, my long time fublish; if once the Carlbagnians, that were Matters of the Sea, did failten you that passage from the maine Land. It was further confidered; that the oportunitie of Messen was such, as would not only debare; all fuccours out of the continent, from arrivall in Stall; but would ferue as a bridge, where who he Carlbagnians might have entrance into Italie, at their owne pleasure.

These considerations, of profit at hand, and of preuenting dangers, that threatned from a farre: did so preualle, aboue all regard of honestie, that the Manwirmss were admitted into Consideracie with the Romans, and Ap. Clandius the Considiu, presently dispatch away for Messamin into which he entred, and wnder-tooke the protection of it, as is shewed before. The besingers were little troubled with his arrivall sand less moued, with his requiring them, to dessist from their attempt. For they did farre exceede him in number of men; the whole I land was readic to relieue them in their wants; and they were strong enough at Sea, to hinder any supply from getting into the Towne. All this Appin himselse well winderstood: an against all this, he thought the sifts metall of his Roman Souldier, a sufficient remeso die. Therefore, he resoluted to issue out into the field, and to let the enemies know, that his comming was to send them away from the Towne, not to be besinged by them within it.

In executing this determination, it was very beneficiall to him, that the enemie lay encamped in fuch fort, as one quarter was not well able to relieue another in ditreffle. Hieron was now exposed to the fame danger, whereinto he had welfully cast his owne mutinous followers, not long before conly he was strong enough (or thought so) to make good his owne quarter, without helpe of others. Against him Ap. Claudius (filted forth, and (not attempting, by vnexpected fallie, to surprise memory arranged his men in order of battaile, wherewith hee presented him.

40 The Syraenian wanted not courage to fight; but furely, hee wanted good aduice: elle would be not haue hazarded all his power againft an enemie, of whom he had made no triall; when it had beene easile, and as much as was requisite, to divined his owne Campe. It may be, that he thought to get honour, wherewith to adorne the beginning of his raigne. But he was well beaten, and driven to saue him lelle within his Trenches: by which lost, he learned a point of wisedome, that shood him and his Kingdome in good stead, all the dates of his life. It was a foolish desire of reuenge, that had made the Syraensam so bussies, in helping those of Carthege, against the officerities.

Had Maffant beene trken by the Carthaginians, Syrande it felfe much thrue fought 50 helpe from Rome, againfit those friends which it now to diligently affilted. Heron had (in referce of those frow on ightic Cities) but a finall flock, which is behoused him to gouerne well: fuch another losse would have made him almost benkrupet. The tertwe he quietly brake vp his Camp, and retired home: intending to let them shand to their adurence speat that had hope to be egainers by the bargaine. The next day, Claudius perceining the Sicilian Armie gone, did with great courage, and with much alacritic of his fouldiers, give charge vpon the Carthaginians: wherin he fped fo well, that the enemie for looke both field and campe, leaving all the Countrie open to the Romans; who having spoiled all round, without relillance, intended to lay fiege vnto the great Citie of Syracufe,

These prosperous beginnings, how socuer they animated the Romans, and filled them with hopes, of attayning to greater matters, than at first they had expected. Yet did they not imprint any forme of terrour, in the Citic of Carthage, that had wel enough repaired greater losses than this; in which no more was lost, than what had beene prepared against the Mamertines alone, without any suspition of warre

Now in this place I hold it seasonable, to consider of those grounds, whereupon the Romans entred into this warre; not how profitable they were, nor how agreeable to rules of honestie (for question leffe the enterprize was much to their benefit, though as much to their fhame) but how allowable in strict termes of lawfulnesse, whereupon they built all their allegations in maintenance thereof. That the Mamertines did yeeld themselues, and all that they had, into the Romans hands (as the Campanes, distressed by the Samnites, had done) I cannot finde: neither can I finde. how the messengers of those folke, wherof one part had alreadic admitted the Carthaginians, could be enabled to make any fuch furrendrie, in the publike name of all 20 their Companie.

If therefore the Mamertines, by no lawfull furrendrie of themselves and their possessions, were become subject vnto Rome, by what better title could the Romans affilt the Mamertines, against their most ancient friends the Carthaginians, than they might have aided the Campanes, against the Samnites, without the same condition? which was (as they themselves consessed) by none at all. But let it bee supposed, that some point serving to cleare this doubt, is lost in all Histories. Doubtlesseit is, that no companie, of Pirates, Theeues, Out-lawes, Murderers, or fuch other malefactours, can by any good fuccesse of their vilanie, obtaine the prinilege of civill socicties, to make league or truce, yea, or to require faire warre : but are by all meanes, as most pernicious vermine, to be rooted out of the world. I will not take vpon me, to maintaine that opinion of some Civilians, that a Prince is not bound to hold his faith, with one of thefe; it were a Position of ill consequence : This I hold; that no one Prince, or State, can give protection to fuch as these, as long as any other is vling the fword of vengeance against them, without becomming accessarie to their ctimes. Wherefore, we may effecte this action of the Romans, To farre from being justifiable, by any pretence of Confederacie made with them; as that contrariwife, by admitting this nest of Murderers and Theeues, into their protection, they justly deserted to be warred upon themselves, by the people of Sierl; yea, although Mesfana had beene taken, and the Mamertines all flaine, creany newes of this Confede-40 racie had beene brought vnto the beliegers. The great Alexander was so farre perswaded herein; that he did put to sword all the Branchiada (a people in Sogdiane) and razed their Citie, notwithstanding that they joyfully entertained him as their Lord and King; because they were descended from a Companie of Atlesians, who to gratifie King Xerxes, had robbed a Temple, and were by him rewarded with the Towns and Countrie, which these of their posteritic enjoyed. Neuerthelesse, in course of humane justice, long and peaceable possession gives ins acquisitum, a kinde of right by prescription, vnto that which was at first obtained by wicked meanes: and doth free the descendants, from the crime of their Ancestors, whose vilanies they doe not exercife. But that the fame generation of Theeues, which by a dete-50 flable factor at purchased a rich Towne, should be acknowledged a law full companie of Citizens, there is no shew of right. For even the Conquerour, that by open warre obtaineth a Kingdome, doth not confirme his title, by those victories which gaue him first possession: but length of time is requisite, to chablish him, valesse by fome alliance with the ancient inheritors, hee can better the violence of his claime; as did our King Housiethe first, by his marriage with Maude, that was daughter of Malcolme, King of the Scats, by Margaret, the Neece of Edmund Frontide; Wherefore I conclude, that the Romans had no better ground (if they had fo good) of juflice, in this quarrell, than had the Gothes, Hunnes, Vandalls, and other Nations, of the warresthatthey made you the Roman Empire, wherein Rome her felfe, in the the wattes that on you but he was burnt to ground.

That Sicil was sometimes a Peninsula, or Demie-Isle, adjoyned to Italie, as a part of Brutium in Calabria, neare vnto Rhegium, and afterward by violence of tempest se-20 uered from the same: it is a generall opinion of all antiquitie. But at what certaine time this division happened, there is no memoriall remayning, in any ancient writer. Strabo, Plinie, and Dionyfius, affirme, that it was caused by an earthquake; Si- Plin.L.2.6.91. lius, and Cassedorus, doe thinke it to have beene done by the rage and violence of Sillis. the tide, and furges of the Sea. Either of the leopinions may be true; for fo was Fubera fenered from Baotia: Atalante and Macris, from Eubara; Sillishere in England, from the Cape of Cornewall; and Britaine it felfe (as may feeme by Verstegans arguments) from the opposite continent of Gaule. But for Sicil, they which lend their cares to fables, doe attribute the cause of it to Neptune (as Eustathius witnesseth) who with his three forked Mace, in fauour of Iocastus, the sonne of Lolus, divided it 40 from the maine land, and fo made it an Iland, which before was but a Demie-Ifle; that by that meanes, hee might the more fafely inhabite, and possesse the same. Diodorus Siculus, moued by the authoritie of Hefiodus, ascribeth the labour of fun- orion 14.6.14. dring it from Italie, to Orion: who, that he might be compared to Hercules (cutting Died 1.6 through the rocks and mountaines) first opened the Sicilian fireights, as Hercules did Onia, de Fast. 4.

They which value the Ilands of the mid-land Sea, according to their quantitie and content, doe make this the greatest, as Eustathius and Strabo, who affirme this, not only to excell the rest for bignesse, but also for goodnesse of soile. As concerning the forme of this Iland, Pomponius Mela, faith, it is like that Capitall letter of 50 the Greeks, which they call Delta, namely, that it bath the figure of a triangle; which is generally knowne to be true. That the whole Iland was confecrated to Ceres and Proferpina, all old writers with one confent affirme. To Ceresit was dedicated, because it first taught the rules of sctting and sowing of Corne to Proserpina, not so much, for that thee was from hence violently taken by Pluto, as because (which Plu-tarch and Diodorus doe report for truth) that Pluto, as soone as shee, vncouering her felfe, first shewed her selfe to be seene of him, gaue her the Dominion thereof.

Of the fertilitie and riches of this Countrie, there is a famous testimonic written by Cicero, in his fecond Oration against Verres, where he faith, that Marcus Cato did call it the Granarie, and Storehouse of the Common-wealth, and the Nurse of the vulgar fort. The same Cicero doth adde in that place; that it was not only the flore-house of the people of Rome : but also that it was accounted for a well furnished treasurie. For without any cost or charge of ours (faith he) it hath vsually cloathed, maintained, and furnished, our greatest Armies, with leather, apparrell, and corne. Strabe reporteth almost the same thing of it. What socuer Sicilie doth yeeld (laith Solinus) whether by the Sunne, and temperature of the aire, or by the industrie and labour of man, it is accounted next vnto those things that are of best estimation : were it not, that such things, as the earth first putteth forth, are extreamely ouer-growne with faffron. Diodorus Siculus faith, that in the fields, neare vnto Leontium, and in divers other places of this Iland, wheat doth grow of it felfe, without any labour, or looking to, of the husbandman. Martianus sheweth, that there were in it sixe Colonies, and fixtie Cities: there are that reckon more, whereof the names are found scatteringly in many good Authours.

Now besides many famous acts, done by the people of this Iland, as well in peace as warre; there be many other things, which have made it very renowned, as the 20 birth of Ceres; the rauilhing of Proferpina; the Giant Enceladus; the mount Etna, Scylla and Charibdis, with other antiquities, and rarities; besides those learned men, the noble Mathematician Archimedes; the famous Geometrician Euclides; the painfull

Historian Diodorus; and Empedacles the deepe Philosopher.

That Sicil was at first possessed and inhabited by Giants Lestriogones, and Cyclopes, barbarous people, and vncinill; all histories and fables doe joyntly with one consentauerre. Yet Thucydides faith, that these sauage people dwelt only in one part of the Iland. Afterward the Sicani, a people of Spaine, possessed it. That these Sicani were not bred in the Isle (although some doe so thinke,) Thueydides and Diodorses doc confrantly auouch.

Of these it was named Sicania. These Sicani were inuaded by the Siculi; who, inhabiting that part of Latium, whereon Rome was afterward built, were driven by the Pelafgi from their owne feates, and finding no place vpon the continent, which they were able to master and inhabite, passed ouer into this Iland, three hundred yeares before the Greekes fent any Colonies thither : and (faith Philiftus) eightic yeares before the fall of Troy. These Siculi gaue the name of Sicilia, to the Iland; and making warre vpon the Sicani, draue them from the East and Northerne part thereof, into the West and South. At their landing, they first built the Citie Zande, afterward called Mellena; and after that, Catana, Leontium, and Syraculeit felfe, beating from thence the Etolians, who long before had fet vpa Towne in that place. 40 As for the name of Syracufe, it was not knowne, till fuch time as Archias of Corinth (long after) wonne that part of the lland from the Siculi; Neither did the Siculi at their first arrivall dispossesse the Atolians thereof, but some hundred yeares after their descent, and after such time as they had founded the Cities before named. with Nea, Hybla, Trinacia, and divers others.

After these Siculi came another Nation out of Italie, called Morgetes; who were thence driven by the Oenstrians. These sate downe in that part of Sicil, where they afterward raised the Cities of Morgentum, and Leontium. For at this time the Siculi were divided, and by a civill warre greatly infeebled. Among these ancient stories, we finde the last voiage, and the death of Mines, King of Creet. Thueydides, 50 an Historian of viquestionable sinceritie, reports of Minos, that he made conquest of many Ilands: and some such businesse, perhaps, drew him into Sicil. But the common report is that he came thither in pursuit of Dadalus. The tale goes thus: Dadalus fleeing the reuenge of Minos, came into Sicil to Cocalus, King of the Sicani, and during his aboade there, he built a place of great strength, neare vnto Megara, for Cocalus, to lay vp his treasure in ; together with many notable works, for which he was greatly admired and honoured.

Among the rest, he cast a Ramme in gold, that was set up in the Temple of Venew Ergent; which he did with fogreat arte, as those that beheld it, thought it rather to be living, than counterfait.

Now Minos, hearing that Cocsius had entertained Dadalus, prepares to inuade the Territorie of Cocalus; but when he was arrived, Cocalus doubting his owne strength, promifeth to deliuer Dedalus. This he performes not, but in the meane while, kills 12 Mines by treason, and perswades the Cretans, Mines his followers, to inhabite a part of Sicil; the better (as it feemes) to ftrengthen himfelfe against the Siculi. Hereunto the Cretans (their King being dead) gave their confent, and builded for themselves the Citie of Minoz, after the name of their King Minos. After, they likewife built the Towne of Engyum, now called Gange: and these were the first Cities, built by the Greeks in Sicil, about two ages before the warre of Troy; for the grand-children of Minos ferued with the Greeks at the fiege thereof.

But after fuch time as the Cretans understood, that their King had by treason beene made away; they gathered together a great Armie, to inuade Cocalus: and landing neare vnto Camicus, they belieged the same five yeares, but in vainc. In the 20 end (being forced to returne, without any reuenge taken) they were wrackt on the coast of Italie; and having no meanes to repaire their ships, nor the honor they had loft, they made good the place whereon they fell, and built Hyria, or Hyrium, betweene the two famous Ports of Brundujum, and Tarentum. Of these Cretans came those Nations, afterward called Japyges, and Messapij.

After the taking of Troj, Egeftwand Elymus, brought with them certaine troups into Sicil, and feated themselves among the Sicani; where they built the Cities of Ægesta and Elyma.

It is faid, that Aneas visited these places in his passage into Italie: and that some of the Troianes, his followers, were left behinde him, in these Townes of Sicil: 20 whereof there want not good Authours, that make Inew himselfe the founder.

About the same time, the Phanicians seised vpon the Promontories of Paininus, and Lilybeam, and vpon certaine small Isles adjoyning to the maine Land: which they fortified, to secure the trades, that they had with the Sicilians; like as the Portugals have done in the East India, at Goa, Ormus, Mosambia, and other places. But the Phanicians staied not there; for after they had once affured their descents, they built the goodly Citic of Panormus, now called Palerma.

These we finde, were the Nations, that inhabited the Isle of Sicil, before the warre of Troy, and ere the Greeks in any numbers began to thraggle in those parts.

It may perchance seeme strange to the Reader, that in all ancient storie, he findes 40 one and the same beginning of Nations, after the floud; and that the first planters of all parts of the World, were faid to bee mightie and Giantlike men; and that, as Phanicia, Egypt, Lybia, and Greece, had Hercules, Orestes, Anteus, Typhon, and the like; as Denmarke had Starchaterus, remembred by Saxo Grammaticus; as Scythia, Britanie, and other Regions, had Giants for their first Inhabitants; so this Isle of Sano G. in Dice. Sicil had her Lestrigones and Cyclopes. This discourse I could also reject for fained factor? and fabulous; did not Moses make vs know, that the Zamzummins, Emins, Anakims, and og of Basan, with others, which sometime inhabited the Mountaines and Defarts of Moab, Ammon, and Mount Seir, were men of exceeding firength and ftature, and of the races of Giants : and were it not, that Tertullian, St. Augustine, Nt- force

For they all lined in the same newneste of time, which we call oldtime, and had all the same want of his instruction, which (after the Creator of all things) hat by degrees taught all Mankinde. For other teaching had they none, that were removed farre off from the stebsees, who inherited the knowledge of the first Patriarchs, than that from variable effects they beganne, by time and deforthed in the Arts of the steps who inherited the knowledge of the first Patriarchs, than that from variable effects they beganne, by time and deform of the steps when the steps were the steps when the steps were the steps when the steps were the steps when the steps were the steps when the steps were the steps when the steps were the steps when the steps were the steps when the steps were the steps when the steps were the steps were the steps when

But it is certaine, that the Age of Time hath brought forth firanger and more incredible things, than the Inflancie. For we have now greater Giants, for vice and injuffice, than the World had in those dates, for bodily firength; for cottages and house of clay and timber, we have raised Palaces of flone; we carue them, we paint them, and adorne them with gold; informach as men are rather knowne by their houses, than their houses by them; we are false from two dishes, to wooh undred, from water, to wine and drunkennesse; from the covering of our bodies with the 20 skinnes of beafts, not only to silke and gold, but to the very skinnes of men. But to conclude this digression, Time will also take revenge of the excesse, which it hath brought forth; Quan long also peptris, longioring, auxit, longssimus labrait; Long time brought forth, longer time interacledit, and attine, longer than the versely shall courtbergy it.

The plantation of the Greeks in Sicil.

When the first inhabitants had contended long enough about the Dominion of all Siell; it happened, that one Theodes, a Greeke, being driven vpon that coast by an Easterly winde; and finding true the commendations thereof, which had been thought shoulous, being delivered only by Poets; gaue information to the sitenium of this his discoverie, and proposed vnto them the benefit of this easie conquest, offering to become their guide. But Theodes was salitie regarded by the siteniums, as Columbus, in our Grand-fathers times, was by the English. Wherefore hee tooke the same course, that Columbus afterwards did. Hee ouer-laboured not himselfe in perswading the noble Atheniums (who thought themselfues to bee well enough alreadie) to their owner profit; but went to the Chelcisians, that were needie and industrious, by whom his project was gladly entertained. By these was built the Citie of Naxus, and a Colonie planted of Eukocam.

Syrande, as the reft of the Greeks were wifer than our westerne Princes of Europe: for they and no Pope, that should forbid them 5 to occupie the voide places of the World.

Some seuen yeares after the arrivall of Archias; the Chalcidians, encouraged by the fluccesses of the Cornthians, did assay the fluccesses of the Cornthians, did assay the Citie of Leontium, built The South, and possess the Siculi. The syraunfass also, in the seuentieth yeare after their plantation, did set up the being suine at Citie of Acra, in the Mountaines; and in the ninetieth yeare Casimesa, in the Planes Levins, at adjoyning; and againe, in the hundred and thirtieth yeare of their dwelling in ments conquered by they built Camerins; and Soone after that, Enns, in the very Center of the redit ruder lland. So did the Cameni, about the same time, recoure from the Siculi the Citie of the conduct of Zandel, which they had sounded in the streight between e Sicil and Italic. They Marcelland.

Not long after this, Doriam the Lacedamonian built Heraelia; which the Phonicisms, and Carthaginisms, fearing the Neighbourhood of the Spartans, foone after in-20 uaded and ruined, though the same were againe ere long re-edified.

Sclinus also was built by a Colonie of Megara: and Zande was taken by the Meffenians; who having lost their owne Countrie, gave the name thereof vnto this their new purchase. Such were the beginnings of the greatest Cities in this Iland.

Of the gouernement and affaires of Sicil, before DIONYSIVS

THe most part of the Cities in Still, were governed by the rule of the people, till such time as Phalaris beganne to vsurpe the state of Agrigentum, and to exercise all manner of tyrannic therein.

This was that Phalaris, to whom Perillus, the cunning Artificer of a deteflable Engine, gaue an hollow Bull of braffe, wherein to enclode men, and foortch them to death: praifing the deuice with this commendation; That the noise of one to mented therein, should bee like vnto the bellowing of a Bull. The Tyrant gaue a ducreward to the Inuentour; by causing the first trial to be made vpon himselfe. Her raigned one and thirtie yeares, slith Eugleius; others giue him but fixeene: How Soener it were, one Telemachus; in the end, fell vpon him with the whole multitude of Agrigentum, and stoned him to death; being thereto animated by Zene, Eccee cuen

euen whilest the Tyrant was tormenting the same Zeno, to make him confesse some matter of conspiracie.

After the death of Philaris, the Citizens recouered their libertie, and enjoyed it long, till There viurped the gouernement of the Common-weale; at which time allop Panetius made himelife Lord of Leontium; and Cleander, of Gela: but Cleander, having ruled feuen yeares, was flaine by one of the Citizens. Cleander being dead, his brother Hippearates facceeded in his roome, and greatly afflicted the people of Nanot, of Zanele or Meffens, and of Leontium; whom with divers other of the ancient Inhabitants, he forced to acknowledge him their Lord. He also made warre with the Syraussians, and, in the end, got from them, by composition, the Citic of 10 Camerins. But when he had raigned seven yeares, he was slaine in a battaile against

At this time did the Syracusians change their forme of Gonernement, from Popular to Aristonatives, a preparation towards a Principalitie, whereinto it was soon after changed. After the death of hipporatiss, Gelom (descended from the Ebodium, which together with the Cretons had long before, among other of the Greekes, seated themselves in Sicily that had commanded the forces of Hipporates, in the former warre, with notable success, became Lord of Gels. Hele, after his Malters death, breaking the trust committed wnto him by Hipporates over his children, and being in possible since the occasion and advantage of a contention in Syracuse, to between the Magistrates and the People. For comming with a strong Armie to the success of Governours, driven out by the multitude, they elected him their Prince, being the first, and sinceded the most famous, that ever governed the Syracusians. This change happed in the second years of the threefore and twelfith O-Tibers, who had also varied that of Agrigatium.

Now this Gelon, the Gonne of Dinoments, had three brethren; Hiero, Polynelus, and Thrifybulus to the first of which heegaue vp the Citic of Gela, when hee had obtaymed the Principalitie of Syrsus(2.— For, after that time, all his thoughts trausialed in the strengthning, beautifying, and amplifying of Syrsus(2.— He defaced Comerina, that a little before was fallen from the obedience of the Syrsus(hins) who built it; and brought the Citizens to Syrsus(2.— The Acquainst that had moused a warre against him, he our-came; the richer for the brought to Syrsus(2.) and the people he fold for flaues. In like manner dealt he with orher places ypon like occation. Not long after this, There, a Prince of the Agrigentines, having difpossible Teriflus, of his Citie timera; the Carthaginum were drawne into the quarrell by Anaxilus, Lord of Melfons, Father in-law to Teriflus: and Gelon also was folicited by his Father-in-law, There, Colon was content, and in fine, after divers conflicts, the Carthaginum, and other Ajrican, led by Amilear, were overthrowne between the carthaginum, and other Ajrican, led by Amilear, were overthrowne between the strength of the most of their bodies in Scill.

This Gelon it was, to whom the Athenians and Lacedemonians fent for fuccour, when Korkes with his huge Armic palt the Helefpont. Hee, for their reliefe having armed chrite thousand Souldiers, and two hundred ships, refused neuerthelesse to fend them into Greece, because they refused bim the commandement of one of their Armies, either by Sea, or by Land. So hevsed to their Embassadours only this saying, That their Spring was withered; accompting the Armie, by him prepared, to be the flower of the Greeke Nations.

The Carthoginian, after this great loffe received, leaving the invalion of their owne Countrie, fent to Galon by their Embaffadors, to defire peace who graunts it them on the fec onditions; That from thenceforth they should not facrifice their children to Saturne; That they should pay him two thousand talents of filters and present him with two armed ships, in signe of amitie. These conditions the Carthogenium, not only willingly accepted, but with the two thousand talents, and the ships for warre, they sent vnto Demanta; Galon's wife, a crowney, valued at an hundred talents of gold, with other prefents. Whereby we fee, that fome Nations, and fome Natures, are much the better for being well beaton. The warres ended; and Stid! in peace; Gelow beautified the Temples of the Gods, and erected others in honour of them. So being exceedingly beloued and honoured of his Subjects, heleft the World, and left for his Succeflour his brother fineo. Philistine and Pinne report, That, when his bodie was burnt, according to the cultome of that Age, a Dogge of his, which alwaies waited on him, ranne into the fire, and fuffered himfelie to be burnt with him.

To Gelon, Hiero his brother succeeded; a man rude, cruell, couetous, and so su-10 spicious of his brethren Polyzelus, and Thrasybulus, as hee sought by all meanes to destroy them. Notwithstanding all this; by the connersation which hee had with Simonides, he became of better condition, and greatly delighted with the studie of good Arts. Divers quarrells he had, as well with Theron of Agrigentum, as with other Cities : all which he shortly after compounded, and gaue a notable ouerthrow to the Carthaginians, whom Xerxes had incited to inuade Sicil, fearing the fuccours which Gelon had prepared, to aide the Gracians, against him. Hee also ouerthew in battaile, Thrasydeus the sonne of Theron, and thereby restored the Agrigentines, to their former libertie. But in the end hee loft the loue of the Syracustans; and after he had raigned eleuen yeares, he left the Kingdome to his brother Thrafy bulus, who 20 became a most vnjust and bloudie Tyrant. Thrasybulus enjoyed his Principalitie no longer than ten moneths. For, notwithstanding the force of mercinarie Souldiers, which he entertained for his guards, he was beaten out of Syracule by the Citizens; to whom, being belieged in Acradina, he restored the gouernement, and was banished the Hand. From thence he sailed into Greece, where he died a private man. among the Locrians.

And now had the Syracufums recoursed against heir former libertie, as all the reft of the Cities did, after which they had neuer fought, had the Succeffours of Gelon inherited his vertue, as they did the Principalitie of Syracufum. For mall changes of Eflates, the prefervation ought to answere the acquilition. Where a 30 liberall, valiant, and adulfed Prince, hath obtayned any new Signiotie, and added it to that of his owne, or exalted himself from being a private man, to the dignitie of a Prince; it behough the Succeffour to maintaine it by the fame way and arte, by which it was soften.

To conclude, Stracuse (though not without blowes, erestine could cleanse her selfe of the creatures and louers of Gelan) was now againe become Mistresse of he selfe, and held her selfe free, well neare threescore yeares, to the time of Diotysius; though shee were in the meane while greatly indangered, by a Citizen of her owne, called Tyndario.

Now, to preuent the greatnesse of any one among them, for the future, they deuised a kinde of banishment of such among them, as were suspected; taking patterne from the Athenian Ofracisme. They called this their new deuised judgement of exile, Petalismus, wherein enery one wrote vpon an Oliue leafe (as at Athers they wrote vpon shells) the name of him, whom hee would have expelled the Citie. Hee that had most suffrages against him, was banished for fine yeares. Hereby, in a short time, it came to passe, that those of judgement, and best able to gouerne the Common-weale, were by the worst able either supprest, or thrust out of the Citie. Yea, such as feared this Law, though they had not yet foldit, with-drew themselues as secretly as they could; seeking some place of more securitie, wherein to maintaine themselues. And good reason they had so to doe; 50 feeing there is nothing so terrible in any State, as a powerfull and authorized ignorance. But this Law lasted not long. For their necessitie taught them to abolish it, and restore agains the wifer fort to the Gouernement; from which, the Nobilitie having practifed to banish one another, the State became altogether Popular. But after a while, being inuaded by Ducetius, King of the Sicilians, Eccce 2 that inhabited the inner part of the Iland (who had alreadic taken Enna., and some other of the Gracian Cities, and ouerthrowne the Armie of the Agregentines) the Syraculans fent forces against him, commanded by an vnworthie Citizen of theirs, called Bolcon. This their Captaine made nothing fo much hafte to finde Ducetius, against whom he was imployed, as he did to flee from the Armie he led as foone as Ducetius prefented him battaile. So, for want of conduct, the greatest number of the Syracusians perished.

But making better choice among those, whom they had banished, they levie other troups : by whom, in conclusion, Ducetius being beaten, submitteth himfelfe, and is constrained to leave the Iland for a time. Yet it was not long ere hee returned againe, and built the Citie Collatina on the Sea-fide.

Ducetius being dead; all the Greeke Cities did in a fort acknowledge Syracufe: Trinacia excepted; which also by force of armes, in the fourescore and fift Olympiad, they brought to reason.

But they doe not long enjoy this their Superintendencie. For the Citizens of Leontium, being opprest by them, seeke aide from the Athenians, about the fixt yeare of the Peloponnesian Warre. In this fuite they prevailed by the eloquence of Gorgias their Orator; and got an hundred Athenian Gallies to succourthem, under the leading of Laches, and Charwades. To this fleet, the Leontines, and their Partners, added one hundred more; with which forces, and with fome supplies brought 20 by Sophodes, Pythodorus, Eurymedon, and other Athenian Captaines, they inuaded the Territories of the Syracustans, and their Partisans; wanne and lost divers places; tooke Meffana; and, in the feuenth yeare of the Peloponnefian Warre, loft it againe. They also, at the same time, attempted Himera, but in vaine. The fire of this quarrell tooke hold vpon many Cities, which inuaded each others Territorie with great violence. But when they had wearied themselves on all bands, and yet could fee none iffue of the warre; the Leontines, without the aduise of the Athenians, came to an accord with the Syraculians, and were admitted into their focietie, with equall freedome. So the Athenians, who hoped to have greatned themselves in Sicil, by the division and civill warre, were disappointed of their expectation, by 20 the good agreement of the Sicilians, and faine to bee gone with the broken remainder of their fleet. This they knew not how to amend; but (according to the cufrome of popular Estates) by taking reuenge vpon their owne Commanders. So they banished Pythodorus, and Sophoeles, and laied an heavie fine vpon Enrymedon. Shortly after this, followed the most memorable Warre, that ever was made by the Greekes in Sicil: which was that of the Athenians, against the Selinuntines, and Syracufians, in fauour of the Cities of Egesta, Leontium, and Catana. They of Selinus had opprest the Egestans; and they of Syracuse, the Leontines, and the Catanians: which was the ground of the warre. For, the Athenians undertooke the protection of their old friends: And, in hatred of the Athenians, aide from Lacedamon was fent 40 to the Syracustans. The Lacedamonians dealt plainely, having none other end, than that which they pretended, namely, to helpe a people of their owne Tribe, that craued their fuccour, being in diffresse. The Athenians scarce knew what to pretend: for their preparations were fo great, as discouered their intent to bee none other, than the conquest of the whole Iland. Yet they which had called them in, were so blinded with their owne passions, that they would not beleeve their owne cies; which prefented vnto them a Fleet, and Armie, farre greater, than the terrible report of fame had made it.

In this Expedition, the Citie of Athens had ingaged all her power; as regarding, not only the greatnesse of the enterprise, but the necessitie of finishing it in a short so space of time. For the Lacedamonians (as hath alreadie beene shewed in due place) flood at that time in such broken terms of peace with Athens, as differed nor much from open warre. Wherefore it was thought necessarie, either to spareno cost in this great expedition, or altogether to forbear it; which was likely to be hindred by wars at home, if their proceedings were flack abroad. And furely, had not the defire of the Athenians beene ouer-paffionate, the arguments of Nicias had caused them to abstaine from so chargeable a businesse, and to reserve their forces for a more needfull vie. But yong confailes preuailed, against the authoritie of ancient men, that were more regardfull of fafetic than of honour.

CHAP. 1. S.4. † . 3. of the Historie of the World.

Of this bulinesse, mention hath beene alreadic made, in that which wee haue written of the Peloponnessan warre. But what was there deliuered in generall termes, as not concerning the affaires of Greece, otherwise than by consequence; doth in this place require a more perfect relation, as a matter, wherein the whole State of Sicil

10 was like to have felt a great conversion.

Though Alcibiades had prevailed against Nicias, in exhorting the people to this great voiage; yet Nicias, together with Alcibiades, and Lamachus, was appointed to be one of the chiefe Commanders therein.

These had commission and direction, as well to succour the Segestans, and to reestablish the Leantines, cast out of their places by the Syracusians; as also, by force of armes, to subject the Syracustans, and all their adherents, in Sicil, and compell them by tribute, to acknowledge the Athenians for their supreme Lords. To effect which, the fore-named Captaines were fent off, with an hundred and thirtie Gallies, and five thousand one hundred Souldiers, besides the thirtie ships of burden, which 20 transported their victualls, engines, and other munitions for the warre : and these

thousand Megarians light armed, with thirtie horse-men.

With these troups and fleets they arrive at Rhegium, where the Rhegians refuse to give them entrie; but fell them victualls for their monie. From thence they fent to the Ezestans, to know what treasure they would contribute towards the warre, seeing, for their fakes, they had entred thereinto. But they found by their answeres, that these Egestans were poore, and that they had abused the Athenian Embassadors with falle shewes of gold, having in all but thirtic talents. The Athenians surther were discouraged, when they found that the Rhegians, their ancient friends, and 20 allied vnto the Leontines, refused to trust them within their walls. Hereupon Nicias aduiseth to depart towards the Selinuntines, and to force them, or perswade them, to an agreement with the Egestans; as likewise to see what disbursements the Egeflans could make; and foto returne againe into Greece, and not to wast Athens in a needlesse warre. Alcibiades, on the other side, would sollicite the Cities of Sicil to confederacie, against the Syracusans and Selinantines, whereby to force them vnto restitution of all that they had taken from the Leontines. Lamachus, hee perswades them to affaile Syracuse it selfe, before it were prepared against them. But in the end (being excluded out of divers Cities) they furprize Catana: and there they take new counfaile, how to proceede. Thence they imploied Nicias to those of Egefta, who 40 received from them thirtie talents towards his charges; and one hundred & twentie talents more there were of the spoiles they had gotten in the Iland. Thus, the Sommer being spent in idle consultations, and vaine attempts, the Athenians prepare to affaile Syracufe. But Alcibiades having beene accused at home, in his absence, was sent for back by the Athenians, to make his answere : and the Armie was left to the conduct of Nicias and Lamachus. These Commanders obtaine a landing place, very neare vnto Syracuse, by this deuise.

They imploy to Syracufe an inhabitant of Catana, whom they trust; and instruct him, to promise vnto the Syracusians, that hee would deliver into their hands all the Athenians, within Catana. Hereupon the Syracusians draw thitherward with their 50 best forces. But in the meane while, the Athenians, setting faile from Catana, arrive at Syracufe, where they land at faire ease, and fortifie themselucs against the Towne. Shortly after this, they fight, and the Syracufans had the loffe: but the Athenians. wanting horse, could not pursue their victoric to any great effect. They then retire themselues, with a resolution to refresh their Armie at Cstana, for the winter-leason. Eccee 2

From thence they made an attempt vpon Meffana, hoping to have taken it by an intelligence, but in vaine. For Alcibiades had discovered such as were Traitors within the Citieto the Meffenians. This he now did, in despish of his owne Citizens the Athenians; because they had recalled him from his command, with a purpose either to have put him to death, or to have banished him: whereof being assured by his friends, he tooke his way towards the Lucedemonians, and to them hee gaue mischienous counsaile against his Countrie. While this Winter yet lasted, the Syracasians send Embassadours to Lucedemon, and Corinth, for aide: as likewise the Athenian Captaines in Stil, send to Athens, for supplies. Which both the one and the other Obesained.

In the Spring following (which was the beginning of the eighteenth yeare of the Peloponne an warre) the Athenian in Sical, faile from the Port of Catana, to Megan, for faken of the Inhabitants; from whence for raging the Countrie, they obtaine some similar victories ouer the straight grandfans; and at their returne to Catana, they receive a supply of two bundred men at armes, but without horse, which they hoped to sumiss in the land, from the Segeslans, and other their adherents; they were also strengthned with a companie of Archers, and with three hundred relatins in monie

Hereupon they take courage, and incampe neare Spracuse, vpon the barks of the great Port, repelling the Spracuses, that fallied to impeach their intrenchments. 20 They also received from their Confederates foure hundred horle-men, with two hundred other horse, to mount their men a tarmes. Spracuse was now in effect blockt vp, so as hardly any succours could enter, but such as were able to force their passage: yet the Athenians receive diverslosses, mong which it was not the least, that Lamachus, one of their best Commanders, was flaine.

In the meane while, Gylippus, and Python, with the Lacedemonian, and Corinthian forces arrive, and take land at Himera. The Citizens of Himera, and of Gela, together with the Selmantine, toyone with them, to that with thefeand his owne troups, Gylippus aduentured to march ouer-land towards Synaul... The Synaulians fend a part of their forces to meet him, and conduct him. The Athenians prepare to encounter then, expecting his arrivall neare wint the Citic, you a place of advantage. At the first encounter, they had the better of their enemies, by reason that the Synaulian horse-men could not come to fight in those streights but soone after, Gylippus charging them againe, brake them, and constrained Nicius to fortishe himselfe within his Campe. Whereupon Nicius made the state of his assarcis to horself which is competited to the Athenians; shewing, that, without great supplies by Sea and Land, the enterprise would be led by together with the small Armic remaining. The selections are received, the Athenians appoint two other Generalls, Surywedon, and Demossheres, to joyne with Nicias: the one they dispatch prefently with some supply; the other they send after him in the Sprine following.

they send after him in the Spring following.

In the meane while, Gilppus at Syrsause, fights with the Atherium, both by Sea and Land, sometimes with ill, and at other times with good successes, but in conclution, he tooke from them their Fort, neare with Syrsause, at the Promountie, called Plymmyrium; wherein the Atherium lost their treasure, and a great part of all their providions. Notwithstanding which loss, and that the Atherium is themselves, in since, were (in effect) belieged within Atheru, by the Lucedemoniums, yet were they most obthinate in prosecuting the warre in Sicil, and dispatched away Demossiblenes with new faccours. Demossiblenes, in his way towards Sicil, encountred with Polymhes the Continuism, with his fleet: both the Captaines being bound for Sicil, the one to succour Action; the other, Gystopus. The losse between them was in effected to succour Sicil, and neither so broken, but that each of them prosecuted the enterprise they had in hand. But before the succours arrived to either Gystopus and Ariston had alfailed the Atherium in the great Port of Syrause, and in a Sea fight put them to the worst, to the great discouragement of the Atherium. On the neck of this, Demossible.

ness arrived with three-score and thirteene Gallies, charged with foot-men; and (blaming the slouth of Nielss) he inuaded the Syssansiss, the same day that he arrived. But he made more haste, than he had good speeds, being shamefully beaten, and repulsed with great losse. Hereupon Demossibeness and Earsymedon, determine to rise up from before Syssansis, and returne to the succour of Athers: but Nielss disputed to the contraire, pretending that hee had good intelligence within Syssansis, whereby he learned, that the Towne could not long hold out.

What General that the What County of the Cou

20 piss, to the Syraesslans; When any people doe finde themselues vanquished in that manner of sight, and with thas evapons, in which they per wade themselues that they exceede all others, they not only loofe their reputation, but their courage. The Althonium, besides the Gallies sunck and wrackt, had seucenteene taken, and possest by the enemie and with great labour and losse they defended the reft from being fired, having drawne them within a Palisado, in one corner of the Port, vnaduisedly: for its as contraire to a Sce-warre, to thrust ships into a streight roome and corner, asit is to scatter foot in a plaine field against horse; the one substituting, by being at large; the other, by close imbattailing. The Syracufians, having now weakned the Athenian fleet, resolue to imprison 30 them within the Port. And to that purpose they range all their Gallies in the mouth of the Hauen, being about a mile ouer, and there they came to Anchor; filling the Out-let with all manner of Veffels, which they man most strongly, because the Athenians, being now made desperate, should not with double ranks of Gallies breakethrough the Syracusian fleet; which lay but single, because they were forst to range themselues ouer all the Out-let of the Port. They therefore, not only mored themselues strongly by their Anchors, but chained the sides of their Cal-lies together, and laied behinde them againe certaine ships, which served in the former warre for victuallers: to the end, that if any of their Gallies were funke; or the chaine, which joyned them to their fellowes, broken, the Athenians might yet finde 40 themselues, a second time, intangled and arrested. To disorder also those sthenian Gallies, which came on in forme of a wedge, to breake through, and force a passage, the Syracusans had left within these Gallies and Ships, inchained together, a certaine number of loofe ones, to stop their course and furic. For where the way of any vesfell, vling oare or failes, is broken, and their speede fore-slowed, they cannot force with any weight and violence, the relistance oppoling.

On the other fide, the Albenians knew that they were verely lost, except with an inuincible resolution, they could make their way, and brake down ethis great bridge of boats; or (at least) force a passage through them in some part or other; which they resolute to hazard, with all their shipping (to the number of one hundrough ethics). But the Gallies, which were within the bridge of boats, did so disorder the Arbenian sleet, ere they came to force the bridge, as albeit some few of them had broken through the chaines, yet being stopt by the ships without, and assaged other loss of Gallies of the Syransjans, which were purposely lest at large in the Sea, they were either taken or funke. Three great disaduantages the Athenians had : the first, that fighting within a Hauen, and (as it were) in a streight, they had no roome to turne themselves, nor to free themselves one from another, being intangled; the fecond, that having ouer-peftered their Gallies with Souldiers, who yfed offenfine armes of darts and flings, they had not place youn the decks to firetch their armes: the third was, the discomfortable end for which they fought, namely, to force a paffage, by which they might faue themselves by running away. To be short, the fight was no leffe terrible than the confusion; the slaughter great on all sides; and the noise, and the cries, so lowd and lamentable, as that no direction could be heard. But in the end, the Athenians, as many as furnined, were beaten back to the Land, 10 with loffe of threefcore of their Gallies, broken, funke, or abandoned. The Syracu-Jians did also loose twentie of theirs, with Python, Commander of the Covinthians. The rest of the Athenian Gallies, running themselves into the bottome of the Port, faued themselues by the helpe and countenance of the Land-armie, there fortified. In this desperate estate, the Athenian Commanders goe to counsell. Demosthenes perswades them, to furnish with fresh Souldiers those few Gallies which remained; and while the Syracusians were triumphing, and made secure by their present victorie, to fet vpon them, and forcing their way out of the Port, to returne to Athens. This was no ill counfaile. For, as we have heard of many great Captaines (yea, the greatest number of all that have beene victorious) that have neglected the speedie 20 profecution of a beaten enemie; so might we produce many examples of those, who, having flept fecurely in the bosome of good successe, have beene suddenly awaked, by the re-allied Companies of a broken Armie, and haue therby loft againe all the honour, and advantage, formerly gotten. But Nicias opposeth the advice of Demostheres: Others say, that the Sea-men were against it. Whereupon abandoning their Gallies, they all resolue to march over land to the Cities of their Confederates, till some more fauourable fortune should call them thence. On the other side, Gylippus, and other the Lacedamonian and Corinthian Captaines, with Hermocrates, exhort the Syracustans to put themselves presently into the field, and to stop all the paffages, leading to those Cities of their enemies, to which the Athenisas 20 might make retrait. But many were wearie, and many were wounded, and many of them thought that they had done enough for the present. Which humour in fome of our Commanders at Cadez, loft vs both the Indian fleet, and the spoiles of many other Neighbour-places. Hermocrates, the Syracufian, finding it a loft labour. to perswade his Countrimen to any hastie prosecution, deuised this good stratagem, thereby to gaine time; not doubting, but that after a day or two, hee should draw them willingly out. He fent two or three horse-men out of Syracuse by night, willing them to finde Wicias, and (after they had affured him, that they were of the Athenians faction) to give him advice not to march away over-haltily from the place, wherein he was fortified; alleaging that the Syraenfians had lodged their Ar- 40 mie, which could not long flay there, vpon the paffages and places of aduantage, leading towards the Cities of their Allies. These tidings Niesas casily beleeved, and put off his journie to the third day. For men, newly beaten, are (for the most part) more fearefull than wife; and to them, enery thiftle in the field, appeares, by night,

The third day (leaving all their Gallies, and all their baggage) they remove; being pierced and purfited with the lamentable out cries of those that were sick and hurt : whom they abandon to the cure of their enemies swords. The rest marchaway, to the number of fortie thousand; and make their first passage by force, ouer the River of Anapus, notwithstanding the opposition of their enemies. But being 50 euery day charged in their marches, and by the Syracusian horse-men, beaten in from forraging, and provision of foode, they grow weake and heartleffe. The Syracustans also possesse the Mountaine Lepas, by which they were to passe towards Comeri-31, and thereby force them to fall back againe towards the Sea-coast, and to take what way they could: being vnable to proceede in their journie intended. Many hard shifts they made, in difficult passages, and blinde marches by night; which they were faine to endure, as having none other meanes to escape from the enemie that purfued them, and held them waking with continuall skirmishing. To keepe all in order, Nicias vnder-tooke the leading of the Vantgard; and Demosthenes conducted the Reare. At the River Erineus, Nicias takes the start of a whole nights march, leaving Demostheres to make the retrait: who being incompassed, and ouerprest with numbers, in the end renders himselfe. The conditions he obtained, were farre better than he could have hoped for; and the faith of his enemies farre worfe

12 than he suspected. For he was afterward, with Nicias, murdered in prison. The Armie of Demolthenes being diffolued, they purfue Nicias with the greater courage: who being vtterly broken, vpon the passage of the Riner Asimarus, rendred himselfe to Gylippus, vpon honest conditions. Gylippus sought to preserue him, and to haue had the honour, to haue brought these two to Sparta; Nicias, as a noble enemie to the Lacedamonians, and who, at the ouerthrow, which they received at P, lus by the Athenians, had faued the lives of the vanquished; Demosthenes, as one that had done to Lacedamon the greatest hurt. Hermocrates also, the Commander of the Syracusan Armie, diffwaded the rest, by all the arte be had, from vsing any barbarous violence, after so noble a victorie. But the cruell, and the cowardly sort, (co-20 wardife and crueltie, being inseparable passions) prevailed, and caused these braue

Captaines to be miserably murdered; one part of their Souldiers to bee sterued in lothsome prisons; and the rest, sold for slaues. This, was the successe of the Siesian warre: which tooke end at the river Afinarus, the foure and twentieth day of May, in the fourescore and eleventh Olympiad.

The Athenians being beaten out of Sicil; the Egeflans (for whose defence, against the Selinantines, this late warre had beene taken in hand) fearing the victorious Syracusians, sought helpe from the Carthaginians; to whom they offered themselues, and their Citie, as their Vassalls. The Carthaginians, though ambitious enough of enlarging their Dominion in Sicil, yet considering the prosperitie of the Syracusians, 30 and their late victories ouer the Athenians, they staied a while to dispute of the matter, whether they should refuse, or accept, the offer made vnto them: for the Selinuntines were streightly allied to the Syracusians, as may appeare by what is past. In the end, the Senators of Carthage resolue vpon the enterprise; and (by a trick of their Punick wit) to separate the Syracusians from the Selinuntines, they send Embaffadours to Syracufo: praying that Citie, as in the behalfe of the Egestans, to compell the Selimantines to take reason, and to rest content with so much of the lands in question, as they of Syracuse should thinke meet to allow them. The Syracusians approved the motion; for it tended to their owne honour. But the Selinuntines would make no fuch appointment: rather they tooke it ill, that the Syracufians, 40 with whom they had run one course of fortune, in the Athenian war, should offer to trouble them, by interpoling as Arbitrators, in a busines, that themselues could end by force. This was right as the Carthaginians would haue it. For now could they of Selinus with an ill grace crave aide of Syracufe; and the Syracusas as ill grant it vnto those, that had refused to stand to the Arbitrement, which the Carthaginians would haue put into their hands. Hereupon, an Armie of three hundred thousand men is let out from Carthage, vnder the conduct of Hannibal, Nephew to that Amilcar, who (as you have heard before) was overthrowne with the great Carthaginian Armie at Himera by Gelon. Hannibal was exceeding greedie of this imploiment, that he might take reuenge, as well of his Vncles, as of his Fathers death; the one of 50 them having beene flaine by the Himerans; the other by those of Selinus. Both these Cities, Hannibal, in this warre, wonne by force of armes, sackt them, and burnt them; and having taken three thousand of the Himerans prisoners, he caused them to be led vnto the place, where Amilear was flaine, and buried them there.

After this followed some trouble at Syracuse, occasioned by the banishment of Hermocrates, Itermocrates, who had lately beene Generall of the Syracujan forces, against the Athemians. The malice of his enemies had so farre prevailed with the ingratefull multitude, that he was condemned to exile for his meere vertue, at such time, as he was adding the Lacedamonians, in their warre against Athens, wherein hee did great seruice. All the honester fort within Syracuje were sorie for the injurie done vnto him, and sought to have him repealed. Hermocrates himselfe, returning into Sieh, gathered an Armie of sixe thousand; with which he beganne to repaire schime, and by many noble actions laboured to winne the lowe of his Citizens. But the saction that opposed him was the stronger. Wherefore, he was aduised to seize vpon a Gate of Syracuse, with some strength of mens whereby his friends, within the Towne, might to have the better meanestor sise against the adverse partie. This hed did that present yethe multitude fell to armes, and set vpon him; in which conflict hee was slaine.

But his sonne in-law, Dionysus, shall make them with Hermocratea slive againe.

t. IIII.

of DIONY SIVS the Tyrant: and others, following him, in Syracuf.

The Syracufums had enjoyed their libertie about threefcore yeares, from the death of Thrafybulus, to the death of tiermberates: at which time Dinnyfus was raifed vp by God, to take reuenge, as well of their crueltie towards strangers, as of their ingratitude, towards their owne bett Citizens. For before the time of Dinnyfus, they had made it their passime, to reward the vertue of their wortheit Commanders with death, or differace: which custome they must now bee taught to amend.

Dionylius obtayned the Principalitie of Syracufe, by the same degrees, that many others, before him, had made themselves Masters of other Cities, and of Syracuseit selfe. For, being made Pretor, and commanding their Armies against the Carthagi- 30 mians, and other their enemies, he behaued himselfe so well, that he got a generall loue among the people, and men of warre. Then beganne he to follow the example of Pififratus, that made himfelfe Lord of Athens; obtaying a band of fixehundred men, to defend his person: vnder pretence, that his private enemies, being traiterously affected to the State of Syracuse, had laied plots how to murder him, because of his good services. He doubled the pay of the Souldiers; alleaging, that it would encourage them to fight manfully: but intending thereby to affire them to himselfe. He perswaded the Citizens, to call home, out of exile, those that had beene banished, which were the best men of Syracuse; and these were afterwards at his denotion, as obliged vnto him by so great a benefit. His first fauour, among 40 the Syracsssians, grew from his accusation of the principall men. It is the delight of base people to raigne ouer their betters : wherefore, gladly did hee helpe them to breake downe, as fetters imprisoning their libertie, the barres that held it under safe custodie. Long it was not, ere the chiefe Citizens had found whereat hee aimed. But what they faw, the people would not fee : and some that were needic, and knew not how to get Offices without his helpe, were willing to helpe him, though they knew his purposes to be such, as would make all the Citie to smart. He began early to huntafter the tyrannie; being but fine and twentic yeares of age when he obtayned it : belike, it was his desire to raigne long. His first worke, of making himselfeabsolute Lord in Syracuse, was, the possession of the Citadell; wherein was 50 much good prouision, and under it the Gallies were mored. This hecobtained by allowance of the people; and bauing obtained this, he cared for no more, but declared himselfe without all shame or feare: The Armie; the chiefe Citizens, restored by him from banishment; all the needic fort within Syracuse, that could not thriue by honeft courses; and some neighbour-townes, bound vnto him, either for his helpe in warre, or for his establishing the faction, raigning at that present; were wholly affected to his assistance. Hauing therefore gotten the citaded into his hands, he needed no more, saue to assure what hee had alreadie. Hee strengthned himselfe by diuers marriages; taking sint to wife the daughter of Hermoerates; and after het, two at once; the once A poring, Dorie, by whom he had Dimps shis Successor; the other, Aristomache, the daughter of Hipparinus, and silter to Dimps, honourable men in Strates, which have voto him many children, that serued to sortise him with new alliances.

12 Yetiv was not long, ere fome of the Syracufians (enuying his prosperitie) incited the multitude, and tooke armes against him, euen in the noueltie of his Rule. But their enterprise was more passionately, than wisely gouerned. He had shamefully been beaten by the Carthagains at Gola: which, as it vexed the Steilan men at armes, making them suspects that it was hi: purpose to let the Carthagains wasleall, that hee might afterwards take possession of the desolate places; so it in shamed them with a delire to free themselies from his tyrannie. They departed therefore from him, and marched hastily to Syracuse, where they sound friends to help ethem: there they forced his Palace, ransacked his treasures, and so shamefully abused his wise, that for the griefe thereof sheep possessioned her selfe. But he followed their heeles a pace; and siring a Gate of the Citie by night, entred soone enough to take reuenge, by making a speedie riddance of them. For he spead onne of his knowne, no, not of his suspected enemies. After that, he grew so doubtfull of his life, as he neuer durst into his chamber, vnftript and fearched. He was the greatest R obber of the people, that euer raigned in any State; and withall, the most vnrespectively cruell.

After this, he separated with fortification that part of the Citic, called the *liand*, from the rest s like as the *spaniard* did the *citaded of *snrverpe*: therein he lodged trust Barber to trim him, nor any person, no, not so much as his brother, to enter

his treasures, and his Guards. He then beganne to make warre vpon the free Cities of Sicil: but while hee lay 20 before Herbesse, an in-land Towne, the Syracusians rebelled against him; so, as with great difficultie hee recourred his Citadell: from whence, having allured the old Souldiers of the Campanians, who forced their passage through the Citie, with one thousand and two hundred horse, hee againe recoursed the masterie ouer the Syraсиsians. And when a multitude of them were bussed in gathering in their Haruest. he disarmed all the Townes-men remayning: and new strengthned the Fort of the Iland, with a double wall. He inclosed that part also, called Epipoles; which, with threefcore thousand labourers, hee finished in three weekes; being two leagues in compasse. He then built two hundred new Gallies, and repaired one hundred and ten of the old; forged one hundred and fortie thousand Targets, with as many 40 fwords, and head-peeces, with fourteene thousand corflets, and all other sutable armes. Which done, he fent word to the Carthaginians, (greatly enfeebled by the plague) That except they would abandon the Greeke Townes, which they held in Sieil, he would make warre vpon them : and, not flaying for answere, hee tooke the spoile of all the Phanician Ships, and merchandize, within his Ports; as King Philip the second, did of our English, before the warre in our late Queenes time. He then goes to the field with four crore thou fand foot and three thou fand horse, and sends his brother Leptines to sea, with two hundred Gallies, and fine hundred ships of burden. Most of the Townes which held for Carthage yeelded vnto him; fauing Panormus, Segesta or Egesta, Ancyra, Motya, and Entella. Of these, he first wonne Motya 50 by affault, and put all therein to the fword; but before Egeff a hee loft a great part of his Armie, by a fallie of the Citizens. In the meane while Himileo arrives; but, cre he tooke land, he lost in a fight at Sea, with Leptines, fiftic ships of warre, and fine thousand Souldiers, besides many ships of burden. This notwithstanding, hee recouered againe Motyavpon his first descent. From thence marching towards Mef-

Jena, he tooke Lypara, and (loone after) Mellena, and raled it to the ground. Now beganne Dionylius greatly to doubt his citate. Hee therefore fortified all the places hee could, in the Territorie of the Leantines, by which hee supposed that Himileo would paffe toward Syracufe, and he himfelfe tooke the field againe, with four and thirtie thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Now, hearing that Himileo had diuided his Armie into two parts, marching with the one halfe ouer land, and fending Mago with the other by Sea: he fent Leptines, his brother, to encounter Mago. But Leptines was vtterly beaten by the Carthaginians; twentie thousand of his men were flaine, and an hundred of his Gallies lott. It is very strange, and hardly credible, which yet good Authours tellvs; That one Citie should becable to fur- 10 nish fine hundred saile of ships, and two hundred Gallies: (for, so many did Syracase arme in this warre) and more strange it is, that in a battaile at Sea, without any great Artillerie, or Musket-shot, twentie thousand should be slaine in one fight. In all our fights against the Turkes, of which that at Leganto was the most notable, we heare of no fuch number loft; nor in any other fight by Sea, that euer hapned in our age, nor before vs. When Charles the fift went to beliege Algier, hee had in all his fleet, transporters and others, but two hundred and fiftie faile of ships, and threefcore and fine Gallies : for the furnishing of which fleet, he fought helpe from all the Cities and Ports of Spaine, Naples, and the reft of Italie. But in old times it was the menner to carrie into the field, vpon extremitie, as many as were needfull, 20 of all that could be are armes, giving them little wages, or other allowance: in our daies it is not fo; neither, indeede, is it often requisite. Vpon this ouerthrow, Dienyfus postes away to Syracuse, to strengthen it : Himileo followes him, and besiegeth the Towne by Land and Sea. But the Tyrant, having received aide from the Lacedamonians, under the conduct of Pharacidas, puts himselfe to Sea, to make prouision for his Citizens: who, in his absence, take twentie of the Carthaginian Gallies, and linke foure. Hereupon, finding their owne fuccesse prosperous, and that of the Tyrant exceeding ill; having also at the present weapons in their hands; they confult how to recouer their libertie. And this they had done, had not Pharacidas the Lacedemonian relifted them. It also fell out, to his exceeding advantage, that the 30 plague was fo increased, and so violent, among the Carthaginians; as it is said, that about an hundred thousand of them died thereof. Hee therefore, with the power that he could gather together, fets vpon them both by Sea and Land; and hauing flaine great numbers of them, forceth Himileo to desire peace. This peace Dionysius fold him for a great fumme of monie; on condition, that he should steale away with his Caribaginians only: which he basely accepted, betraying the rest of the Africans and Spaniards. Yet no faith was kept with him: for he was purfued, and left many of his Carthaginisms behinde him. The rest of the Africans fell under the swords of their enemies; only the Spaniards, after they had a while brauely defended themselues, were (after their submission) entertained, and served the Conquerour.

Many (nch examples of perificious dealing haue I noted in other places, and can hardly forbeare to deliner vnto memorie the like practifies, when they meete with their tratches: T but which happed vnto Manflew let Piles, was very futable to this treacherie, wherewith Diamylin purfined Himileo. I was prefent, when De Piles related the injurie done vnto him. He had rendered St. John a Angelee, to the French tein the charles the ninth, who befieged him therein. Heer endred it, youn promife made by the faith of a King, that he flould be fuffered to depart in fafetie, with all his followers. Yet in prefence of the King himielfe, of the Duke of Anion his brother Generall of his Armie, of the Queene Mother, and of diuers Dukes and Marfalls of Fizueze, he was fet you and broken in his march, fooiled of all that he had; 50 and forced to faue his life by flight, leaving the most of his Souldiers dead you the place: the Kings hand and faith, warranting him to march away with enfignes difficial, and with all his goods and providions, no whit auxiling him. I needes not therefore feeme ftrange, that an Heathen T yram flould thus break his faith, fince

Kings, profeffing Christianitie, are bold to doethe like, or command their Captaines to doe it for them.

Dionysius, after this great victorie, tooke care to re-edifie Messien. Mago, who staied in Siel, to hold up the Carthaginians therein, is againe beaten by Dionysius; who is also beaten by the Tauromenians. A new supply of four fectore thousand soulders is sent from Carthage to Mago; but they take egges for their monie, and make peace with Dionysius, leaving the Siellians in Tauromenium, to shift for themselves: whom Dionysius, after a long siege, ouer-came, and gaue their Cirie to his mercinarie Souldiers.

He then palt into Italie, obtained diuers victories there, brought the Rhegians on their knees, forced them to pay him one hundred and fourfeore thouland crownes, to furnish him with threefeore Gallies, and to put in an hundred pledges, for afflir sance of their future observance of couenants. This he did, not with any purpose to performe with othern the peace that they had so dearly bought; but that having taken from them their Gallies, he might besiege them, and ruine them viterly, with the more case. Now to the end he might not, without some colour, fallishe the faith that he had given to them; he pretended to want victuals so is, his Armie, at such time as he seemed readie to depart out of Italie, and sent to them to furnish him therewith; promising to returne them the like quantitie, at his comming home to

His refolution was, that if they refused to furnish him, hee would then make their refusall the cause of his quarrell: if they yeelded to aide him with the proportion which he desired, that then they should not be able, for want of soot to endure a siege any long time against him. For to ruine them hee had fully determined, at what price soeuer. And great reason he had to take reuenge of them, if he had done it fairely, and without breach of saith. For when, in the beginning of his raigne, he desired them to bestow a daughter of some of their Nobilitie vpon him, for a wife: they answered, That they had not any one fit for him, saue the Hang-mans daughter. Princes doe rather pardon ill deedes, than villainous words.

**Outlemader the Great forgame many sharpe swords, but neuer any sharpe tongues; no, though they told him but truly of his errours. And certainely, it belongs to those that haue warrant from God, to represend Princes; and to none essentially in publicue.

It is faid, that Henrie the fourth of France, had his heart more inflamed againft the Duke of Biron, for his oner-hold and biring taunts, that hee vfed againft him before Aminn, than for his conspiracie with the Spanird, or Saugyan: for he had pardoned ten thousand of such as had gone farther, and drawne their swords againft him. The contemptuous words that St. John Parret vsed of our late Queene Elizabeth, were his ruine; and not the counter than the statement of the Romilh Priest, produced against him. So fared it with some other, greater than hee, that thereby ranne the same, and a worse fortune, soone after.

To bee short, bee made them know new bread from old. Hee assaulted their Towne on all sides, which hee continued to doe cleuen moneths, till hee wonne it by force. He yield his victorie without mercie; specially against Phyton, who had commanded within it.

Some other warres hee made with the Carthaginians, after the taking, and rafing of this Citie, and those with variable fuceesse. For as in one encounter the flue Mage, with tenthousand Africans: so the sonne of Mage beare him, and flue 50 his brother Leptines, with sourcene thousand of his Souldiers. After which hee bought his peace of the Carthaginians, as they had formerly done of him; following therein the aduice of Prosperitie and Aduersitie, as all Kings and States doe.

Fffff

When

When he had raigned eight and thirtie yeares, he died: forme fay, in his bedde, peaceably s which is the most likely, though others report it otherwise. A cruell man hee was, and a faithlefte; a great Poet, but a foolish one. Hee entertained Plate a while, but afterward, for speaking against his tyrannie, hee gaue order to haue him slaine, or fold for a slaue. For hee could endure no man, that statered him not beyond measure. His Parasites therefore filled his cruelite, The hate. of ensil men; and his lawlesse slained of vermine, which posion all the Princes of the World; and yet they prosper better, than the worthest and valianted mendoe: And I wonder not at it; sor it is a world; and as our Saniour Christ hath told vs, 10

To this Dionyfius, his sonne of the same name succeeded; and inherited both his Kingdome, and his Vices. To winne the loue of the People, hee pardoned, and released out of prison, a great number of persons, by his Fatherlockt vp, and condemned. Withall, he remitted with his Citizens divers payments, by his Father imposed upon them. Which done, and thereby hoping, that he had saltened with himselfe the peoples affections, hee call off the Sheep skinne, and put on that of the Wolfe. For, being jealous of his owne Brethren, as men of more vertue than himselfe, hee caused them all to bee slaine; and all the Kindred that they had by their Mothers side. For Dionyshu his Father (as but beene said) at the day which Brother-in-law of his hog greatly enriched.

By Doris he had this Dienysius, who succeeded vnto him: and by Aristomache he had two Sonnes and two Daughters; of which the elder, called Sophrosyne, he gaue in marriage to his eldet Sonne, and her halfe-brother. Dienysius; the yonger, called Areta, he bestowed on his Brother Theorista: after whose death, Dien tooke her to Wife, being his Neece.

This Dion, a just, and valiant man, finding that Dionysius had abandoned all exercise of vertue, and that hee was wholly given over to sensualitie, prevailed so much with Plato, whose Disciple he had beene, as he drew him into Sicil, to instruct 30 the yong King. And having perfuaded the King to entertaynehim, he wrought fo well with him, as Dionysius beganne to change condition; to change Tyrannie, into Monarchie; and to hold the Principalitie, that he had, rather by the loue of his People, and his Nationall Lawes, than by the violence of his Guards and Garrifons. But this goodnesse of his lasted not long. For Philistus the Historian, and other his Paralites, that hated Dions seueritie, wrought him out of the Tyrants fauour; and caused him soone after to bee banished out of Sicil, to the great griefe of the whole Nation. For whereas Dion had made offer to the King, either to compound the quarrells betweene him and the Carthaginians, of whom Dionyfius flood in great feare, or (at least) if they refused it, to furnish him with fiftie Gal- 40 lies at his owne charge, during the warre against them : his enemies found meanes, by finister interpretation, to conuert his good will into matter of treason. They told Dionyfius, that all the great commendations, given of Plate, had tended to none other end, than to foften his minde, and to make him neglect his owneaffaires,by the studie of Philosophie; whilest Dion, in the meane time, having furnished fiftie Gallies, under colour of the Kings seruice, had it in his owne power, either to deliver to the Syracufians their former libertie, or to make himfelfe Lord and Soueraigne of their State.

It is likely, that the honest and liberall offer which he made, to serve the King with 6 great a preparation, at his owne charge, begot him many enemies. For 50 they that had served the King for none other end, than to raise and entich themselves, and had alreadic becrie raised and enriched, thought themselves bound to make the same offer, that Dion had made, if the King had had the grace to con-ceiue it aright. But these couetous and ignorant cowards, that had neither the knowledge, nor the daring, that Dian had, were bold to sille his Lowe and Liben distre, Pride and Presumption; and heartmed the yong King, in his oppressing, and eating vp his owne people, of whose spoiles they themselues shared no small portion. I have heard it, That when Charles the sist had the repulse at Assier in Africa, Ferdinando Cortes, one of the brauest men that euer $5 nine brought borth, offered vnto the Emperour, to continue the sliege at his owne charge. But hee had neuer good day after it. For they that enuied his victories, and his conquest of Whesier in the west sinding persuaded the Emperour, that Cortes sought to value himselfe about him; and to so have it said, That what the Emperour could not, Cortes had effected, and was therefore more worthie of the Empire, than he that had it.

When Dien was newly banished, the Tyrant was contented, at first, to fend him the reuenues of his Lands, and permit him to dispose of his moucables, at his owne pleasure: not without giuing hope, to recall him in flort time. Had hee continued in this good moode, like enough it is, that Dien would have beene well pleased to liue well, as he did, at Athens. But after some time, Dienssius made Port also of this Noble-mans goods; and thereby reged him to take another course; seuento seek the restitution of his Countrieto libertie. The vertues of Dien, especially his great liberalitie, had purchased much love in Greece. This love made him suspected and ob hated of the Tyrant: but it shood him in good seed, when hee fought to raise men, with whose helpe he might returne into sical. Yet he got not above eight hundred (for hee carried the matter closely) to follow him in this adventure. But many of them were men of qualitie, and fit to be Leaders. Neither did he doubt of finding in Syracuse, as many as should be needfull, that would readily assist him. Therefore he landed boldly in Sicil; marched to Syracuse; entred the Citie without resistance; armed the multitude; and wonne all, saue the Citadell.

Dionysius was then absent in Italies, but hee quickly had advertisement of this dangerous accident. Wherefore he returned hastily to Syraus(__: whence, after many vaine treaties of peace, and some forecable attempts to recover the Towne, 30 he was faine to depart; leaving yet the Castle to the custodie of Apollowates, his eldes to me. Yet ere he went, his Minion Philisus, comming with a strength of men to assist thin, was beaten, taken, and put to death by tornent. But Dion, forther ecoucrie of his Countries libertie, had the same reward, that all worthie men have had from popular Estates. He was disgraced, assistantled, and forced to abandon the Citie. Hee retireth himselfe to the Leontines, who receive him with great joy. Soone after his departure from Syrauss(_, new troups enter the Castle: they sallie out, assistantle, spoile, and burne a great part of the Citie. Dion is sent for, with humble request: yet, ere he could arrive, Dionssis has souldiers were retired; and the Townstmen, thinking themselves secure, shut the Gates against Dion. But the next.

40 night, they of the Caitle failic againe, with greater furie than euer; they kill Man, Woman, and Child, and fet fire in all parts of the Towne. In this their extremities Dion comes the fectond time to their fuccour; the loue of his Countrie furmounting all the injuries that he had received. He fets vpon the Garrison of the Caitle, with the one part of his Armie; and quencheth the fire, euery-where kindled, with the other part. In conclusion, after he had conquered both the fire and the fword, that had well-neare burnt to ashes, and depopulated Syncusse, he recovered the Cassile, with the munition and furniture thereof, and sent Applierates, after Dionysium his Father, into takie. But their maliec, of whom he had best deferred, and whom he had loued most, gaue an vntimely end to his dayes. For he was, soone after this 50 his victorie, murdered by Calippus; who, after he had, with ill successe, a while governed Syrausse, was slaine with the same Dagger, with which hee had murde-

Ten yeares after the death of Dion, Dionyfiu, with the affiftance of his friends in Italie, recours his efface, and returnes to Synause, driving Nyfaus thence, whom he found Governour therein. The better fort of the Citizens, fearing, more than ever, his crueltie, flee to Ietets, a Syrauffan borne, and then ruling the Leontines. Ite-testenters into confederacie with the Carthaginians, hoping by their affiliance, not only to prevaile against Dionyfius; but by the hatted of the Syrauffans towards Dionyfius, to make him also Lord of their Citie. The Syrauffans, being deferuingly affilied on all filoses, send to the Corinhians for succour. Itests also sends thicker, and dissuades the Corinhians, as well as hee can, from intermeding in the businesses. That he had entred into league with the Carthaginians, who were so strong by Sea, that it was not in the power of Carinhis to land any Armie in Stell. But the Corinhians, being by this treason of Iestes, so more in raged than dissuaded, sent Timoleon with nineteene Gallies, to deliver Syrausses and, with the helpe of the Carthaginians, driven Dionyssius into the Castle, wherein hee besieved him.

Teetes, being himfelfe a Tyrant in Leonium, rather fought how to enlarge his power, than, how to deliuer his Countrie. Therefore, hearing that Timoleon was arrived at Regiun, he fent to per fwade him, to returne his fleet; for that all things were (in effect) ehablished in Steil. The Carshaginian Gallies were also in the fame Port of Rhegium; whose Captaines adulfed Timoleon, to get him gone in peace. They had farre more Gallies there, than he had, and were like to compell him; if 20 he would not be perswaded. Timoleon, finding himselfe ouer-mastered, makes request to the Carshaginian Captaines, that they would be pleased to enter into Rhegium, and there, in an open assembly of the people, to deliuer vinto him those arguments, for his returne, which they had vied to him in private; that hee might, by publique testimonie, discharge himselfe to the Senate of Cerinth.

The Carthaginians, perswading themselves, that a victorie, obtayned by a few faire wordes, was without losse, and farre more easie, than that of many blowes and wounds, yeelded to Timoleons desire. But while the Orations were delivering, Timoleon, fauoured by the Rhegians, stole out of the presse; and having set faile, before the Gates were opened to the Carthaginians, he recoursed the Port of Tauromenium, 20 where he was joyfully received by Andromachus the Governour. From thence he marched towards Adranum, where furprifing leetes his Armie, hee flue a part thereof, and put the rest to runne. It is the nature of victorie to beget friends. The Adranit ans joyned with him; and so did Mamereus, the Tyrant of Catana. Dionyfius also sent to Timoleon, offering to surrender the Castle of Syracufe into his hands: as thinking it better to yeeld vp himselfe, and the places which he could not desend, unto the Corinthians, than either to Icetes, whom he disdained, or to the Carthaginians, whom he hated. Now Timoleon, who within fiftic daies, after his arrivall, had recovered the Castle of Syracuse, and sent Dionysius to Corinth, to live there a private man, was still inuaded by the Armies, and molested by the practises, of icetes. For 49 he besieged the Corinthians, within the Castle of Syracuse, and attempted (but in vaine) the murder of Timoleon.

The Corinthians fend vnto Timeleon a fupply of two thousand foot, and two hundred horse, which are shaid in Italie by foule weather. Itees is strengthned with threeGore thousand Africans, brought vnto him by Mago (all which hee lodgeth within Syracuse) and with an hundred and fiftie Gallies, to keepe the Port. This was the first time, that euer the Carthaganians had dominion within the walls of that Circ. With this great Armic, Leetes assaulted the Casse. Timeleon sends them victualls, and succour, in small boats, by night, from Catans. Mago and Ietes doe therefore resolve to besinge Catans; but they were no sone on their way towards so it, with part of their forces, than Leon, Captaine of the Carinthians, sallied our of the Casse, and tooke that part of Syrausse, called Areadona, which he fortissed.

In the meane while, the two thousand Cerinthians arrive: with whom, and two thousand other Souldiers, Timoleon marcheth towards Syracuse. Mago abandoneth tetes.

Iteits, being frighted out of Sieil (which he might eafily haue conquered) with an idle rumeur of treafon. This made him returne to Carthage; where the generall exclamation againft his cowardrace, did for much more affright him, that for leare of tarther punishment, he hanged him selfe. Timoleon enters the Citie, and beats downe the Caltle (which he called the neit of Tryants) to the ground. But he found the Citie, when the frangers were fled, in selfect deslote; is to as their horses did feede on the graffle, growing in the market-place. Therefore, he writes to Corinth, for people to re-inhabitet. Tenthousand are sent out of Greece; many come from Italie; others, from other parts of the Iland.

10 But a new florme articleth. Afterabal, and Amilear, Carthaginians, artive about Lilphaum, with three core and ten thouland Souldiers, transported (with all their prouisions) in a thousand ships of burden, and two hundred Gallies. Timoleon marcheth thither, and chargeth this great Armie vpon the passage of a River.

A tempeth of raine, haile, and lightning, with boifterous windes, beating vpon the faces of the Carthagnians, they are vterly broken, ten thousand flaine; fine thousand taken; with all their carriages and proussions: among which there were found a thousand corslets, gilt and grauen. After this, he gaue an ouerthrow to I- Platia visition, etcit; and, following his victoric, tooke him, with his sonne Eupelemus, and the Generall of his borfc, prisoner; whom he caussed all to be slaine: and afterwards (which was imputed to him for great crueltie) he suffered seets his wines and daughters to be put to death. But this was the reuenge of God vpon Iectes, who (after the mutder of Dion) had caussed Artet, Dions wish, and a yong child of his, with Arts Romanbe.

Dinns fifter, to be call into the Sea.

He againe preuailed againt? Mamerem, Tyrant of Catana, and wonne Catana it felic. O'Mamerem fled to Hippen, Tyrant of Moffens: but Timeleon, purfuing him, wonne the towne 3 deliutering Hippen to his Citizens, who tormented him to death.
The fame end had Mamerem, and all other, the Tyransis in Siel.

Finally, he made peace with the Carthaginians; on condition, That they should not passe the Riner of Lyeur. After this, he lived in great honour among the Syracousium, till his death; and was solemnely buried by them, in the market-place of their Citie: the day of his Funeralls, being for ever ordayned to beekept holy among them.

After fuch time, as Timoleon had delivered Strasufe, from the tyrannie of Diony-Jim, and brought peace to the whole lland; the Inhabitants enjoyed their libertic in peace, about twentie yearse. The Cities and Temples were repaired; the Trade renewed; the Merchant failed in Infectics and the Labouring man enjoyed the fruits of the earth in quiet. But, it was imposfible, that a Nation, which neither knew how to gouerne, nor how to obey; which could neither endure Kings, nor men worthie to be Kings, to gouerne them; (hould any long time fubfift.

Twentic yeares, after the death of Timoleon, there started up an Agathoules among them, a man of base birth, and of base condition; who from a Beggar, to a common Souldier; from a Souldier to Capraine; and so from degree to degree, rising to bee a Prator; hee sinally, became Lord and Soueraigne of the Syranssians. Many fortunes her anne, and under-went as many dangers, ere hee obtained the Principalitie. For he had more than once attempted it, and was therein both beaten and banisht. A passing valuant man he was, and did notable scruice, as well for those by whom he was imploied, as also for the Syraussians, and against them. For in their warres against those of Emma, and the Campinnes, he did them menorable scruice; and on the contrarte, as memorable service and on the contrarte, as memorable service.

50 recofiums. For being entertained by the people of Murgantin, and made Generall of their forces, he facks Leontium; and beliegeth Syranife io streightly, that the Citizens were driven to crave aide, even from their ancient and natural enemies, the Carthaginium. the Syracufians; binding himfelie by promife and oath, to remaine a friend and feruant to the flate of Carthage, for ever after. Amiliar entertayned the builneffe, and compounded the quarrelis betweene Agathodes, and the Syracufians. Agathodes is chosen Prator; he entertaines flue thousand Africans, and diuers old Souldiers of the Manganines, where colour of a purpose to befine Herbits. With these, and with the fallifiance of the poor and discontented Syracufians (the Citie being also duided into many factions) he affailes the Senators, kills all his enemies and opposites; divides the spoile of the rich, among the poore; and gives libertie to his Souldiers, to robbe, to raufil, and to murder, for two whole dayes and nights, without controlment: the third day, when they had blunted their barbarous apperties, and firewed the streets with ten thousand dead carkasses, besides those that had broken their necks over the walls; their furie had no further subject to Agathoeles, in an affembly of the people (being an eloquent knaue) perswaded them, that, for the violent sicknesse, by which the common-wealth was vtterly cosumed, he found no better, than the violent remedies, which he had administred; and that he affected no other thing, than the reducing of the state from an oligarchie, or the rule of a few tyrannous Magiltrates, to the ancient and indifferent Democratic, by which it had been gouerned, from the first institution, with so great glorie and prosperitie. This he did, to have the crowne clapt on his head (as it were) per-20 force. For as he knew, that he had left noneliuing, within the Citie, fit, nor able, to exercise the office of a Magistrate: so knew he right well, that all they which had assisted, in the murder and spoile of their fellow-Citizens, had no other hope of defence, than the support of a lawlesse Lord, who had beene partaker with them, in . their villanies and cruelties committed. So as this Rabble, his Oration ended, proclaimed him King : againe and againe, faluting, and adoring him, by that name, as if it had beene giuen to him by some lawfull election. Hence had our King Richard the third a peece of his patterne; but, the one was of base; the other, of Kingly parents; the one tooke libertic from a Common-weale; the other fought only to succeede in a Monarchie; the one continued his crueltie to the end; theo- 30 ther, after he had obtayned the Crowne, fought, by making of good lawes, to recouer the loue of his reople.

The life of this Tyrant, is briefly written by Iustine; more largely and particularly by Diodorus Siculus: the fumme whereof is this. The fame Amilear that had brought him into Syracuse, and that had lent him flue thousand men, to helpe in the maffacre of the Citizens, was also content to winke at many wrongs, that hee did vnto the Confederates of the Carthaginians. It was the purpose of Amilear, to settle Agathocles in his tyrannie, and to let him vexe and waste the whole Iland; because it was thereby like to come to paffe, that hee should reduce all Sieil into such termes, as would make it become an easie prey to Carthage. But, when the Cities, confe- 40 derate with the Carthaginians, sent their Embassadours, with complaint of this ill dealing, to Carthage; the Punick faith (so much taunted by the Romans, as no better than meere fallhood) fhewed it felfe very honourable, in taking order for the redresse. Embassadours were sent to comfort the Sicilians, and to put Agathoeles in minde of his couenants; Amilear was recalled home into Africk, and a new Captaine appointed to succeede in his charge, with such forces, as might compell Agethocles to reason, if otherwise he would not hearken to it. All this tended, to saue their Confederates, from fuffering fuch injuries in the future. For that which was past (since it could not be recalled) they tooke order to haue it seucrely punished. Amiliar was accused secretly, and by way of scrutinie: the suffrages being given, 50 but not calculated; and so reserved, vntill he should returne. This was not so closely handled, but that Amilear had some notice of it. In managing his businesse with Agathocles, it is likely that he had an eye to his owne profit, as well as to the publike benefit of his Countrie. For he had made such a composition with the Syracusan, as gaue him not only meanes to weaken others, but to strengthen himselfe, both in power and authoritie, euen against the Carthaginians. Such is commonly the cu-Itome of those, that hope to worke their owne ends by cunning practises; thinking to deale fubrilly, and finely, they fpinne their threads to small, that they are broken with the very winde. Amilear faw, that his Carthaginians had a purpose to deale substantially; and that therefore it would bee hard for him, to make them follow his crooked devices; which if he could not doe, it was to be expected, that their anger would breake out into fo much the greater extremitie, by how much the more they had concealed it. Therefore he followed the example, which fome of his fore-10 goers had taught him; and, for feare of fuch a death, as the Iudges might award him, he ended his owne life in what fort he thought best. This desperation of Amilear ferued to informe Agathoeles of the Carthaginians intent. He faw they would not be deluded with words, and therfore resolued to get the start of them in action. He diffembled no longer; but, in flead of spoile and robberie, made open warre vpon all their Adherents. He had made the better part of Sicil his owne, ere the Carthaginian forces arrived: which thinking to have encountred an ill-established Tyrant, found him readie, as a King, to defend his owne, and give them sharpe entertainement. They were beaten by him; and their Nauie was fo Tempest-beaten, that they could neither doe good by Land, nor Sea, but were glad to leave their

20 bulinesse vindone, and returne into Africk. The Carthaginians prepare a new fleet: which being very gallantly manned and furnished, was broken by foule weather, and the best part of it cast away, cuen whilest it was yet within kenning of their Citie. But Amilear, the sonne of Gifco, gathering together the remainders of this ship-wrack, was bold to passe ouer into Sicil, and landed not farre from Gela; where Agathocles was soone readie to examine the cause of their comming. Many skirmishes passed between them, in which (commonly) the Syracufian had the better. But his good successe begat presumption; whereby he lost a battaile, more important than all the other fights. One aduerse chance is enough to ouerthrow the state of a Tyrant, if it be not vp-held by great 20 circumspection. The warre was soone transferred to the walls of Syracuse; within which Agathoeles was closed up, and driven to make his last defence by their helpe, who may be judged to have loued him not very greatly. But the Inhabitants of Syracuse, after that great massacre of the principall men, made in the beginning of this new tyrannie, were (for the most part) fuch, as had beene either mercinarie Souldiers, infranchifed flaues, or base and needie people; helpers in establishing the present Gouernement, and Executioners of the murders, and spoile, committed in that change. If there were any other (as some there were) they were so well obferued, and (withall) fo fearfull, that they durft not flirre. But it was not enough, that they all agreed in the common defence of themselves and their Citie; Famine 40 was likely to grow upon them, and enforce them to change their resolution. In this necessitie, Agathocles aduentured vpon a strange course, which the eneut commended, as wife. He imbarqued as many as he thought meet, in those vessells that rode in the Hauen; and committing the government of the Citie to his brother Antander, willed the people to be of good courage, for that (as he told them) hee had bethought himselfe of a meane, both to raise the siege, and to repaire all other losses. A Carthaginian fleet lay in the mouth of the Hauen, both to hinder the entrance of victuallers, and to keepe the belieged from iffuing forth.

Now, at fuch time as **gathoeles* was readie to depart*, aduertifement came, that many fhips of burden, laden with corne, and other provisions, were drawing neare 50 vnto **syrsaufe*. To intercept thefe, the **Carthoginian* hoise faile, and launch forth into the deepe. They were not farregone, when they might behold **sqathoeles*, iffuing forth of the Port*, with purpose (as they thought) to give convoy vnto his victuallers. Hereupon they wheele about, and make amaine towards him, as thinking him the better bootie. He neither abode their comming, nor fled back into the

Citie, but made all speede towards Africk; and was pursued by the Carthaginians, as long as day would give them light. In the meane season, the victuallers were gotten into Syracule; which was the more plentifully relieued by their comming, for that Agathocles had unburdened the place of no small number. When the Carthaginian Admirall perceived; first, that by pursuing two sects at once, he had missed of them both; and secondly, that Agathoeles returned not againe, but was gone to feeke his fortune elsewhere; he thought it good to pursue those that were fled, and to attend so well vpon them, that they should not have leisure to doe mischiefe in

The Carthaginian Nauie (whether by chance, or by relation of such as had met with him at Sea) followed Agathocles directly towards Africk, and ouer-tooke him after fixedayes. He had (at the first) a great start of them; fo that (belike) they rowed hard; and wearied themselues, in seeking their owne missortune. For he fought with them, and beat them; and, having funke, or taken many, draue the rest to flie which way they could, laden with strange tidings of his voiage.

When Agathocles had landed his men in Africk, then did he discouer vnto them his project; letting them understand, That there was no better way to divert the Carthaginians, not only from Syracuse, but from all the Ile of Sicil, than by bringing the warre to their owne dores. For here (faid he) they have many that hate them, and that will readily take armes against them, as soone as they perceive that there 20 is an Armie on foot, which dares to looke vpon their walls. Their Townes are ill fortified; their people vntrained, and vnexperienced in dangers; the mercinarie forces, that they leuie in these parts, will rather follow vs than them, if we offer greater wages than they can give: which we may better promise and make good, by letting them have some share with vs in all the wealth of the Carthaginians, than our enemies can doe, by making some addition to their stipends. Thus he talked. as one alreadie Master of all the riches in Africk; and with many braue wordes encouraged his men fo well, that they were contented to fet fire on all their ships (referuing one or two, to vie as Messengers) to the end that no hope should remaine, faue only in victorie. In this heat of resolution, they winne by force two Cities; 30 which after they had throughly facked, they burnt to the ground; as a marke of terrour to all that should make resistance. The Carthaginians, hearing this, are amazed; thinking that Amilear is broken, and his whole Armic destroyed in Sicil. This impression so dismaies them, that when they know the truth of all, by such as had scaped in the late Sea-fight, yet still they seare, and know not what. They suspect Amilears faith, who had suffered Agathoeles to land in Africk : they suspect their principall Citizens at home of a meaning to betray Carthage, vnto the enemic; they raise a great Armie, and know not vnto whose charge they may safely com-

There were at that time two famous Captaines in the Citic, Hanno, and Bomil- 40 car; great enemies, and therefore the more vnlikely to conspire against the Common-wealth. These are made Generalls of the Armie kuied; which farre exceeded the forces of Agathocles. But it seldome happens, that diffension betweene Commanders produceth any fortunate euent. Necessitie draue Agathoeles to fight: and the courage of his men, resolued to deale with the whole multitude of the Cartheginians, made casie the victoric against the one halfe of them. For Bomilear would not firre : but fuffered Hanno to be cut in peeces.

The reputation of this victorie, brought ouer a King of the Africans, from the Carthaginian Societie, to take part with Agathocles: who pursuing his victorie, winnes many Townes, and fends word to Spracufe of his good successe. The Carthaginians 50 also fend into Sicil, willing Amilear, their Generall, to succour the state of Africk, which was in danger to be loft, whileft he was trauailing in the conquest of Sicil. Amilear fends them flue thousand men : all his forces he thought it not needfull to transport; as hoping rather to draw Agathodes back into Sicil, than to be drawne home by one, that could scarce retaine his owne Kingdome. But these good hopes had a bad iffue. He spent some time in winning a few Townes, that adhered vnto the Syraculians : and having brought his matters to fome good order, he conceived a fudden hope of taking Syracuse by surprise. It was a pretie (though tragicall) accident, if it were true, as Tullie relates it. Amilear had a dreame, which told him that he should suppe the next day within Syracuse. His fancie begot this dreame, and he believed it. He made more hafte, than good speede, toward the Citie: and comming vpon it on the sudden, had good hope to carrie it. But his enemies were prepared for him, and had laied an ambush to intrap him, whereinto he fell. So he was carried prisoner into the Citie; in which it was likely, that he had no great cheare

to his supper: for they struck off his head, and sent it into Africk (a welcome prefent) to Agathocles. This good successed things at home, did put such courage into the Sicilian Armie, that Agathoeles was bold to weare a Crowne, and stile himselfe King of Africk. He had allured ophellas, King of the Cyrenians, to take his part, by promifes to deliuer the Countrie into his hands: for that (as he faid) it was sufficient vnto himselfe to have diverted the Carthaginians from Sicil, wherein (after this warre ended) he might raigne quietly. Ophellas came with a great Armie, and was friendly entertayned. But the traiterous Sicilian, taking an advantage, did murder this his affiftant: 20 and afterwards, by good wordes, and great promifes, drew all the Cyremian Armie to follow him in his warres. Thus his villainie found good successe; and he so preuailed in Africk, that he got leifure to make a flep into Sicil. Many Townes in Sicil had imbraced a delire of recourring their libertie; thinking it high time to fight at length for their owne freedome, after that they had so long beene exposed, (as a reward of victorie) either vnto Aliens, or to Tyrants, of their owne Countrie. Thefe had prevailed farre, and gotten many to take their parts, as in a common cause: when the comming of Azathooles abated their high fpirits, and his good successe in many fights, compelled them to obedience. Out of Sicil he returned into Africk, where his affaires flood in very bad termes. Archaguthus, his fonne, had loft a bat-20 taile; and (which was worse) had ill meanes to helpe himselfe: his Armie being in mutinie for lack of pay. But Agathoeles pacified the tumult, by the accultomed promises of great bootic and spoile. It had now beene time for him, to offer peace to the Carthaginians; which to obtaine, they would (questionlesse) have given to him, both monic enough to pay his Armie, and all that they then held in Sicil: For their Citie had beene distressed, not only by this his warre, but by the treason of Bomilcar, who failed not much of making him felfe Tyrant ouer them. But ambition is blinde. Agatheeles had all his thoughts fixed vpon the conquest of Carthage it selfe: out of which dreame he was awaked, by the loffe of a battaile, not so memorable in regard of any accident therein, as of the strange enents following it. The Cartha-40 ginians, after their great misfortunes in this warre, had renewed their old facrifices of children to Saturne: from which they had abstained, euer since they made peace with Gelon. And now they made choice of some, the goodlieft of their prisoners, taken in the battaile, to offer vnto the faid Idoll, in way of thankefulneffe for their victoric. The fire, with which these vnhappie men were consumed, caught hold vpon the lodgings nearest vnto the Altar; and spreading it selfe farther through the Campe, with the destruction of many men, caused such a tumult, as is vsuall in the like cases. At the same time, the like accident of fire burnt up the Paullon of Agathocles. Hereupon both the Armies fled away; each of them belowing, that the noise in the adverse Campe, was a signe of the enemies comming to invade it. 50 But the Carthaginians had a safe retraite. Agathocles, by a second errour, fell into a new calamitie. In the beginning of this his flight in the darke, hee met with his owne African Souldiers; and thinking them to bee enemies, (as indeede the one halfe of them had revolted from him, to the carbhaginians, in the last battaile) he beganne to affaile them, and was fo flourly refished, that he lost, in this blinde fight, aboue foure thousand of his men. This did so discourage his proud heart; that being fallen from the neare hope of taking the Citie of Carthage, vnto some distrust of his owne safetie, he knew no more how to moderate his present weake feares, than lately he had knowne how to gouerne his Ambition. Therefore he tooke the way that came next into his head; which was, to steale closely abourd his ships, with his yonger sonne (the elder he suspected of Incest, and of Ambition) and so to flie into Sieil; thinking it the best course, to shift for himselfe, as wanting vessells wherein to transport his Armie. His elder sonne, Archagathus, perceiued his drift, arrested him, and put him under custodie : but by meanes of a sudden tumult, hee was let loofe, escaped, and fled alone, leaving both his sonnes behinde him. His 10 flight being noised through the Armie, all was in vprore; and extremitie of rage caused not only the common Souldier, but even such as had beene friends to the Tyrant, to lay hold vpon his two sonnes, and kill them. That this flight of Azathocles was extremely base; I neede not vse wordes to proue: That his scare was truly, as all feare is faid to be, a passion, depriuing him of the succours which reason offered, the sequele doth manifest. His forsaken Souldiers, being now a headlesse companie, and no longer an Armie to be feared, obtained neuerthelesse a reasonable composition from the Carthaginians: to whom they sold those places, whereof they had possession, for nineteene talents. Likewise, Agathodes himselse, having lost his Armie, did neuerthelesse, by the reputation of this late warre, make peace 20 with Carthage vpon equal termes.

After this, the Tyrant, being deliuered from forraine enemies, discouered his bloudie nature, in most abominable crucities, among the Sicilians. His wants, and his feares, vrged him so violently, that he was not satisfied with the spoiles of the rich. or the death of those whom he held suspected; but in a beastly rage depopulated whole Cities. He deuised new engines of torment; wherein striuing to exceede the Bull of Phalaris, he made a frame of braffe, that should serue to scortch mens bodies, and withall give him leave to behold them in their miserie. So devillish is the nature of man, when reason, that should be his guide, is become a slaue to his brutishaffections. In these mischiefes he was so outragious, that he neither spared 30 Sexe, nor Age; especially, when he was informed of the flaughter of his children in Africk. But this was not the way to preserue his estate : it threw him into new dangers. They whom he had chased out of their Countrie, tooke armes against him, and draue him into fuch feare, that he was faine to feeke the lone at Carthage, which, by ruling well, he might have had in Sicil. He freely delivered into the Carthaginians hands, all those Townes of the Phanicians in Sicil, belonging vnto them, which were in his possession. They requited him, honourably, with great store of corne, and with foure hundred talents of gold and filuer. So (though not without much trouble and hazard) he preuailed against the Rebells, and setled his estate. Hauing no further businesse left in Stell, he made a voiage into Italie. There he 40 fubdued the Brutians, rather by terrour of his name, than by any force, for they yeelded at his first comming. This done, he went to the Isle of Lipara, and made the Inhabitants buy peace with one hundred talents of gold. But when he had gotten this great summe, he would needs exact a greater; and finding plainly that they had no more left, he was bold to spoile the Temples of their Gods. Herein (me thinks) he did well enough. For how could he believe those to be Gods, that had continually given deafe eares to his horrible perjuries? Then he returned richly home, with eleuen ships loaden with gold: all which, and all the rest of his fleet, were cast away by soule weather at Sea; one Gallie excepted, in which he himselfe escaped, to suffer a more miserable end. A grieuous sicknesse fell vpon him, that rot- 50 ted his whole bodie, spreading it selfe through all his veines and sinewes. Whilest he lay in this case, all desiring his end, saue only Theogenia (a wife that he had taken out of Agypt) and her small children : his Nephew, the sonne of Archagathus, before mentioned, and a yonger sonne of his owne, beganne to contend about the Kingdome. Neither did they seeke to end the controuersie by the old Tyrants decision; they regarded him not so much. But each of them lated wait for the others life: wherein the Nephew sped so well, that he slue his Vncle, and got his Grandstates Kingdome without asking any leaue. These tidings wounded the heart of As sthode with searcand sorrow. He saw himselfe without helpe, like to become a prey to his vngracious Nephew, from whom beek new that no lauour was to be expected, either by himselfe, or by those, whom only heenow held deare, which were, Theogens, and her children. Therefore hee adusted her and them to flie before they were surprised for that otherwise they could by no meanes auoid, either death, or somewhat that would be worse. He gaue them all his treasures and goods, wherewith he cuen compelled them (weepings to leauch im deslotate in 6 wretched a casely to imbarke themselves halfily, and make speede into Egypt. After their departure, whether he threw himsels into the lire, or whether his disease consumed him, there was none less that cared to attend him; but he ended his life as balely, and on as much want, as he first begannett.

After the death of **Agathodes* it was, that the **Mamerimes* his Souldiers traiteroully occupied **Assignata*, and infefted a great part of the Iland. Then alfo did the **Carthazinians* beginne to renew their attemps of conquering all **Sicil.** What the Nephew of **Agathodes* did, I cannot finde. Likely it is that hee quickly perished.

20 Forthe **Sicilians* were driven to fend for **Pyrrhus* to helpe them, who had married with a daughter of **Agathodes*. But **Pyrrhus* was soone wearie of the Countrie (as hath beene shewed before) and therefore left it; prophecying that it would become a goodly champaine field, wherein **Rome and **Carthage* should fight for superiorite. In which businesses, how these two great Cities did speede, the order of our florie will declare.

δ. V.

A recontinuation of the Roman warrein Sicil. How HIERON, King of Syracufe, for fooke the Carthaginians; and made his peace with Rome.

Kingdome.

Hen Appiu Claudiu, following the advantage of his victoric gotten at Melfans, brought the warre vnt othe Gates of Spraufe, and befieged that great Citie; Hieron found it high time for him to fecke peace: who wing that the Carthaginian had neither any reafon to be offended with him, for helping himfelf by what meanes be could, when they were not in case to giue him affishance; and foresseeing withall, that when once hee 40 had purchased his quiet from the Romans, it would be free for him to sit still, without sear of molestation, whilest Rome and Carthage were sighting for the masterie,

In this good moode, the new Roman Consults, SM. Valerius, and C. Ostacilius, sound him, and readily embraced the offer of his friendship. Yet they made vie of their present advantage, and sold him peace for an hundred (some say two hundred) Talents.

These Confullshad brought a great Armie into Sieil; yet did they nothing else in effect, than bring ouer Hero to their side. If the Syraensem held them bussed (which I finde not, otherwise than by circumslances, as, by the summe of monie imposed vpon him, and by their performing none other peece of service) all the 50 whole time of their abode in the sland; then was his departure from the friendship of Carthage, no less to his honour, than it was to his commoditie. For by no reason could they require, that he should suffer his owne Kingdometor runneinto manifest pentl of subversion, for their fakes, that should have received all the profit of the victorie: seeing they did expose him to the whole danger, without straying themselues to give him reliefe. But the Carthaginians had lately made good proofe of the firength of Syracuse, in the daies of seathocles: and therefore knew, that it was able to beare our a very strong siege. And hereupon it is like that they were the more slack, in sending helpe: if (perhaps) it were not some part of their desire, that both Rome and Syracuse should weaken one the other, whereby their owne worke might be the easier against them both. Yet indeede, the case of the besieged Citie was not the same, when the Romans lay before it, as it had beene, when the Carthaginians attempted it. For there was great reason, to trie the vttermost hazard of warre against the Carthaginians, who sought no other thing than to bring it into flaueric: not fo against the Romans, who thought it sufficient, it they could with- 10 draw it from the partie of their enemies. Besides, it was not all one to be gouerned by Agathoeles, or by Hiero. The former of these cared not what the citizens endured, fo long as he might preserve his owne tyranie: the latter, as a justand good Prince, had no greater defire than to winne the loue of his people, by feeking their commoditie; but including his owne felicitic within the publique, laboured to vphold both, by honest and faithfull dealing. Hereby it came to passe, that he enjoyed a long and happie raigne; liuing deare to his owne Subjects, beloued of the Romans, and not greatly molested by the Carthaginians; whom, either the consideration, That they had left him to himselfe, ere he left their societie, made unwilling to seeke his ruine; or their more carnest businesse with the Romans, made vnable to compasse it. 20

How the Romans besiege and winne Agrigentum. Their beginning to maintaine a fleet. Their first losse, and first victorie by Sea. Of Seafight in generall,

I ERON, having fided himfelfe with the Romans, aided them with victuaills, and other necessaries: so that they, presuming vpon his affiliance, recall some part of their forces. The Carthaginians finde it fiftance, recall tome part or their forces. The control high time to beflire them; they fend to the Ligarian, and to the trough they had in Spaine, to come to their aide; who being arrived, der conduct of they made the Citie of Agrigentum, the feat of the warre, against the Romans, filling it with all manner of munition.

The Roman Confulls, having made

tweene the walls of the Citie and their Campe; and another on the out-fide thereof: that neither the Carthaginians might force any quarter fuddenly, by a fallie, nor those of the Countrie without, breake vpon them vnawares: which double defence kept the belieged also from the receiping any reliefe of victualls, and munitions, whilelt the Syraculian Supplies the assailants with what they want. The besieged fend for fuccour to Carthage; after they had beene in this fort pent up fine moneths. The Carthaginians imbarke an Armie, with certaine Elephants, under the command of Hanne; who arrives with it at Heraclea, to the West of Agricentum. Hanno puts himselfe into the field, and surpriseth Erbesus, a Citie wherein the Romans had bestowed all their prouision. By meanes hereof, the famine without grew to be as great, as it was within Agrigentum; and the Roman campe no leffe streightly affieged by Hanno, than the Citie was by the Romans: infomuch, as if Hieron had not supplied them, they had beene forced to abandon the siege. But seeing that this diffresse was not enough to make them rise; Hanno determined to give them battaile. To which end departing from Heraclia, he makes approch vnto the Roman campe. The Romans resolue to sustaine him, and put themselves in order. Hanno directs the Numidian horse-men to charge their Vantguard, to the end to draw them further on; which done, he commands them to returne, as broken, till they came to the body of the Armie, that lay shadowed behind some rising ground. The Numidians performe it accordingly; and while the Romans purfued the Numidians, Hanno gives vpon them, and having flaughtered many, beats the restinto their Trenches.

After this encounter, the Carthaginians made no other attempt for two moneths. but lay strongly incamped, waiting vntill some oportunitie should inuite them. But Annibal, that was belieged in Agrigentum, as well by fignes as meffengers, made Hanno know, how ill the extremitie which he indured, was able to brooke fuch dilatorie courses. Hanno thereupon, a second time, prouoked the Consulls to fight. But, his Elephants being disordered by his owne Vantguard, which was broken by the Romans, he loft the day; and with fuch as escaped, he recoursed Heraclea. Annibal perceiving this, and remayning hopeleffe of fuccour, refolued to make his owne way. Finding therefore that the Romans, after this daies victorie, wearied with labour, and secured by their good fortune, kept negligent watch in the night; he rusht out of the Towne, with all the remainder of his armie, and past by the Roman campe without reliffance. The Confulls purfue him in the morning, but in vaine: fure they were, that he could not carrie the Citie with him, which with little a-doe the Romans entred, and pittifully spoiled. The Romans, proud of this victorie, purpose henceforth rather to follow the direction of their present good fortunes, than their first determinations. They had resolved in the beginning of this Warre, only to succour the Mamertines, and to keepe the Carthaginians from their owne coasts: 40 but now they determine, to make themselves Lords of all Sicil; and from thence, being fauoured with the winde of good fuccesse, to saile ouer into Africke. It is the disease of Kings, of States, and of private men, to cover the greatest things, but not to enjoy the leaft; the defire of that which we neither have nor neede, taking from vs the true vse and fruition of what we have alreadic. This curse vpon mortall men, was neuer taken from them since the beginning of the

To profecute this Warre, Lucius Valerius, and Titus Octacilius, two new Confuls, are fent into Sicil. Whereupon, the Romans being Masters of the field, many inland Townes gaue themselues vnto them. On the contrarie, the Carthaginians 50 keeping still the Lordship on the Sea, many maritimate places became theirs. The Romans therefore, as well to secure their owne coasts, often inuaded by the African fleets as also to equal themselves in every kinde of warfare with their enemies, determine to make a fleet. And herein fortune fauoured them with this accident, that being altogether ignorant in shipwrights-craft, a storme of winde thrust one of the Carthaginian Gallies, of fine bankes, to the shore.

Now had the Romans a patterne, and by it they beganne to fet vp an hundred Quinqueremes, which were Gallies, rowed by fine on enery banke, and twentie, of three on a banke; and while these were in preparing, they exercised their men in the feat of rowing. This they did after a strange falhion. They placed vponthe Sea-fands many feates, in order of the bankes in Gallies, whereon they placed their water-men, and taught them to beat the fand with long poles, orderly, and as they were directed by the Master, that so they might learne the stroke of the Gallie, and how to mount and draw their Oares.

When their fleet was finished, some rigging and other implements excepted, 10 C. Cornelius, one of the new Confulls (for they changed enery yeare) was made Admirall: who being more in loue with this new kinde of warfare, than well aduised, past ouer to Messena with seuenteene Gallies, leaving the rest to follow him. There he staid not, but would needes row alongst the coast to Lipara, hoping to doe some peece of service. Hannibal, a Carthaginian, was at the same time Gouernour in Panormus; who being advertised of this new Sea-mans arrivall, sent forth one Boodes, a Senatour of Carthage, with twentie Gallies, to entertaine him. Boodes, falling vpon the Confull vnawares, tooke both him and the fleet he commanded. When Hannibal received this good newes, together with the Roman Gallies and their Confull; he grew no lesse foolish hardie than Cornelius had beene. For he, 20 fancying to himselfe to surprise the rest of the Roman fleet, on their owne coast, ere they were yet in all points prouided; fought them out with a fleet of fiftie faile: wherewith falling among them, he was well beaten, and, leaving the greater number of his owne behinde him, made an hard escape with the rest : for of one hundred and twentie Gallies, the Romans under Cornelius had lost but seuenteene, so as one hundred and three remained, which were not eafily beaten by fiftie.

The Romans, being advertised of Cornelius his overthrow, make haste to redeeme him, but give the charge of their fleet to his Colleague, Duilius, Duilius, considering that the Roman vessells were heavie and slow, the African Gallies hauing the speede of them, denised a certaine engine in the prow of his Gallies, where 30 by they might fasten or grapple themselues with their enemies, when they were (as we call it) boord and boord, that is, when they brought the Gallies fides together. This done, the waightier ships had gotten the aduantage, and the Africans loft it. For neither did their swiftnesse seruethem, nor their Marriners craft; the Vessells, wherein both Nations fought, being open: so that all was to be carried by the aduantage of weapon, and valour of the men. Besides this, as the heanier Gallies were likely to crush and crack the sides of the lighter and weaker, so were they, by reason of their breadth, more steadie; and those that best kept their feet, could also best vie their hands. The example may be given betweene one of the long boates of his Majesties great ships, and a London-barge.

Certainely, he that will happily performe a fight at Sea, must be skilfull in making choice of Veffells to fight in : he must believe, that there is more belonging to a good man of warre, vpon the waters, than great during; and must know, that there is a great deale of difference, betweene fighting loofe or at large, and grapling. The Gunnes of a flow ship pierce as well, and make as great holes, as those in a swift. To clap ships together, without consideration, belongs rather to a mad man, than to a man of warre : for by fuch an ignorant brauerie was Peter Stroffe loft at the Azores, when he fought against the Marquesse of Santa Cruz. In like fort had the Lord Charles Howard, Admirall of England, been loft in the yeare 1588. if he had not beene better aduised, than a great many nealignant fooles were, that 50 found fault with his demeanour. The Spaniards had an Armic aboord them; and he had none: they had more ships than he had, and of higher building and charging; so that, had he intangled himselfe with those great and powerfull Vessells, he had greatly endangered this Kingdome of England. For twentie men vpon the defences, are equall to an hundred that boord and enter; whereas then, contrariwife, the Spaniards had an hundred, for twentic of ours, to defend themselves withall. But our Admirall knew his advantage, and held it: which had he not done, he had not beene worthie to have held his head. Here to speake in generall of Seafight (for particulars are fitter for private hands, than for the Preffe) I fay, That a fleet of twentie ships, all good failers, and good ships, have the advantage, on the open Sea, of an hundred as good ships, and of slower sayling. For if the fleet of an hundred faile keepe themselves neare together, in a grosse squadron; the twentie thips, charging them vpon any angle, shall force them to give ground, and to fall back vpon their next fellowes: of which so many as intangle, are made vnseruiceable, or loft. Force them they may casily, because the twentie ships, which give themselves scope, after they have given one broad side of Artillerie, by clapping into the winde, and flaying, they may give them the other : and fo the twentie ships batter them in peeces with a perpetuall vollie; whereas those, that fight in a troupe. haue no roome to turne, and can alwaies vie but one and the fame beaten fide. If the fleet of an hundred faile give themselves any distance, then shall the leffer fleet preuaile, either against those that are a-reare and hindmost, or against those, that by aduantage of ouer-failing their fellowes keepe the winde; and if yoon a Lecthore, the thips next the winde be constrained to fall back into their owne foundron 20 then it is all to nothing, that the whole fleet must suffer shipwrack, or render it selfe. That such advantage may be taken upon a fleet of unequal speede, it hath beene well enough conceined in old time; as by that Oration of Hermocrates, in Thueydides, which he made to the Syracufians, when the Athenians invaded them, it Thueyd. L. 6. may eafily be observed. Of the Art of Warre by Sea, I had written a Treatife, for the Lord HENRIE. Prince of Wales; a fubject, to my knowledge, neuer handled by any man, ancient or moderne: but God hath spared methe labour of finishing it, by his losse; by the loffe of that braue Prince; of which, like an Eclypfe of the Sunne, wee shall finde the effects hereafter. Impossible it is to equall wordes and forrowes; I will

20 therefore leave him in the hands of God that hath him. Cura leves loguentur, in-

But it is now time to returne to the beaten Carthaginians; who by looling their advantage of swift boats, and boording the Romans, have loft fiftie faile of their Gallies: as on the other fide, their enemies, by commanding the Seas, have gotten libertie to faile about the West part of Sicil; where they raised the siege laied unto Segesta, by the Carthaginians, and wonne the Towne of Macella, with fome other places.

Diversenterfeats of warre, betweene the Romans and Carthaginians, with variable successe. The Romans prepare to inuade Africk : and obtaine a great victorie at Sea.

He victorie of Duilius, asit was honoured at Rome, with the first Nauall triumph, that was euer scene in that Citie; so gaue it vnto the Romans a great incouragement, to proceede in their warres by Sea: whereby they hoped, not only to get Sicil, but all the other Iles betweene Italie and Africk, beginning with Sardinia, whither foone after they fent a fleet for that purpose. On the contrarie side, Amilear the Carthaginian, lying in Panormus, carefully waited for all occasions, that might helpe to recompence the late misfortune : and being aduertifed, that some quarrell was growne betweene the Roman Souldiers, and their Auxiliaries, being fuch as caused them to incampe a part, hee sent forth Hanno to set you them; who taking them vnawares, buried foure thousand of them in the place. Now during the continuance of the Land-warre in Sicil, Hannibal, who had lately beene beaten by Sea, but escaped vnto Carthage, meaning to make amends for his former errour, obtayned the trusto f a new fleet, wherewith hee arrived at Sardinia: the conqueit of which Iland, the Romans had entertayned for their next enterprise. Now it so fell out, that the Romans, croffing the Seas from Sicil. arrived in the Port where Hannibal with his new fleet anchored. They fet voon him vnawares, and tooke the better part of the fleet which he conducted; himfelfe hardly escaping their danger. But it little auailed him to have escaped from the Romans. His good friends, the Carthaginians, were foill pleafed with this his fecond vnfortunate voiage, that they hanged him vp for his diligence: for (as it hath been faid of old) Non est bis in bello peccare; In warre it is too much to offend twice.

After this, it was long creany thing of importance was done by the Confulls, till give credit to * Panormus was belieged : where, when the Romans had fought in vaine to draw Antiquities, the Carthaginians into the field; being vinable to force that great Citie, because of a diligent write the strong Garrison therein bestowed: they departed thence, and tooke certaine quirems are Quadriremes, and Quinqueremes.

The Romans resolute to transport the warreinto Africk, the Carthaginians, to arhath five men rest them on the coast of siel. The numbers, with which each of them filled their to draw it the fleet, was (perhaps) the greatest that cuer fought on the waters. By Polyhim his hid foure to an estimation, there were in the Roman Gallies an hundred and fortie thousand men: Oare; and the and in those of Carthage, an hundred and fiftie thousand : reckoning one hundred Treatment and the control of the con the forme of a Wedge or Triangle; the two first squadrons making the Flancks. and than more ranks of Ozare's one ouer another; and the other Gallies (rateably) fewer. But had this been fo, they me'ft then have had fine decks, each ouer other; which bath feldome been feen in fhips of a thousand Tonnes; meither could the third, fourth, and fift rankes, have reached vnto the water with their Oares, and the third fquadron, the Bale: the point thereof ( wherein were the two Confulls as Admiralls) looking toward the enemie; and the middle space lying emitte. Their Veffells of carriage were towed by the third (quadron, After all came verthe fourth, in forme of a Crescent; very well manned, but exceeding thinne : so that the hornes of it inclosed all the third squadron, together with the corners of the first and second. The order of the Carthaginian fleet I cannot conceive by the relation; but, by the manner of the fight afterwards, I conjecture, that the front of their fleet was thinne, and firetched in a great length, much like to that which the French call Combat en haif; a long front of horse, and thinne: which forme, lince the Piltoil to preuailed ouer the Lance, they have changed. Behind this first out-firetched from: their Battalions were more folide. For Amilear, Admirall of the Carthaginians, had thus ordered them, of purpole, (his Gallies having the speede of the Romans ) that. when the first fleet of the Romans hasted to breake through the first Gallies, they should all turne taile, and the Romans pursuing them (as after a victorie) diforger themselves, and, for cagernesse of taking the Runne-awaies, leave their other three fquadrons farre behinde them. For fo mult it needes fall out, feeing that the third foundron towed their horse-boats, and victuallers; and the fourth had the Reareward of all. According to Amilears direction it focceed d. For when the Romans had charged, and broken, the thinne front of the Cartinginian first fleet, which ran 20 away, they forthwith gaue after them with all speede politible, not so much as iooking behinde them for the fecond fquadron. Hereby the Romans were drawne neare vnto the bodie of the Carthaginian fleet, led by Amilear, and by him (at the first) received great losse, till their lecond squadron came vp. which tore of Analogy to betake him to his Oares. Hanno also, who commanded the right wing of the Carthaginian fleet, inuaded the Roman Reareward, and premailed against them. But Amiliar being beaten off, Marcus Atilius fell back to their fuccour, and put the Cartheginians to their heeles; as not able to fultaine both squadrons. The Reare being relieued, the Confulls came to the aide of their third Battalion, which towed their victualiers, which was also in great danger of being beaten by the Africans: 20 but the Confulls, joyning their fquadrons to it, put the Carthaginians on that part a fo to running. This victorie tell to the Romans, partly by the hardineffe of their Souldiers; but principally, for hat Amilear, being first beaten, could never after joyne himfelfe to any of his other fquadrons, that remained as yet in faire likelihood of prevailing, fo long as they fought upon even termes, and but fquadron to fquadron. But similear, forfaking the light, thereby left a full fourth part of the Roman fleet vningaged, and readie to give fuccour to any of the other parts that were oppicit. So as in conclusion, the Romans got the honour of the day; for the loft but foure and twentie of theirs; wheras the Africans loft thirtie that were funke.

and threefcore and three that were taken. Now, if Amilear who had more Gallies than the Romens, had also divided his fleet into foure fquadrons, (befides those that he ranged in the front, to draw on the enemies, and to ingage them) and that, while hee himfelfe fought with one foundron that charged him, all the rest of the enemies fleet had beene at the same time entertained, he had prevailed: But the fecond squadron, being free, came to the refene of the first, by which Amilear was opprest; and Amilear, being opprest and fcattered, the Confulls had good leifure to relieue both their third and fourth fquadron, and got the victorie.

Charle the fift, among other his Precepts to Philip the second his sonne, where he adulfeth him concerning Warre against the Twkes, tells him, that in all bartailes 50 between them and the Christians, he should never faile to charge the Janisars in the beginning of the fight, and to ingage them at once with the reft. For (faith he) the Innifars, who are alwaies referred intire, in the Reare of the battaile, and in whom the Turke reposit his greatest confidence; come vp in a groffe body, when all the troups, on both fides, are difbanded and in confusion; whereby they carrie the Ggggg 3 victorie before them without relistance. By the same order of fight, and reservation, did the Romans also preuaile against other Nations. For they kept their Triarii in store (who were the choice of their Armie) for the vp-shot and last blow. A great and a victorious aduantage it hath cuer beene found, to keepe fome one or two good troups to looke on, when all elfe are difbanded and ingaged.

d. VIII.

The Romans preuaile in Africk. ATILIVS the Confull propoundeth intolerable conditions of peace to the Carthaginians. He is veterly beaten, and made prisoner.

Ow the Romans, according to their former refolution, after they had repaired and re-victualled their fleet, fet faile for Africa, and arrived at the Promontorie of Hercules , a great Head-land , somewhat to the East of the Port of Carthage, and some sortie leagues from Heraeles in Sicil, where Amilear himselfe as yet staid. From this Head-land (leauing the entrance into Carthage) they coasted the East-side of the Promontorie, till they came to Clypea, a Towne, about fiftie English mile from it. There they dif- 20 imbarked, and prepared to beliege Clypen; which, to ease them of labour, was yeelded vnto them. Now had they a Port of their owne on Africa fide; without which all invalions are foolish. By this time were the Africans also arrived at their owne Carthage; fearing that the Roman fleet and armie had directed themselves thither: but being aduertised, that they had taken Clypea, they made prouisions of all forts, both by Scaand Land, for their defence. The Romans fend to Rome for directions, and in the meane while waste all round about them. The order given from the Senate, was, that one of the Confulls should remaine with the Armie, and that the other should returne, with the feet, into Italie. According to this direction, Manlius the Confull is sent home to Rome; whither he carried with him twentie thou- 30 fand African captines, with all the Roman fleet and armie; except fortie ships, fifteene thousand foot, and fine hundred horse, that were left with Atilius.

With these forces, Regulus casily wanne some Townes and Places, that were vnwalled, and laid fiege to others. But he performed no great matter, before he came vnto Adis. Yet I hold it worthie of relation, that neare vnto the Riuer of Bagrada, This Citie he encountred with a Serpent of one hundred and twentie foot long, which he flue. wastaken from not without loffe of many Souldiers, being driven to vseagainst it such engines of the Turkes by warre, as served properly for the assaulting of Townes. At Adis he met with the the faitherith, warre, as termed property for the anathring of 1 owns. At the time the men in the year Carthagaina Armie, where of the Captaines were Hanne and Baffar, together with 155°, and was Amilear, who had brought ouer out of Stall fine thousand foot, and fine hundred 40 one of the horse, to succour his Countrie. These (belike) had an intent, rather to wearie him which he game out of Africa, by warie protraction of time, than to undergoe the hazard of a maine in charge, to fight. They were carefull to hold themselues free, from necessitie of comming to condhissonne blowes: yet had they a great desire, to saue the Towne of Alisout of his hands. Into keepe fafe; tending therefore to follow their generall purpose, and yet to disturbe him in the to wit, this Tuais, the Key of flege of Adu, they incampe neare vnto him, and ftroughy (asthey thinke) on the Africa: Flagh- top of an hill: but thereby they loofe the feruices, both of their Elephants, and of ing, the key of their horse-men. This disadvantage of theirs Regulus discouers, and makes vse of and Calin, the it. He affailes them in their strength, which they defend a-while; but in fine the Key of Spaine. Romans prevaile, and force them from the place, taking the spoile of their campe. 50 But two of these Philips Following this their good fortune at the heeles, they proceede to * Tunis , a Citie loft, that hee within fixteene miles of Carthage, which they affault and take.

them againe; the third, our English were bold, in the time of the renowned Queene Elizabeth, to wring out of his hands: where we flaid not to pick any lock, but brake open the dores, and having rifled all, threw it into the fire.

By the losse of this battaile at Adis, and more especially by the losse of Tunis, the Carthaginians were greatly difmaied. The Numidians, their next Neighbours towards the West, infult vpon their misfortunes; inuade, and spoile their Territorie, and force those that inhabite abroad, to forsake their villages and fields, and to hide themselves within the walls of Carthage. By reason hereof, a great famine at hand threatens the Citizens. Atilius findes his owne advantage, and affures himselfe that the Citie could not long hold out : yet he feared least it might defend it selfe, untill his time of Office, that was neare expired, should be quite runne out, whereby the new Confulls were like to reape the honor of obtayning it. Ambition there-10 fore, that hath no respect but to it selfe, perswades him to treat of peace with the Carthaginians. But he propounded vnto them so vnworthie and base conditions, as thereby their hearts, formerly possessed with feare, became now so couragious and disdaineful), that they resolved, either to defend their libertie, or to die to the last man. To strengthen this their resolution, there arrived at the same time a great troupe of Greekes, whom they had formerly fent to entertaine. Among these was a very expert Souldier, named Xantippus, a Spartan: who being informed of what had passed, and of the ouerthrow which the Carthaginians received neare vnto Adis, gaue it out publiquely, that the same was occasioned by default of the Commanders, and not of the Nation. This bruit ranne, till it came to the Senate; Xantippus 20 is sent for; gives the reason of his opinion; and in conclusion, being made Generall of the African forces, he puts himselfe into the field. The Armie which he led, confisted of no more than twelve thousand foot, and four thousand horse, with an hundred Elephants. No greater were the forces, wher with the Carthaginians fought for all that they had , Libertie, Liues, Goods, Wines, and Children: which might well make it suspected, that the Armies by Sea, before spoken of, were misse-numbred; the one confifting of an hundred and fortie thousand, and the other of an hundred and fiftie thouland: were it not commonly found, that they which vie the scruice of mercinarie Souldiers, are stronger abroad, than at their owne dores.

Xantippus, taking the field with this Armie, marched directly towards the Ro-30 mans; and ranging his troups vpon faire and leuell ground, fittest both for his Elephants and Horse, presented them battaile. The Romans wondred, whence this new courage of their enemies might grow: but confident they were that it should be soone abated. Their chiefe care was, how to refist the violence of the Elephants. Against them they placed the Velites, or light-armed Souldiers, as a forlorne hope; that these might, either with darts and other casting weapons, drive back the beasts vpon the enemies, or at least breake their violence, and hinder them from rushing freely vpon the Legions. To the same end, they made their battailes deeper in file, than they had been eaccustomed to doe. By which meanes, as they were the lesse subject vnto the impression of the Elephants; so were they the more exposed vnto 40 the violence of horse, wherein the enemie did farre exceede them. The Elephants were placed by Xantippus, all in one ranke, before his Armie; which followed them at a reasonable distance: his borse-men, and some light-armed foot, of the Carthaginian Auxiliaries, were in the wings. The first onset was given by the Elephants, against which the Velites were so vnable to make relistance, that they brake into the battalions following, and put them into some disorder. In this case, the depth of the Roman battaile was helpfull. For when the beafts had spent their force, in piercing through a few of the first ranks; the squadrons neuerthelesse persisted in their order, without opening. But the Carthaginian horse, having at the first encounter, by reason of their aduantage in number, driven those of Atilius out of the field, 50 beganne to charge the Roman battalions in flanke, and put them in great diffresse; who being forced to turne face enery way, could neither passe forward, nor yet retire; but had much a-doe to make good the ground whereon they flood. In the meane while, such of the Romans, as had escaped the furie of the Elephants, and left them at their backs, fell vpon the Carthaginian Armie, that met them in very good array. It was no euen match. The one were a disordered Companie, wearied with labour, and hurt; the other, fresh, and well prepared, to have dealt with the enemie voon equall termes. Here was therefore a great flaughter with little fight; the Romans haltily recoiling to the body of their Armie, which being furrounded with the enemie, and spent with trauaile, fell all to rout, vpon the defeat of these troups, that open the way to a generall ouerthrow. So the Carthaginians obtayined a full victorie; destroying the whole Roman Armie, saue two thousand, and taking flue hundred prisoners, together with Atilius the Confull. Of their owne they lost no more than eight hundred mercinaries, which were flaine, when the fight began. by two thouland of the Romans, that wheeling about, to avoide the Elephants, bare 10 downe all before them, and made way even to the Carthaginian trenches. These were the two thousand that escaped, when the whole Armie behinde them was routed. All the rest were either taken or slaine. Hereby fortune made the Romans know, that they were no leffe her vaffalls, than were the Carthaginians: how infolent soeuer they had beene in their proposition of peace, as if they had purchased from her the inheritance of their prosperitie, which shee neuer gaue nor fold to any mortall man. With what joy these newes were well-commed, when they came to Carrhage, we may cally conjecture; and what great things the vertue of one man hath often brought to passe in the World, there are many examples to proue, no leffe than this of Xantippus : all of them confirming that fentence of Evarpi- 20 DES, Mens vna fapiens, plurium vincit manus; Many mens hands equall not one

After this great seruice done to the Carthaginians, Xantippus returned into Grecce; whether for that he was more enuied than honoured, or for what other cause, it is voknowne.

The death of Atilius Regulus the Confull, was very memorable. He was fent from Carthage to Rome, about the exchange and ransome of prisoners on both sides: giuing his faith to returne, if the bulinesse were not effected. When hee came to Rome, and plainely faw that his Countrie should loose by the bargaine: so far was he from vrging the Senate vnto compassion of his owne miserie, that he earnessly 30 perswaded to have the prisoners in Africk lest to their ill destinies. This done, he returned to Carthage : where for his paines taken, he was rewarded with an horrible death. For this his conflancie and faith, all Writers highly extoll him. But the Carthaginians seeme to have judged him an obstinate and malicious enemie; that neither in his prosperitie would hearken to reason, nor yet in his calamitie would haue, the naturall care, to perferue himfelfe and others, by yeelding to fuch an office of humanitie, as is common in all warres (not grounded vpon deadly hatred) only in regard of fome small advantage. What societ the Carthaginians thought of him; fure it is, that his faithfull observance of his word given, cannot be too much commended. But that grave speech, which he made in the Senate, against the exchange 40 of prisoners, appeares, in all reason, to have proceeded from a vaine glorious frowardnesse, rather than from any necessitie of state. For the exchange was made foone after his death; wherein the Romans had the worfe bargaine, by fo much as Regulus himselfe was worth. As for the authoritic of all Historians, that magnific him in this point; we are to confider that they hued onder the Roman Empire: Philinus, the Carthaginian, perhaps did censure it otherwise. Yet the death which he fuffered with extreme torments, could not be more grieuous to him, than it was dishonourable to Carthage. Neither doe I thinke that the Carthaginians could excuse themselves herein; otherwise than by rectimination : saying, That the Romans described to be no better intreated, for as much as it was their ordinarie practise 50 to vse others in the like fort. Crueltie doth not become more warrantable, but rather more odious, by being customarie. It was the Reman faillion, to whipa'most to death, and then to behead, the Captaines of their enemies whem they tooke, yea although they were such, as had alwaies made faire warres with them. Wherefore it seemes not meet, in reason, that they should crie out against the like tyrannicall infolence in others, as if it were lawfull only in themselues.

The confideration both of this misfortune, that rewarded the pride of Atilius his intolerable demands; and of the sudden valour, whereinto the Carthaginians feare was changed by meere desperation; calls to remembrance the like insolencie of others in prosperitie, that hath bred the likeresolution in those, to whom all reafonable grace hath beene denied. In fuch cases I neuer hold it impertinent, to adde vnto one, more testimonies; approning the true rules, from which our passions

In the yeare 1378, the Genowaies wonne so fast upon the Venetians, as they not only draue their Gallies out of the Sea, but they brought their owne fleet within two miles of Venice it selfe. This bred such an amazement in the Citizens of Venice, that they offered vnto the Genowaies (their flate referued) what socuer they would demand. But Peter Doria, blowne vp with many former victories, would hearken to no composition; saue the yeelding of their Citic and State to his discretion. Hereupon, the Venetians, being filled with disdaine, thrust out to Sea with all their remayning power, and affaile Doria with fuch desperate surie, that they breake his fleet; kill Doria himselse; take nineteene of his Gallies, four escore boats of Padoa, and foure thousand prisoners; recouer Chiozza, and all the placestaken 20 from them; and following their victorie, enter the Port of Genea, enforcing the Genowaies, basely to begge peace, to their extreme dishonour and disaduantage, being beaten; which being victorious, they might have commanded, to their greatest honour and aduantage. The like hapned to the Earle of Flanders, in the yeare 1380. when having taken a notable, and withall an ouer-cruell revenge vpon the Gantois. be refused mercieto the rest; who in all humilitie, submitting themselues to his obedience, offered their Citic, goods, and estates, to be disposed at his pleasure. This when he had vnadu: fedly refused, and was resoluted to extinguish them vtterly; they issue out of their Citic with fine thousand chosen men, and armed with a desperateresolution, they charge the Earle, breake his Armie, enter Bruges (pell-mell) 30 with his vanquished followers; and enforce him to hide himselfe under an heave of straw, in a poore cottage; out of which with great difficultie he escaped, and saued himselfe. Such are the fruits of insolencie.

How the affaires of Carthage prospered after the victorie against ATILIVS: How the Romans having lost their fleet by tempest, resolue to forfake the Seas: The great aduantages of a good fleet in warre, betweene Nations divided by the Sea.

Y the reputation of this late victorie, all places that had beene lost in Africk, returned to the obedience of Carthage. At the Promontorie of Mercurie, two hundred Carthaginian Gallies, fet out of purpose, vpon the bruit of 50 their comming, encounter them : but greatly to their coft. For the Romans tooke by force an hundred and fourteene of their fleet, and drew them after them to Clypea; where they staid no longer, than to take in their owne men that had beene befieged and this done, they made amaine toward Sicil, in hope to recouer all that the Carthaginians held therein. In this hastie voyage they despise the aduice of the of three hundred and fortie ships: so as their former great victorie was denoured by the Seas, before the fame thereof recoursed Rome.

The Carthaginians, hearing what had hapned, repaire all their warlike Veffells, hoping once againe to command the Seas: they are also as confident of their land- 20 forces lince the overthrow of Atilius. They fend Afdrubal into Sicil with all their old Souldiers, and an hundred and fortic Elephants, imbarqued in two hundred Gallies. With this Armie and fleet he arriues at Lilybaum; where hee beginnes to vexe the Partisans of Rome. But aduerlitic doth not discourage the Romans: They build in three moneths (a matter of great note) one hundred and twentie ships; with which, and the remainder of their late shipwrack, they row to Panormus, or Palerma, the chiefe Citie of the Africans in Sicil, and furround it by Land and Water: after a while they take it, and leaving a Garrison therein, returne to Rome.

Very desirous the Romans were to bee doing in Africk: to which purpose they imploied C. Serullius, and C. Semprenius, their Confulls. But these wrought no 30 wonders. Some spoile they made upon the coasts of Africa: but Fortune robbed them of all their gettings. For in their returne, they were first set vpon the sands, and like to have perished, neare vnto the leffer Syrtes, where they were faine to heave all over-boord, that so they might get off; then, having with much a doe doubled the Cape of Lilybaum, in their paffage from Panormus towards Italie, they lost an hundred and fiftie of their ships by foule weather. A greater discouragement neuer Nation had; the God of the warres fauoured them no more, than the God of the waters afflicted them. Of all that Mars enricht them with vpon the Land, Neptune robbed them upon the Seas. For they had now loft, besides what they loft in fight, foure hundred and fixe ships and gallies, with all the munition and 40 Souldiers transported in them.

The exceeding damage hereby received, perswaded them to give over their Nauigation, and their fight by Sea, and to send only a Land-armie into Sieil, vnder L. C. scilius, and C. Furius, their Confulls. These they transported in some threescore ordinarie passage boats, by the straights of Messana, that are not about a mile and an halfe broad from land to land. In like fort, the overthrow which Atilium receited in Africa, occasioned chiefly by the Elephants, made them lesse cholerick against the Carthaginians, than before; fo that for two yeares after they kept the high and woodie grounds, not daring to fight in the faire and champian Countries. But this late resolution of for saking the Seas lasted not long. For it was impossible for 50 them to succour those places which they held in Sieal, without a Nauie, much leffe to maintaine the warre in Africa. For whereas the Romans were to fend forces from Messana to Egesta, to Lilybaum, and to other places in the extreme West parts of Siail, making fometimes a march of aboue an hundred and fortic English mile by land, which could not be performed with an Armie, and the provisions that follow it, in lesse than fourteene daies; the Carthaginians would passe it with their Gallies iti eight and fortie houres.

An old example we have, of that great advantage of transporting Armies by wat ter, betweene Canutus, and Edmond Ironside. For Canutus, when he had entred the Thames with his Nauie and Armie, and could not preuaile against London, suddenly imbarqued; and failing to the Welt, landed in Dorfet-flire, fo drawing Edmond and his Armie thither. There finding ill entertainement, he againe shipt his men, and entred the Sewerne, making Edmond to march after him, to the fuccour of Worcefter-

10 fire, by him greatly spoiled. But when he had Edmond there, he failed back againe to London: by meanes whereof he both wearied the King, and spoiled where he pleased, ere succour could arrive. And this was not the least helpe, which the Xetherlands have had against the Spaniards, in the defence of their libertie, that being Masters of the Sea, they could passe their Armie from place to place, vnwcaried, and entire, with all the Munition and Artilleric belonging vnto it in the tenth part of the time, wherein their enemies have beene able to doe it. Of this, an instance or two. The Count Maurice of Nassau, now living, one of the greatest Captaines, and of the worthiest Princes, that either the present or preceding Ages have brought forth, in the yeare 1500, carried his Armie by Sea, with fortic Canons, to Breda: 20 making countenance either to beliege Boifledue, or Gertreuiden-Berg; which the enemie (in preuention) filled with Souldiers, and victualls. But as soone as the winde ferued, he fuddenly fet faile, and arriving in the mouth of the Menze, turned up the Rhine, and thence to Ysel, and satedowne before Zutphen. So before the Spaniards could march overland round about Holland, about fourescore mile, and ouer many great Rivers, with their Cannon and carriage, Zutphen was taken. Againe, when the Spanish Armie had ouer-come this wearisome march, and were now farre from home, the Prince Maurice, making countenance to faile vp the Rhine, changed his course in the night; and sailing downe the streame, he was set downe before Hulft in Brabant, ere the Spaniards had knowledge what was become of him. 30 So this Towne healfo tooke, before the Spanish armic could returne. Lastly, the Spanish armie was no sooner arrived in Brabant, than the Prince Maurice, well attended by his good fleet, having fortified Halft, fet faile againe, and prefented himfelfe before Nymegen in Gelders, a Citie of notable importance, and mastred it.

And to fay the truth; it is impossible for any maritime Countrie, not having the coasts admirably fortified, to defend it selfe against a powerfull enemie, that is mafter of the Sea. Hereof I had rather, that Spaine than England should be an example. Let it therefore be supposed, that King Philip the second, had fully resolued to hinder Sir John Norris in the yeare 1,89. from presenting Don Antonio, King of Portugale, before the gates of Lysborne; and that he would have kept off the En-40 glifb, by power of his land-forces; as being too weake at Sea, through the great ouerthrow of his mightie Armada, by the fleet of Queene Elizabeth, in the yeare foregoing. Surely, it had not beene hard for him, to prepare an Armie, that should be able to relift our eleuen thousand. But where should this his Armie haue beene bestowed? If about Lysborne; then would it have beene easie vnto the English, to take, ranfack, and burne the Towne of Groine, and to waste the Countrie round about it. For the great and threatning preparations, of the Earle of Altemira, the Marqueile of Seralba, and others, did not hinder them from performing all this. Neither did the haftie leavie of eight thousand, under the Earle of Andrada, serve to more effect, than the increase of honour to Sr. Iohn Norris, and his Affociates: 50 confidering, that the English charged these, at Puente de Burgos, and passing the great Bridge, behinde which they lay, that was flanked with shot, and barricadoed at the further end, routed them; tooke their campe; tooke their Generalls standard with the Kings Armes, and purfued them ouerall the Countrie, which they fired. If a roiall Armie, and not (as this was) a Companie of private adventurers, had thus beginne the warre in Galicia; I thinke it would have made the Spaniaris to quit the guard of Portugale, and make hafte to the defence of their St. Ingo, whose Temple was not farre from the danger. But, had they held their first resolution; as knowing, that Sir John Norris his maine intent was, to bring Don Antonio, with an Armic, into his Kingdome, whither comming strong, he expected to be readily and joyfully welcomed : could they have hindred his landing in Portugale? Did not he land at Penicha, and march ouer the Countrie to Lysborne, lixe daies journie ? Did not he (when all Don Antonio his promifes failed) paffe along by the River of Lysborne to Cascaliz, and there, having wonne the Fort, quietly imbarque his men, and depart? But thefe, though no more than an handfull, yet were they Englishmen. Let 10 vsconsider of the matter it selfe; what an other Nation might doe, even against England, in landing an Armie, by aduantage of a fleet, if we had none. This queftion, Whether an inuading Armie may be refifted at their landing upon the coast of England, were there no fleet of ours at the Sea to impeach it; is alreadic handled by a learned Gentleman of our Nation, in his observations vpon Casars Commentaries, that maintaines the affirmative. This he holds only vpon supposition; in absence of our flipping: and comparatively; as, that it is a more fate and cafie course, to defend all the coast of England, than to suffer an enemie to land, and afterwards to fight with him. Surely I hold with him, that it is the best way, to keepe our enemie from treading vpon our ground : wherein, if we faile, then must we seeke to make him 20 wish, that he had staied at his owne home. In such a case, if it should happen, our iudgements are to weigh many particular circumflances, that belong not vnto this discourse. But making the question generall, and positive, Whether England, without helpe of her fleet, be able to debarre an enemic from laname; I hold that it is vnable fo to doe; and therefore I thinke it most dangerous to make the aduenture. For the incouragement of a first victorie to an enemie, and the discouragement of being beaten to the inuaded, may draw after it a most perilous consequence.

It is true, that the Marshall Monlue, in his Commentaries, doth greatly complaine, that by his wanting forces, wherewith to have kept the frontier of Guienne, they of the Protestant religion, after the battaile of Moncounter, entred that Countrie, and gathered great fireigth and reliefe thence; for if the King (faith he) would haue giuen me but reasonable meanes, j euse bien garde a Monsseur l'Admiral, de saire boire ses Cheuaux en la Garonne; I would have kept the Admiral from watering his horses in the River of Garonne. Monsieur de Langer, on the contrarie side, preferres the not fighting vpon a frontier with an inuading enemie, and commends the delay; which course the Constable of France held, against the Emperour Charles, when he inuaded Prouence. Great difference I know there is, and a diverse consideration to be had, betweene such a Countrie as France is, strengthned with many fortified places; and this of ours, where our Rampars are but of the bodies of men. And it was of invalions vpon firme land, that the fegreat Captaines spake: who seentran-40 ces cannot be vncertaine. But our question is, of an Armie to be transported ouer Sea, and to be landed againe in an enemies Countrie, and the place left to the choice of the Inuader. Hereunto I say, That such an Armie cannot be resisted on the coast of England, without a fleet to impeach it; no, nor on the coast of France, or any other Countrie: except enery Creeke, Port, or fandie Bay, had a powerfull Armie, in each of them, to make opposition. For let his whole supposition be granted; That Kent is able to furnish twelve thousand foot; and that those twelve thousand be laied in the three best landing places within that Countie, to wit, three thousand at Margat, three thousand at the Nesse, and fixe thousand at Foulkflon, that is somewhat equally distant from them both; as also that two of these 50 troups (vnlesse some other order be thought more fit) be directed to strengthen the third, when they shall fee the enemies fleet to bend towards it: I fay, that notwithstanding this provision, if the enemie, setting faile from the Isle of Wight, in the first watch of the night, and towing their long boats at their sternes, shall arrive by dawne of day at the Neffe, and thrult their Armie on shore there; it will be hard for those three thousand that are at Margat (twentie and four long miles from thence) to come time enough to re-enforce their fellowes at the Aeffe. Nay, how shall they at Foulkflon bee able to doe it, who are nearer by more than halte the way? feeing that the enemie, at his first arrivall, will either make his entrance by force, with three or foure hundred thot of great Artillerie and quickly put the first three thoufand, that were intrenched at the Nelle, to runne; or elfe give them fo much to doe, that they shall be glad to fend for helpe to Foulkfon; and perhaps to Margat : wherby those places will be left bage. Now let vs suppose, that all the twelve thousand Kensilh Souldiers arrive at the Nelle, ere the enemie can be readie to disimbarque his Armie, so that he shall finde it vnsafe, to land in the face of so many, prepared to withfland him; yet must we believe, that he will play the best of his owne game; and (hauing libertie to goe which way he lift) under couert of the night, let faile towards the East, where what shall hinder him to take ground, either at Margat, the Downes, or elsewhere, before they at the Nesse can be well aware of his departure? Certainely, there is nothing more easie than to doe it. Yea the like may bee faid of Weymouth, Purbeck, Foole, and of ail landing places on the South coast. For there is no man ignorant, that ships, without putting themselves out of breath, will easily 30 out-runne the Souldiers that coast them. Les Armees ne volent poynt en poste; Armies neither flie, nor runne post, faith a Marshall of France. And I know it to be true, that a fleet of ships may be seene at Sunne-set, and after it, at the Lisard, yet by the next morning they may recouer Portland, whereas an Armie of foot shall not bee able to march it in fixe daies. Againe, when those troups, lodged on the Sea-shores, shall be forced to runne from place to place, in vaine, after a fleet of thips; they will at length fit downe in the mid-way, and leave all at adventure. But fay it were otherwife; That the inuading enemie will offer to land in some such place, where there shall be an Armie of ours readie to receive him; yet it cannot be doubted, but that when the choice of all our trained bands, and the choice of our Commanders 20 and Captaines, shall be drawne together (as they were at Tilburie in the yeare 1588) to attend the person of the Prince, and for the defence of the Citie of London: they that remaine to guard the coast, can be of no such force, as to encounter an Armie like vnto that, wherewith it was intended that the Prince of Parma should have landed in England.

The lle of Tercerolatah taught vs by experience, what to thinke in fuch a cafe. There are not many Ilands in the world, better fenced by nature, and Brengthned by art: it being enery where hard of accelle; having no good harbour wherein to fisheter a Naue of firends; and yon enery coue or watering place a Fort creded, to forbid the approch of an enemies boat. Yet when Emanuel de Sylus, and Monstern 1582. de Chettes, that held it to the vice of Don Antonio, with flue of fixe thoughaft men, thought to have kept the Mangaesse of Santa Crus, from setting soot on ground thering the Marquesse have distincted by the Mangaesse of Santa Crus, from setting soot on ground thering was ware of it, and arrived at the Port des Mosses, farre distant from thence, where hee wanne a Fort, and landed, ere Anossew de Chattes, running thither in vaine, could come to hinder him. The example of Philip Stroße, flaine the yeare before, without all regard of his worth, and of three hundred French prisoners mur-expect at that Marquelle his hands: Therefore it is not like, that they were flow in carrying reliefe to Port des Moles. Whether our English would bee perfeaded to 50 mzke funch diligent halke from Marga to the Azele, and back againe, it may bee doubted. Sure I am, that it were a greater march than all the length of Texera; whereof the French-man had not measured the one halfe, when they iound themselves presented by the more nimble ships of Spaine.

This may fuffice to proue, that a firong Armie, in agood fleet, which neither foot, nor horfe, is able to follow, cannot be denied to land where it lift, in England, Hhhhhh

France, or elsewhere, vnlesse it be hindered, encountred, and shuffled together, by a flect of equall, or answerable strength.

The difficult landing of our English, at Fayal, in the yeare 1507. is alleaged against this: which example moues me no way to thinke, that a large coast may bee defended against a strong fleet. I landed those English in Fayal, my selfe, and therefore ought to take notice of this inflance. For whereas I finde an action of mine cited. with omission of my name; I may, by a civill interpretation, thinke, that there was no purpose to defraud me of any honour; but rather an opinion, that theenterprise was such, or so ill managed, as that no honour could be due vnto it. There were indeede some which were in that votage, who admised me not to vidertake it; 10 and I hearkned unto them, somewhat longer than was requisite, especially, whilest they defired me, to referve the title of fuch an exploit (though it were not great) for a greater person. But when they began to tell me of difficultie: I gaue them to vnderstand, the same which I now maintaine, that it was more difficult to defend a coall, than to inuade it. The truth is, that I could have landed my men with more case than I did; yea without finding any resistance, if I would have rowed to another place; yea euen there where I landed, if I would have taken more companie to helpe me. But, without fearing any imputation of rashnesse, I may say, that I had more regard of reputation, in that businesse, than of safetic. For I thought it to belong vnto the honor of our Prince & Nation, that a few Ilanders should not thinke 20 any aduantage great enough, against a fleet set forth by Q. Elizabath: and further, I was vnwilling, that some Low-Countrie Captaines, and others, not of mine owne squadron, whose assistance I had refused, should please themselves with a sweet conceipt (though it would have been short, when I had landed in some other place) That for want of their helpe I was driven to turne taile. Therefore I tooke with me none, but men affured, Comanders of mine owne fquadron, with some of their followers, and a few other Gentlemen, voluntaries, whom I could not refuse; as, Sir William Brooke, Sir William Harney, Sir Arthur Gorges, Sir John Skot, Sir Thomas Ridgeway, Sir Henrie Thinne , Sir Charles Morgan , Sir Walter Chute , Marcellus Throckmorton, Captaine Laurence Kemis, Captaine William Morgan, and others, fuch as well vnder- 30 flood themselues and the enemie: by whose helpe, with Gods fauour, I made good the enterprise I vndertooke. As for the working of the Sea, the seepnesse of the Cliffes, and other troubles, that were not new to vs, we ouercame them well enough. And these (notwithstanding) made fine or fixe Companies of the enemies, that sought to impeach our landing, abandon the wall, whereon their Musketiers lay on the rest for vs, and wonne the place of them without any great loffe. This I could have done with leffe danger, fo that it should not have served for example of a rule, that failed euen in this example; but the reasons before alleaged, (together with other reasons well knowne to some of the Gentlemen aboue named, though more priuate, than to be here laid downe) made me rather follow the way of braueric, and 40 take the shorter course; having it still in mine owne power to fall off, when I should thinke it meet. It is easily faid, that the Enemie was more than a Coward; (which yet was more than we knew) neither will I magnifie fuch a small peece of seruice, by feeking to proue him better: whom had I thought equall to mine owne followers, I would otherwise have dealt with. But for so much as concernes the Proposition in hand; he that beheld this, may well remember, that the same enemic troubled vs more in our march towards Fayal, than in our taking the shore; that he fought how to stop vs in place of his advantage; that many of our men were slaine or hurt by him, among whom Sir Arthur Gorges was shot in that march; and that such, as (thinking all danger to bee past, when weehad wonne good footing, would needes 50 foll ow vs to the Towne, were driven by him, to for fake the pace of a man of warre, and betake themselues to an hastic trot.

For end of this digreftion, I hope that this question shall near come to triall; his Majesties many moueable Forts will forbid the experience. And although the English will no lesse distance, than any Nation vnder heaven can doe, to be bearen vpon their owne ground, or elsewhere, by a forraigne chemie; yet to entertaine those that shall assail evs, with their owne beefe in their bellies, and before they cate of our Kentifb Capons, I take to be the wisest way. To doe which, his Majestie, after God, will imploy his good ships on the Sea, and not trust to any intrenchment youn the shore.

How the Romans attempt agains to get the masser of the Seas. The victories of Carcillv's the Roman Consolal at Panormus. The logge of Libbaum. How a Robaim Gallicentred Libbaum as legislar, in despite of the Roman specific that it is a matter of great difficultie to stop the passer of good ships. The Romans, by reason of greenous losses received, voweler CLAVDIV's and INNIV's their Consolals, abandon the Seas.

Hen, without a strong Nauie, the Romans sound it altogether impossible, either to keepe what they had alreadic gotten in Susl, or to enlarge their Dominions in Africa, or elsewhere, they resoluted once againe, not with standing their late misaduentures, to strengthen their fleet and thins of warre. So causing fittie new Gallies to be built, and the old to be repaired, they gaue them in charge (together with certaine Legions or Souldiers) to the new Confulls, C. Atilius, and L. Manlius. On the other lide. ifdrubal perceiving that the Romans, partly by reason of the shipwrack which they had lately suffered, partly by reason of the ouerthrow which they received by Xantippus in Africa, were leffe daring than they had beene in the beginning of the warre; and withall, that one of the Confulls was returned into Italie, with the one halfe of the Armie; and that Cacilius, with only the other halfe, remained at Pa-20 normus : he removed with the Carthaginian forces from Lilybaum towards it, hoping to prouoke Cacilius to fight. But the Confull was better aduised. For when Asturbal had made his approches somewhat neare the Towne, Cacilius caused a deepe trench to be cut, a good distance without the ditch of the Citle; betweene which and his trench he left ground fufficient, to embattaile a Legion of his Souldiers. To these he gave order that they should advance themselves, and passe over the new trench, till such time as the African Elephants were thrust vpon them, From those bealts he commanded them to retire, by flow degrees, till they had drawne on the Elephants to the brinck of the new trench, which they could by no meanes paffe. This they performed accordingly. For when the Elephants were at a stand, they 40 were fo gawled and beaten, both by those Souldiers that were on the inside of the trench, and by those that lay in the trench it selfe, that being inraged by their many wounds, they brake back furiously vpon their owne foot-men, and vtterly disordered them. Cacilius, espying this advantage, sallied with all the force he had; and charging the other troups, that flood embattailed, he vtterly brake them, and put them to their heels, making a great flaughter of them, and taking all their Elephants. The report of this victorie being brought to Rome, the whole state, filled with

The report of this victoric being brought to Rome, the whole flate, filled with courage, prepared a new fleet of two hundred faile, which they fen into Stad, to giue end to that warre, that had now lasted fourteene yeares. With this fleet and armie the Romans resolute to attempt Lisbaum, the only place of importance which 50 the Carthoginian held in Stad; and all (indeed) faue Dropanum, that was near ead joyning. They set downe before it, and possess from the theory of the places of saduantage neare wnto it, especially of such as command the bauen, which had a very difficult entrance. They also beat to the ground six towers of defence, & by forecable engines weaken so many other parts of the citic, as the defendants begin to despaire.

High had he with the set of the citic, as the defendants begin to despaire.

Yet Himileo, Commander of the Place, faileth not in all that belongs to a man of Warre. All that is broken, he repaireth with admirable diligence; he maketh many furious fallies, and giveth to the Romans all the affronts that possibly could be made. He hath in Garrison (besides the Citizens) ten thousand Souldiers; among which there are certaine Lieutenants, and other pettie Officers, that conspire to render and betray the Towne. But the matter is reucaled by an Acham, called Alexon, who had formerly, in danger of the like treason, saued Agrigentum. Himileo vieth the helpe of Alexon, to affure the hired Souldiers; and imploieth Hanmibal to appeare the troups of the Gaules, which did waver, and had fent their agents to the enemie. All promise constancie and truth; so that the Traitors, being vn-10 able to performe what they had undertaken, are faine to liue in the Roman campe as fugitiues, that had wrought no good whereby to deserue their bread. In the meane while, a supply of ten thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to their reliefe, hauing Hamibal, the sonne of Amilear, for their Conductor: who, in despight of all relistance, entred the Port and Citie, to the incredible joy of the belieged. The old Souldiers, together with the new Companies, (thereto perswaded by Himileo with hope of great reward) resolute to set vpon the Romans in their Trenches, and either force them to abandon the fiege, or (at leaft) to take from them, or fet on fire. their engines of batterie. The attempt is presently made, and pursued to the vttermost, with great slaughter on both sides. But the Romans being more in number, 20 and having the advantage of the ground, hold ftill their places, and with extreme difficultie defend their engines.

They of Carthage defire greatly to vnderstand the state of things at Libhaum; but know not how to send into the Towne. A certaine Rhodian vndertakes the seruce; and having received his dispatch, falles with one Gallie to £gusta, a little stand neare Libhaum. Thence, taking his time, he steered directly with the Port; and having a passing swift Gallie, he past through the best of the Channell, and recovered the water-gate, ere any of those, which the Romans had to guard the Port.

The next day, neither attending the couert of the darke night, nor dreading to 30 be boorded by the Roman Gallies, who waited his returne, he fet faile, and fhipping his Oares (fits Gallie being exceeding quick of fleerage, and himselfe expert in all parts of the channell) recouered the Hauens mouth, and the Sea, in defpight of all the purfuit made after him. Then, finding himselfe out of danger of being incompassed by many, he turned againe towards the mouth of the Hauen, challenging any one, if any one durft come forth, to vndertake him. This enterprise, and the well performing of it, was very remarkable, and much wondred at in those dayses: and y.t., where there was no great Artillerie, nor any other waspons of fire, to kill a-faire-off, the aduenture which this Rhodian made, was not greatly hazardous. For in this Age, a valiant and judicious nam of warre will not feare to passe by the 40 best appointed Fort of Europe, with the helpe of a good Tide, and a leading gale of winde: no, though fortie peeces of great Artillerie open their mouths against him, and threaten to teare him in peeces.

In the beginning of our late Queenes time, when Denmarke and Speeden were at Warre; our East-land fleet, bound for Leif-land, was forbidden by the King of Denmarke to trade with the flibjects of his nemies, and he threatened to finke their flips if they came through the flreights of Elfennar. Notwith landing this, our Merchants (hauing a hip of her Adieflier, called the Minior, to televal them) made the aduenture; and, full ayning fome Vollies of flot, kept on their courfe. The King made all the prouision he could, to flop them, or finke them, at their returne. But 50 the Minior, commanded (as I take it) by William Burrough-leading the way, did not only passe out with little loss, but did be at downe, with artillerie, a great part of the Fort of Elfennar; which at that time was not to well tampard, as now perhaps it is: and the fleet of Merchants that followed him, went through without any without any wound receiued. Neither was it long fince, that the Duke of *Parma*, besteging *Mniver*, and finding no possibilitie to master it, otherwise than by famine, laid his *Cannon on the banke of the River, so well to purpose, and so euen with the face of the water, that he thought it impossible for the least boat to passe by. Yet the *Holianders* and *Zelanders*, not blowne vp by any winde of glorie, but comming to finde a good market for their Butter and Cheefe, curn the poore men, attending their profit when all things were extreme dearein *Antwerp*, passe for the or twelve Tonne, by the mouth of the Dukes Cannon, in despise of it, when a strong Westerly winde, and a Tide of floud fauoured them; as also with a contrarie to winde, and an ebbing water, they turned back againe: so as he was forced, in the end, to build his *Stockado* ouerthwart the River*, to his meruailous trouble and charge.

The Fort St. Philip terrified not vs in the yeare 1596, when we entred the Port of Calles, neither did the Fort at Pantal, when we were entred, beat vs from our anchoring by it; though it plaied ypon vs with four Demicannons within point blanque, from fixe in the morning till twelue at noone. The fiege of Oflend, and of many other places, may be gitten for protefo, how bard a matter tris to flop the paffage of a good dips, without another as good to encounter it. Yet this is true, that where a Fort is fo fet, as that of Angrain Tereara, that there is no paffage along begin to the past of

otherwise no

But to returne to our aduenturous Rhodian: He arriues in fafetic at Carthage, and makes them know the chare of Lilybeam. Others alfo, after this, take yon them to doe the like, and performeit with the fame fucceffe. The Roman therefore labour to choke the channell; and, for that purpofe, fill many Merchants ships with great thores, and linke them therein. The force of the Tidescleares it again in part: but they grounded to many of those great-bellied boats in the best of the entrance, as at last it made a manifest rising and heap-slike a ragged lland, in the paffage. Hereby it came to passe, that a chartageissian Gallic, asking her course by night, and not suspecting any luch impediment, ranne her selfe a-ground thereon, and was taken. Now comes the brane Rhodian, thinking to enter, as he had done before but this Carthagistian Gallic, all title before taken, gaue him chace, and gathered wpon him; he sindes what shee is, both by her forme, and by her swiftinesse: and being not able to runne from her, resolued to sight with her: But shee is too well manned for him, so that he is beaten and taken.

Lijheum, after this, is greatly diffressed; the Souldiers being worne with labour and watching. But in this despaire there rose so violent a tempes, as some of the Romans woodden Towers, by which they ouer-topt the walls of Lusheum, were ouer-turned. A Greeke Souldier undertakes to fire those that were fallen, and performes it: for the sire was no sooner kindled, but being blowne vnto by the bellowes of a tempess, it increased so fast, as it became resistlesse, and in the end burned all to ashes, and melted the brasen heads of the battering Rammes. Herupponder and wearinesse brinder the Romans from repairing their Engines: so that they refolue, by a long fiege, to sterue the Defendants.

Vpon relation of what had path, a fupply often thousand Souldiers is fent from now, vnder M. Claudius, the Confull. He arriues at Mossian, and marcheth ouer land to Libbaum: where hauigner inferced the Armie, and supplied the Callies with new Rowers, he propounds the surprise of Drepaums, a Citie on the other 50 lide of the Bay of Libbaum. This service the Captaines and Souldiers willingly embrace. So so the Confull imbarques his troups, and arrives on the sudden in the mouth of the Port. Adherbal is Gouernour of the Towne, a valiant and prudent man of warter, who being signorant of thenew supply arrived at Libbaum; was at first amazed at their studen approch; but that in recovered his spirits, he perfectly the supplementation of the process of the control of t fwades the Souldiers, rather to fight abroad, than to be inclosed. Herewithall hee promifeth great rewards to such, as by their valour shall descrue them; offering to leade them himselfe, and to fight in the head of his fleet. Having sufficiently encouraged his men, he thrusts into the Sea towards the Romans. The Confull, deceiued of his expectation, calls back the foremost Gallies, that he might now marshall them for defence. Hereupon some row backward, some forward, in great confusion. Adherbal findes and followes his advantage, and forceth the Confusi into a Bay at hand, wherein he rangeth himfelfe, having the land on his back: hoping thereby to keepe himselfe from being incompassed. But he was thereby, and for want of Sea-roome, so streightened, as he could not turne himselfe any way to from his enemics, nor range himfelfe in any order. Therefore when he found no hope of relistance, keeping the shore on his left hand, he thrust out of the Bay with thirtie Gallies, besides his owne, and so fled away : all the rest of his fleet, to the number of ninetic and foure thips, were taken or funke by the Carthaginians. Adherbal for this feruice is greatly honoured at Carthage; and Claudius, for his indifcretion and flight, as much differed at Rome.

The Romans, notwithstanding this great losse, arme threefcore Gallies, with which they send away 1. Innius, their Confull, to take charge of their businesses in Scill. Innius armines at Theylans, where he meets with the whole remainder of the Roman fleet, those excepted which rode in the Port of Lilybaum. One hundred and a twentie Gallies he had, and besides these, he had gotten together almost eight hundred ships of burthen, which were laden with all necessaries prouisons for the Armie. With this great fleet he arrives at Syrausse, where he shales a while; partly to take in corne; partly, to wait for some, that were too slow of sale, to keepe companie with him along from Anssignan. In the meane time, he dispatcheth away towards Lilybaums, his Quessors or Treassurers; to whom he committed one halfe of his victuallers, with some Gallies for their convoy.

Astiberbal was not carelesse, after his late victorie: but studied how to vse it to the bestaduantage. The ships and prisoners that he had taken, he sent to Carthage. Of his owne Gallies he deliuered thirtie to Carthalo, who had threescore and ten 30 more vnder hisownecharge, and sent him to trie, what good might be done against the Roman steer, in the Hauen of Litybeann. According to this direction, Carthalo studenly enters the mouth of that Hauen, where he findes the Roman, more attentiue to the keeping in of the besigged Carthaginians, than to the defence of their owne against another seet. So he chargeth them, boords and takes some, and fires the rest. The Roman Campetakes alarme, and hastens to the rescue. But Himileo, Gouernour of the Towne, is not behinde shad; who sallies out at the sametime, and putting the Roman in great distresse, gives Carthalo good leisure to goe through with his enterprise.

After this exploit, Cartholo ranne all along the South coast of Sicil, deutling how 40 to worke missible to the enemie; wherein Fortune presented him with a stare ogalon, which be wisely managed. He was aduertised by his Scouts, that they had described, neare at hand, a great fleer, consisting of all manner of Vessells. These were the viscualiters, which the Consisting of all manner of Vessells. These were the viscualiters, which the Consisting of the heart of their comming: for he and his men were full of courage, by reason of their late victories. Accompting therefore the great multitude of Roman Hulks approaching, to be rather a prey, than a sleet, likely to make strong opposition, he hastlens to encounter them. It fell out according to his expectation. The stomans had no minde to fight: but were glad to seek chelter in an open Road, full of rocks, under covert of a poore Towne, 50 belonging to their partie; that could helpe to saue them only from the present danger, by lending theme engines and otheraide, wherewith to beat off the Carthoginans that affalled them: Carthogine stomans that affalled them: Carthogic having them as were fined and the superior of the rest, that could not long ride whet rocks, but would be forced, by any great change of winde, either to put out into the deepe, or to faue their men, how they could, by taking land, with the loffe of all their flipping. Whilett he was builed in this care; the Confull Insine drew neare, and was discouered. Against him Carthalo makes out, and findes him altogether unprepared to fight; as being wholly ignorant of that which had hapned. The Confull had neither meanes to flie, no rabilitie to fight. Therefore he likewife ran into a very dangerous Creeke; thinking no danger to great, as that of the enemie. The Carthagman, feeing this, betakes himselfe to a Station between the two Roman Reets; wherehe watcheth, to see which of them would first stirre, with a resolution to assume that which 10 should first dare to put it selfe into the Sea. So as now all the three sleets were on the South coast of Stati, between the Promontoric of Pachinus and Lifsbeam; a Trast exceeding dangerous, when the winde stormed at South. The Carthagman, who knew the times of tempeth, and their signos, sinding belike some feeling billow (For so we doe in the Welt of England, before a Southerly storme) hasted to billow (for lowe does in the West of England, before a Souther Month, which double the Cape of Pachinus, thereby to cover themselves from the rage at hand. But the Roman, who knew better how to fight, than how to Nauigate, and neuer found any foule weather in the entrailes of their beafts, their Soothayers being all and-prophets, were fuddenly ouertaken with a boilerous South winde, and all their Gallies forced against the rocks, and vtterly wrackt.

This calamitie fo discouraged the Romans, that they resolved agains to for sake the Seas, and trust only to the service of their Legions vpon firme ground. But fuch a resolution cannot long hold. Either they must be strong at Sea, or else they must not make warre in an Iland, against those that have a mightie fleet. Yet are they to be excused, in regard of the many great calamities which they had suffered, through their want of skill. Here I cannot forbeare to commend the patient vertue of the Spaniards. We seldome or neuer finde, that any Nation hath endured so many misaduentures and miseries, as the Spaniards have done, in their Indian Discoueries. Yet perfishing in their enterprises, with an inuincible constancie, they have annexed to their Kingdome fo many goodly Prouinces, as burie the remembrance 30 of all dangers path. Tempetts and thipwracks, famine, ouerthrowes, mutinies, heat and cold, pestilence, and all manner of diseases, both old and new, together with extreme pouertie, and want of all things needfull, have beene the enemies, wherewith enery one of their most noble Discouerers, at one time or other, hath encountred. Many yeares have passed over some of their heads, in the search of not so many leagues: yea more then one or two, have spent their labour, their wealth, and their lives, in learch of a golden Kingdome, without getting further notice of it, than what they had at their first setting forth. All which notwithstanding, the third, fourth, and fift undertakers, have not beene disheartned. Surely, they are worthily rewarded with those Treasuries, and Paradises, which they en-40 joy; and well they deserue to hold them quietly, if they hinder not the like vertue in others, which (perhaps) will not be found.

ò. X I.

The Citie of Eryx is surprized by the Romans, and recoursed by AMILCAR; who floutly holds warre with them fine yeares. The Romans having emptied their common treasurie, build a new fleet, at the charges of prinate men. The great victorie at Sea of LvcTATIVs the Confull; whereby the Carthaginians are forced to craue peace. The conditions of the peace betweene Rome and Carthage.

He Romans were carefull, to supply with all industrie, by land, the want of strength at Sea. Therefore they continue the siege of Lilybaum, and seeke to make sure to themselues all places, whither the enemies ships could not bring reliefe. The Confull Iunius, to curo the wound of dishonour, which hee had received, bethought him what enterprise to vndertake. In the end he resolued to attempt the Mountayne and Citie of Eryx, with the Temple of Venus Erycina: which was the fairest and richeft of all the Iland; and of these, by cunning or treason, he got possession. Erjx was commodiously seated betweene Drepanum and Panoroms ; so that it seemed a fit place for a Garrison, that should restraine the Carthaginians from making 20 roades into the Countrie. Wherefore Innius fortified both the top of the Mountaine, and the first entrance of the passage from the bottome, ( both which places were very defencible) with a good firength of men. But shortly after, in the tenth yeare of this warre, the Carthaginians fent forth Amilear, furnamed Barcas, Father of the great Hannibal, with a fleet and armie, who failing to the coafts of Italie, did throughly repay the spoiles which the Romans made in Africa. For he first of all wasted and destroied the Territories of the Locrines, and of the Brutians, that were dependants of Rome. Then entred he into Sicil; and finding there no walled Citie in the Carthaginians power, that served fitly to infest the Romans, he occupied a peece of ground of great aduantage, and lodged his Armie thereon; to 30 confront as well the Romans, that were in Panormus, as those that kept about Eryx, putting himselfe betweene both Armies with admirable resolution.

The place that Amilear had feized vpon, was not only very strong by situation, but had the command of a Port: whereby it gaue him oportunitie, to scoure all the coast of Italie with his fleet, wasting all along as farre as to Cuma. In the Isle of Sicil he held the Romans to hard worke: lying neare vnto Panormus, where in three yeares abode he did many notable acts, though not of much consequence, for that the enemie could neuer be drawne to hazard the maine chance. Hauing wearied himselse and the Romans long enough about Panormus, he vndertooke a strange pecce of worke at Eryx. The Roman Garrisons, placed there by Junius, on 40 the top, and at the bottome of the Mountaine, were very strongly lodged. Neuerthelesse Amilear found a way, lying towards the Sea-side, by which he conueighed his men into the Citic of Eryx, that was about the middelt of the afcent, crethe enemie knew of it. By this it came to passe, that the Romans which kept the top of the Mountaine, were streightly held (asit were) belieged. And no leffe was Amilear himselfe restrained, by both of these Garrisons, and such ascame to relieue them. There he found them pastime about two yeares more; hoping still to wearie out those that lay ouer his head, as they on the contrarie did their best, to thrust him out of those quarters.

At this time, all the care, both of the Romans and of the Carthaginians, was bent 50 vnto the prosequuting of this businesse at Eryx. Wherein it seemes true (as Hanni-Lia.Dic.; Lio. bal, in Linie, spake vnto Scipio) that the affaires of Carthage neuer stood in better termes, fince the beginning of the warre, than now they did. For whereas the Romans had vtterly forsaken the Seas, partly by reason of their great losses; partly woon confidence of their land-forces, which they held refittleffe, Amilear, with a fmall Armie, had so well acquited himselfe, to the honour of his Countrie, that by the triall of fine yeares warre, the Carthaginian Souldier was judged equall, if not, superiour, to the Roman. Finally, when all, that might be, had been deuised and done, for the dislodging of this obstinate Warriour: no way seemed better to the Senate of Rome, than once againe to build a fleet; whereby, if the mastrie of the Sea could once be gotten, it was likely that Amilear, for lack of Supply, should not long be able to hold out. But in performing this, extreme difficultie was found. The common treasurie was exhausted: and the cost was not little, that was requisite vnto such an enterprise. Wherefore there was none other way left, than to lay the burden yoon private purses. Divers of the principall Citizens undertooke to build (each at his owne charges) one Quinquereme; which example wrought fo well, that they, whose abilitie would not ferue to doe the like, joyned with some others, and laying their monie together, concurred two or three of them, in building of another: with condition to be repaied, when the warre was finished. By this voluntarie contribution, they made and furnished two hundred new Quinqueremes: taking for their patterne, that excellent swift rowing Gallie which they had gotten from the Rhodian, in the Port of Lilyheum, as was shewed before. The charge of this sleet was committed to C. Luclatius Catulus; who past with the same into Sicil, the Spring following, and entred the Port of Drepanum: indeuouring by all meanes to have forced the Citie. But being advertised that the Carthaginian fleet was at hand, and being mindfull of the late loffes which his Predeceffours had received; he was carefull to put himfelfe in order, against their arrivall.

Hanno was Admirall of the Carthaginian fleet; a man (as his actions declare him) wife in picture, exceedingly formall, and skilfull in the arte of feeming reuerend. How his reputation was first bred, I doe not finde; but it was vp-held by a factious contradiction, of things vndertaken by men more worthie than himselfe. This qualitie procured vnto him (as it hath done to many others) both good liking among the ancient fort, whose cold temper is anerse from new enterprises, and therewithall an opinion of great forelight, confirmed by enery loffe received. More particularly, he was gracious among the people, for that he was one of the most grieuous oppressours of their subject Prouinces; whereby he procured vnto the Carthaginians much wealth, but therewithall fuch hatred, as turned it all to their great losse. He had ere this beene imploied against the Numidians, and wild Africans, that were more like to Rouers, than to Souldiers, in making Warre. Of those fugitive Nations, he learned to neglect more manly enemies, to his owne great dilhonour, and to the great hurt of Carthage; which loft not more by his bad conduct, than by his malicious counfaile, when, having shewed himselfe an vnworthie Captaine, he betooke himselfe to the long Robe. Yet is he much commended in Roman Histories, as a temperate man, and one that studied how to prefer the Leggie betweene Carthage and Rome. In which regard, how well hee descrued of his owne Countrie, it will appeare hereafter : how beneficiall hee was to the Romans, it will appeare, both hereafter, and in his present voyage; wherein he reduced the Carthaginians to a miserable necessitie of accepting, vpon hard conditions, that peace which he thenceforth commended. Hanno had very well furnished his Nauie, with all needfull prouisions for the Souldiers at Expx: (for dexteritie in making preparation was the best of his qualities) but he had neither been carefull in traying his Marriners, to the practife of fame of a Carthaginian fleet was enough, to make the vnexpert Romans give way: forgetting, that rather the relifflesse force of tempelts, than any other strength of opposition, had made them to forsake the Seas. Yet in one thing hee had either algodi fi conceined a-right, or elle was sent forth well instructed. It was his purpose, first of all to faile to Eryx, and there to discharge his ships of their lading : and having thus lightned himselfe, he meant to take aboord some part of the Land-armie, together with Amilear himselfe, by whose helpe he doubted not, but that he should be able to make the enemier epent of his new aduenture to Sea. This was a good course, if it could have beene performed. But Catulus vied all poffible diligence, to preuent the execution of this designe : not because he was informed of the enemies purpose, but for that he knew it to be the best for them, and for that seared no danger so greatly, as to encounter with Amiliar. Wherefore although the weather was very rough, and the Seas went high, when the Carthaginian fleet was descried; 10 yet he rather chose to fight with the enemie, that had the winde of him, than to fuffer this convoy to paffe along to Erix, vpon vnlikely hope of better oportunitie in the future. All that Hanno should have done, Catulus had performed. Hee had carefully exercised his men in Rowing; hee had lightned his Gallies of all vnnecessarie burthen; and hee had taken aboord the choice men of the Roman Land-souldiers. The Carthaginians therefore, at the first encounter, were vtterly broken and defeated; hauing fiftie of their Gallies stemmed and funke, and seuentie taken, wherein were sew lesse than ten thousand men, that were all made prisoners: the rest, by a sudden change of winde, escaping to the Ile of Hieronefu.

Theftate of Carthage, vtterly discouraged by this change of fortune, knew not whereon to resolue. Meanes to repaire their steet in any time there were none left; their best men of warre by Sca were consumed; and Amiliar, youn whose valour and judgement the honour and fastetie of the Common-weale rested, was now surrounded by his enemies in sizis, where he could not be relieued. In this extremitie, they make a dispatch vnto Amiliar himselfie, and authorize him to take what course should be seen best vnto his excellent wisedome; leauing all conclusions to his election and sole counsalie.

Amilear, whom no aduerfitic, accompanied with the leaft hope or possibilitie of recourse, had euer vanquished, looking ouer euery promise, true or false, that 30 the present time could make him, (for to attend any thing from the future he was not able) resolved to make triall, whether his necessitie might be compounded vpon any reasonable termes. He therefore sent to Lustation the Consull an Ouerture of peace: who considering it well, gathered so many arguments from the present ponertie of the Roman State, wasted beyond expectation in the former warre, that he willingly hearkned vnto it. So, in conclusion, an accord was made, but with prouisson, That it should hold none otherwise, than if the Senate and People of Rome would ratific it with their allowance.

The conditions were: First, that the Carthaginians should clearely abandon the lie of Sies. Secondly, that they should neuer undertake upon Hieron 40 King of Syrausse, nor inauda any part of his Territories, nor the Territories of any of his Friends and Allies. Thirdly, that they should set at libertie, and send back into Hale., all the Romans, whom they hold priloners, without ransome. Lastly, that they should pay vnto the Romans two thousand and two hundred talents; which make, as the French reckon the talent, thirteene hundred and twentie thousand crownes: the same to be deliuered within twentie yeares next following.

These Articles were sent to Rome, where they were not throughly approued: but ten Commissioners were sent into Sicil, to make perfect the agreement. These Commissioners added a thousand talents to the former summe; and required a shorter time of payment: Further also, they tooke order, that the Carthagnium should not only depart out of Sicil is selfe, but should also with draw their Companies out of all the other llands betweene it and Italie, renouncing their whole interest therein.

Such was the end of the first Puinck Warre, that had lasted about twentie foure yeares without intermission; in which time the Remain had lost, by sight or shipwrack, about seuen hundred Quinquerenes; and the Carthoginians, about shundred; the greatnesse of which losses, doth serve to prove the greatnesse both of these two Cities, and of the Warre it selfe; wherein I hold good the judgement of Polybius; That the Romans, in generall, did shew themselves the braucr Nation; and Amilian, the most worthie Captaine.

Снар. 11.

Of divers actions passing betweene the first and second Punick Warres.

ð. I.

Of the cruell warre begunne betweene the Carthaginians and their owne Mercinaries.

HE Romans, having partly by force, and partly by composition, thrust the Carthagnians out of Stell, and all the little Ilands thereunt oadjacentique them rather meanes and leisure to helpe themselvies in a following warre, than cause to hold themselves contented with the present peace. It is a true rush, Quaddinger of Law is a stellar by the Conquerers, and received in the two majored, are ginen by the Conquerers, and received of the conquered, was made vinto them, by one of the Privarnales; or else had foregretten to follow it; in this was gibt to bush.

nesse. For when one of Prinernum, after a rebellion, defending in the Senate the cause of his Citie, was demanded by a Senator, What peace the Romans might hope for, or affure themselues of, if they quitted their present advantage over them; he answered in 40 these wordes, Si bonam dederitis, & fidam & perpetuam; si malam, haud diuturnam : If the peace be good and faithfull that you give vs, it will be perpetuall; if it beill, then of little continuance. To this answere, the Senate, at that time, gave such approbation, that it was said, Viri & liberi vocem auditam ; an credi posse, villum populum, aut hominem denig, in ea conditione, cuius eum paniteat, diutius quam necesse sit mansurum? That it was the speech of a manly and a free man; for who could beleeve, that any people, or indeede any one man, would continue longer in an ouer-burdened estate, then meere necessitie didenforce? Now if the Romans themselues could make this judgement of those Nations, who had little elfe, besides their manly resolution, to defend their libertie; furely, they grofly flattered themselves, in presuming, that the Carthaginians, 50 who neither in power nor in pride, were any way inferiour vhto themselnes, would fit downe any longer by the loffeand difhonour received, than untill they could recouer their legs, and the strength, which had a while failed them, to take reuenge. But Occasion, by whom (while well entertained) not only prinate men, but Kings and publique States, haue more prenailed, than by any proper prowesse or vertue; with held the tempest from the Romans for a time, and turned it most fearefully vpon Africa, and the Carthaginians themselves.

Such

For after that the first Punick Warre was ended : Amilear, leaving Errx, went to Lilybeum, from whence most conveniently the Armie might bee transported into Africk : the care of which businesse he committed vnto Geleo, to whom, as to a man of approued sufficiencie, he deliuered ouer his charge. Ge/co had an especiall consideration of the great fummes, wherein Carthage was indebted vnto these Mercinaries; and, withall, of the great disabilitie to make paiment. Therefore he thought it the wifest way, to send them ouer (as it were) by handfulls, a few at a time; that fo the first might have their dispatch, and be gone, ere the second or third Com- to paniesarriued. Herein hee dealt prouidently. For it had not beene hard to perfwade any small number, lodged within so great a Citie as Carthage, vnto some such reasonable composition, as the present emptinesse of the common T reasurie did require : fo that the first might have beene friendly discharged, and a good president left vnto the second and third, whilest their dissunction had made them vnable to recouer their whole due by force. But the Carthaginians were of a contrarie opinion. They thought to finde, in the whole Armie, some that would be contented to gratifie the Publique flate, by remitting a great part of their owne due; and hoped by fuch an example, to draw all the multitude to the like agreement and capitulation. So they detayned the first and second commers; telling them, that they 20 would make an even reckoning with all together. Thus every day the number increased, and many disorders (athing incident among Souldiers) were committed; which much disquieted the Citie, not accustomed vnto the like. In this regard it was thought fit, to remoue them all to some other place where they might be leffe troublesome. This must be done by some colourable wordes of perswasion : for their number was alreadie so great, that it was not safe to offend them too farre. Wherefore it is deuised, that they should all attend the comming of their fellowes, at Sicca: receiving enery one a peece of gold, to beare his charges in the meane while. This motion is accepted, and the Souldiers beginne to dislodge; leaving behinde them their wines, their children, and all their baggage, as meaning shortly 30 to fetch away all, when they came back for their pay. But the Carthaginians have no fancie to their returning into the Towne; and therefore compell them to truffe vp their fardells, that they might have none occasion left, to make any errands thither. So to Sicca they remoned, with all their goods; and there lay waiting for newes of their fellowes arrivall, and their owne pay. Bufineffe they had none to doc, and therfore might casily be drawne to mutinie: the whole argument of their discourse inclining them to nothing else. Their daily talke was, how rich they should be, when all their monie came in; how much would fall to euery single share; and for how long time the Citie was behinde hand with them in reckoning. They were all growne Arithmeticians; and he was thought a man of worth, that could 40 finde most reason to increase their demands, to the very highest, euen beyond their due. No part of their long service was forgotten; but the comfortable wordes and promifes of their Captaines, leading them forth to any dangerous fight, were called to minde, as fo many obligations, not to be cancelled, without fatisfying their expectation by some vnordinarie largesse.

Thus the time paffeth away; small the whole Armic being arrived, and lodged in the state. Himme comes thither to cleare the accompt. Now is the day come, where in they shall albe mader ich; especially if they can hold together, in maintaining shoutly the common cause. So thinke they all; and assemble themselfues to heare what good newes this messenger had brought: with a full resolution to helpe his 50 memorie, in case he should happen to forget any part of the many promises made vato them; all which were to be considered in their Donatiue. Hanno begins a verife formall Oration; wherein he bewailes the pouertie of Cartinge.; tell sthem, how great a summe of mony is to be paid vato the Boman; teckons ye the excession.

charges, whereat the common-wealth had beene in the late warre; and finally defires them to hold them selves contented with part of their pay, and out of the love which they bare vnto the citie, to remit the rest. Few of them vnderstood his discourfe: for the Carthaginian Armic was composed of fundry Nations, as Greekes, Africans, Gaules, Ligurians, Spaniards, and others, all of different languages. Yet they flared vpon him, and were (as I thinke) little pleased with his very gesture. But when such as conceined the whole tenour of his speach, had informed the rest what cold comfort hee brought; they were all inraged, and fared like mad men, fo that nothing would ferue to appeale them. Hanno would faine have affwaged their furic, but he knew not how: for hee leffe vnderstood their dissonant lowde noises, than they did his Oration. An Armie collected out of many countries, that have no one language common to all, or to the greater part of them, is neither easily stirred up to mutinic nor easily pacified, when once it is broken into outrage. The best that Hanno can doe is to vie the helpe of Interpreters, and messengers. But these Interpreters mistake his meaning; some, for want of skill; others, of set purpose; and fuch as deliner his errandes in the worst sense, are best beleeved. Finally, they thinke themselves much abused, by the Carthaginians, and resolve to demaund their owne, in peremptorie termes, at a nearer distance. In this moode they leave Sicand march as farre as Tunis, that is within a little of Carthage, and there they

CHAP.2. S.I.

Now begin the Carthaginians to finde their owne errour. It is a good rule,

Curandum inprimis,ne magna iuiuria fiat Fortibus & miseris :

Haue speciall care, that valiant pouertie Be not opprest with too great injurie.

But this proude citie, having neglected the rule, hath also beene carelesse in proui-20 ding to fecure her felfe against the inconvenience that might followe. She had fuffered the whole multitude, whereunto flee was like to give cause of discontent, to ioyne it felfe into one bodie, when the feuerall troupes might eafily haue beene dispersed: shee hath turned out of her gates the wives, children, and goods of these poore men, which had shee retained in shewe of kindnesse, shee might have vsed them, as Hostages, for her owne safetie; and by imploying a miserable pennie-father, in her negotiation with men of warre, thee hath weakened the reputation of her brauest Captaines, that might best have served to free her from the threatning danger. Yet likely enough it is, that Amilear had no defire to be vledas an instrument in defrauding his owne fouldiours of their wages : especially considering, that as he to best could beare witnesse of their merits, so was hee not ignorant, that meanes to content them were not wanting, if the Citizens had beene willing thereunto. Hereto may be added a probable conjecture, that Hanne, with his complices, who at this very time was a bitter enemie to Amilear, had the boldnesse to impose the blane of his owne wretched counfaile, vpon the liberall promifes made by the Captaines Amilear therefore did wifely, in fuffering those that maligned him, to have the managing of their own plot, and to deale the cards which themselves had thuffled. This they continue to doe as foolishly, as they had at first begunne. They furnish a market at Tunis, for the fouldiours; whom they suffer to buy what they lift, and at what price they lift. They fend euer and anone fome of their Senatours 50 into the Campe; who promise to satisfic all demands, as farre foorth as it should be possible. And thus, by shifting from one extreame to another, they make the fouldiours vnderstand, into what seare the city was driven; which cannot but adde much infolencie to the paffions alreadie stirred vp.

This sudden change of weather, and the true cause of it, is quickly found by the liiij Armie.

CHAP.2. S.I.

Armie, which thereupon growes wife, and finding the feafon fit, labours to make a great baruelt. Monie must be had, and without any abatement. This is granted. Many haue loft their horses, in publique service of the state. The state shall pay for them. They had lived some yeares, by making hard shift, without receiving their allowance of victualls from Carthage. If they had lived, they wanted not meat: therefore what was this to the Carthaginians? Was it not all one, whether the ships did bring in provision; or their Captaine direct them where to fetch it? But this would not ferne. They faid that they had beene sometimes driven to buy; and that (lince they could not remember, how much, or at what rate they bought) they would be paid for their prouision, during the whole time, and according to the 10 dearest price that wheat had borne, whilest the warre lasted. Such are now the demands of these Mutiners; who might easily have beene satisfied with farre lesse charges, and farre more honour, by receiving their due at the first. But now they make none end of crauing. For whileft the Carthaginians are perplexed, about this corne-monie; the Souldiers have deuifed many more tricks, whereby to extort a greater fumme of monic, without all regard of shame. Since therefore no good end could bee found of these controuersies, which daily did multiply, it was thought contienient, that one of the Carthaginians, which had commanded in Skil, should be chosen by the Souldiers, to reconcile all differences. Hereunto the Armie condescended, and made choice of Gesco: partly out of good liking to him, who had 20 thewed himfelfe at all times a friendly man to them, and carefull of their good, especially when they were to be transported into Africk : partly out of a diflike which they had conceived of Amilear; for that hee had not visited them in all this busie time. So Ge/co comes among them; and, to pleafe them the better, comes not without monie: which might give better countenance to his proceedings, than barren eloquence had done to the negotiation of Hanno. Hee calles vnto him first of all. the Captaines, and then, the feuerall Nations apart; rebuking them gently for that which had paffed; adulting them temperately concerning the prefent; and exhorting them to continue their loue vnto the State, which had long entertained them, and would alwaies be mindfull of their good feruices. After this he beganne to put 20 hand to his purse: offering to give them their whole paie in hand; and then after to consider of other reckonings, at a more convenient time. This had beene well accepted, and might have ferued to bring all to a quiet paffe; if two feditious ringleaders of the multitude had not ftood against it.

There was in the Campe one Spendius, a sturdie fellowe, and audacious, but a flaue; that in the late warre had fled from a Roman whome hee ferned, and therefore flood in feare, left hee should be delinered backe to his Master; at whose hands hee could expect no lesse, than to be whipt and crucified. This wretch could finde no better way to prolong his owne life, than by raifing fuch troubles, as might ferue to withdrawe men from care of prinate matters, and make his owne refti- 40 tution impossible, were his Master neuer so importunate. With Spendius there affociated himselfe one Matho; an hote-headed man, that had beene so forward in stirring vp the tumult, as hee could not choose but feare, lest his owne death should bee made an example, to deterre others from the like seditious behauiour. This Matho deales with his countrimen, the Africans; telling them, that they were in farre worse condition, than either the Gaules, the Greekes, the Spsmards, or any forreyne mercinaries. For (faith he) thefe our companions have no more to doe, than to receive their wages, and fo get them gone : but wee, that are to flar behinde in Africa, shall bee called to another manner of accompt, when wee are left alone; so that wee shall have cause to wish, that wee had returned home beggars, rather than loaden with 50 the monie, which (little though it be) (hall breake our backes. Tee are not ignorant how tyrannically thefe our haughtie Masters of CARTHAGE doereigne over us. They thinke it restanable, that our lines and goods should bee at their disposition; which they have at other times beene accustomed to take away from vs, even without apparent cause, as it were to declare their Souer eigntie: what will they now doe, seeing that we have demeaned our selves as free men, and beene bold to fet a good face on the matter, demanding our owne, as others have done? Ye all doe knowe, that it were a very hame for vs. if having beene as forward in eneric danger of marre, as any other men, we should now stand quaking like slaues, and not dare to open our mouthes, when others take libertie to require their due. This not with standing yee may affure your felues, that we are like to be taught better manners as soone as our fellowes are gone: in regard of whom they are contented to shadow their indignation with a good, but a forced countenance. Let witherefore be wife; and consider, that they hate and feare us. Their hatred will show it selfe, when their scare is once past : unlesse wee now take 12 our time, and, whilf we are the fironger, enfeeble them fo greatle, that their hatred shall not he able to doe vs wrong. All their strength consisteth in monie, wherewithall they have hired others against vs., and vs against others. At the present they have neither monie nor friends. The belt Armie that euer ferued them , whereof wee are no small part, lies at their gates, readie to helpe ws if we be men. Abetter opportunitie cannot be expected : for were our fwords once drawne, all AFRICK would rife on our fide. As for the CARTHAGI-NIAHS, whether can they fend for helpe? The case it selfe is plaine : but we must quickely resolue. Either we must preuent the diligence of GESCO, by incensing these GAVLES and SPANIARDES, and procuring them to draw blood; or elfeit behoueth vs to pleafe our good masters, by joyning wish them against our fellowes, yea by offering to forgive unto 20 them all our wages , if fo (peraduenture) they may be wonne to forgive us, or not overcruelly to punish our faults alreadie committed. He is worthily a wretched slaue, that neither hathcare to winne his Masters love, nor courage to attempt his owne libertie. By such perswasions Matho winnes the African souldiers to his owne purpose.

They are not now fo greedie of monic, as of quarrell; which hee that seekes will not misse to finde. When Gese therefore offered to pay them their whole stipend presently, but referred their other demandes, for horses and visitualies, to some or their more convenient time; they breake into great outrage, and say that they will have all, even all at once, and that our of hand. In this tumult, the whole Armie slock to gother about Mathe and Spendius; whose diligence is not wanting, to adde 30 more fuell to the sire alreadie blazing. Astaba and Spendius are the one in men to whom the fouldiours will hearken; it any other stand up to make a speach, allower of stone; stiping about his eares, puts him to silence, that hee shall never afterwards speake word more. Neither stay they to consider what it is that any man would say; enough hath beene faide alreadie by the good spokes(men; so that no other word (though perhaps to the same purpose) can bee heard, faue onely throwe throwe. Now the Rebellion beginnes to take forme. Matho and Spendius are chosen Captaines; who, followed by a desperate crew of Russians, will suffer no manto make his owne peace, but pursue their owne ends, under faire pretence of the com-40 mon cause. All which not withflanding, Gesco is not wanting to the good of his countrie, but aduentures himselfe vpon their furie. One while hee deales with the Captaines, and other principall men; taking them by the hand, and giuing gentle wordes: another while he workes with the feuerall Nations; putting them all in hope of their owne hearts desire, if any reason would content them. None of them are so sullen, as the Africans: indeed none of them had so good cause. They require him peremptorilie, to give them their owne, and not to feed them with wordes. The truth is, that they are not so couctous as they seeme: but will be more glad of an ill answere than of a good paiment. This is more then Gesco knowes: he sees not that Mathe hath any more than bare words, to bestow vpon them. Wherefore, as to rebuking their inconsiderate heat, he telles them, That they may doe well, if they stand in want of monie, to seeke it of their Captaine, Matho. This is enough. Shall he both defraud them and deride them? They stay no longer, but lay violent hands vponthe treasure that he had brought; yeavpon him also, and al that are with him:

as intending to take this in part of paiment, and, for the reft, to take another course. Matho and Spendius are glad of this. It had little pleased them to see their fellowes beginne to grow calme, by his faire language: wherefore they cast into bonds both him. and all the Carthaginians that they can finde that so the Armie may be freed from danger of good admonition, which they call Treason. After this followes open warre. Mathe follicites all Africk; and his Embaffadours are energy where well entertained. Neither is it needefull to vie perswasion: the verie same of this rebellion sufficeth to drawe the whole countrie into it. Now must the Carthaginians bee plagued for those oppressions, with which they have plagued others. It is true that aduerlitie hath neuer beene vntold of her errours: and as she is euer assu- 10 red to heare her owne, so commonly with her owne shee vndergoes those of other men. The Africans, finding the Carthaginians hang under the wheele, tell them boldly, that their Impolitions were mercilesse; that they tooke from them the one halfe of their corne, that they doubled their tributes in all things else; and that they inflicted vpon their vaffals the greatest punishments for the least offences. These cruelties the Carthaginians themselues haue forgotten: but the people, that haue fuffered fo much, retaine all in perfect memorie. Wherefore not onely fuch ascan beare armes, are readie to doe feruice in this great Commotion; but the verie women bring forth their iewels, and other ornaments, offering all to fale for maintetenance of so inst a quarrell. By this great forwardnesse, and liberall contribution, 20 Matho and Spendius are supplied with a strong aide of threescore and tenne thoufand Africans: and are moreouer furnished with monie, not onely to satisfie the present appetite of their men, but sufficient to continue the warre begunne. though it should bee of long endurance.

ð. II.

Diverse observations upon this warre with the mercinaries.

t. I.

Of Tyrannie, and how tyrants are driven to whe helpe of mercinaries.

Ere let vs reft awhile, as in a conuenient breathing place: whence wee may take prospect of the subicet, ouer which wee trauaile. Behold a 40 yryannicall Citic, persecuted by her owne mercinaries with a deadlie warre. It is a common thing, as being almost necessaries what a tryrannic should be expled by mercinarie forces: it is common that mercinaries should be false: and it is common, that all warre, made against Tyrants, should be exceeding full of hate and cruclice. Yet wee seldome heare, that the ruine of a Tyrannie is procured or sought, by those that were hired to maintaine the power of it: and seldome or neuer doe wereade of any warre, that hath beene prosecuted with such inexpiable hatred, as this that is now in hand.

That which wee properly call Tyrannie, is A violent forme of gonernment, not respecting the good of the subirest, but onely the pleasure of the Commander. I purposely 50 forbeare to say, that it is the winth rule of one ouer many: for verie truely doth Cleon in Thucydides tell the Atherians, that their dominion ouer their subiects, was none other than a meere tyrannie; though it were so, that they themselves were

were a great Citic, and a Popular estate. Neither is it peraduenture greatly needfull, that I should call this forme of commanding, violent: since it may well and casily bee conceiued, that no man willingly performes obedience, to one regardlesse of his life and welfare; vnlesse himselfe bee either a mad man, or (which is little better) wholly possessed with some extreme passion of loue. The practile of tyrannie, is not alwaies of a like extremitie: for lome Lords are more gentle, than others, to their very flaues; and he that is most cruell to some, is milde enough towards others, though it be but for his owne advantage. Neuertheleffe, in large Dominions, wherein the Rulers discretion cannot extend it selfe, vnto noto tice of the difference which, might bee found betweene the worth of feuerall men; it is commonly seene, that the taste of sweetnesse, drawne out of oppression, hath fo good a rellish, as continually inflames the Tyrants appetite, and will not suffer it to berestrained with any limits of respect. Why should hee seeke out bounds, to prescribe vnto his desires, who cannot endure the face of one so honest, as may put him in remembrance of any moderation? It is much that hee hath gotten, by extorting from some few: by sparing none, hee should have riches in goodly abundance. He hathtaken a great deale from enery one: but enery one could have spared more. He hath wrung all their purses, and now hee harh enough: but (as Couctousnesses is neuer satisfied) he thinkes that all this is too little for a stock, though 20 it were indeede a good yearlie Income. Therefore he denifeth new tricks of robberie, and is not better pleased with the gaines, than with the Art of getting. He is hated for this; and he knowes it well: but hee thinkes by crueltie to change hatred into feare. So he makes it his exercise, to torment and murder all, whom he suspecteth: in which course, if he suspect none vnjustly, he may be faid to deale craftily; but if Innocencie be not fafe, how can all this make any Conspiratour to stand in feare, fince the Traitor is no worserewarded, than the quiet man? Wherefore hee can thinke vpon none other securitie, than to disarme all his Subjects; to fortifie thin felle within some firong place; and for defence of his Person and state, to hire as many lustic Souldiers as shall be thought sufficient. These must not bee of his 30 owne Countrie: for if not euery one, yet some one or other, might chance to haue a feeling of the publique miserie. This considered, he allures vnto him a desperate rabble of strangers, the most vnhonest that can bee found; such as have neither wealth nor credit at home, and will therefore be carefull to support him, by whose only fauour they are maintayned. Now left any of these, either by detestation of his wickednesse, or (which in wicked men is most likely) by promise of greater reward, than he doth giue, should bee drawne to turne his sword against the Tyrant himselse: they shall all be permitted to doe as hee doth ; to robbe, to raussh, to murder, and to satisfie their owne appetites, in most outragious manner; being thought fo much the more affured to their Mafter, by how much the more he fees 40 them grow hatefull to all men elfe. Confidering in what Age, and in what Language I write; I must be faine to say, that these are not dreames: though some Englift-man perhaps, that were vnacquainted with Historie, lighting vpon this leafe, might suppose this discourse to be little better. This is to shew, both how tyrannie growes to stand in neede of mercinarie Souldiers, and how those Mercinaries are, by mutuall obligation, firmely affured vnto the Tyrant.

That the tyrannie of a Citie ouer her Subjects is worfe, than the tyrannie of one man: and that a tyrannicall Citie must likewile wie mercinarie Souldiers.

N Ow concerning the tyrannie, wherewith a Citie or State oppreffeth her Subjects; it may appeare some waies to be more moderate, than that of one man: but in many things it is more intolerable. A Citie is jealous of her Dominion; but not (asisone man) fearefull of her life : the leffe neede hath shee therefore, to se- 10 cure her felfe by crueltie. A Citie is not luxurious in confuming her treasures; and therefore needes the leffe, to pluck from her Subjects. If warre, or any other great occasion. drine her to necessitie, of taking from her Subjects more than ordinarie fummes of monie: the same necessitie makes either the contribution easie, or the taking excufable. Indeede, no wrongs are fo grieuous and hatefull, as those that are infolent. Remember (faith Caligula the Emperor to his Grand-mother Antonia) that I may doe what I list, and to whom I list: these wordes were accounted horrible, though he did her no harme. And Junenal reckons it, as the complement of all torments, inflicted by a cruell Roman Dame upon her flaues; that whileft thee was whipping them, sheepainted her face, talked with her Gossips, and vsed all signes of 20 neglecting what those wretches felt. Now seeing that the greatest grieuances, wher with a domineering State offendeth her Subjects, are free from all fense of indignitie: likely it is, that they will not extremely hate her, although defire of liber. tie make them wearie of her Empire. In these respects it is not needfull, that shee should keepe a Guard of licentious cut-throts, and maintaine them in all villanie. as a Dionylius or Agathocles must doe: her owne Citizens are able to terrifie, and to hold perforce in obedience, all male-contents. These things, considered alone by themselues, may serve to proue, That a Citie is scarce able to deserve the name of a T vrannelle, in the proper fignification.

All this notwithstanding, it shall appeare, That the miseries, wherewith a Tv- 30 rant lodeth his people, are not so heavie, as the burdens imposed by a cruell Citie. Not without some apparance of truth, it may bee said, that Luft, and many other private passions, are no way incident to a Citie or Corporation. But to make this good, wee shall have neede to vie the helpe of such distinctions, as the Argument in hand doth not require. Was not Rome lascinious, when Cate was faine to rise and leave the Theater, to the end, that the reverend regard of his gravitie, might not hinder the people, from calling for a shew of naked Courtisans, that were to be brought vpon the open stage? By comon practife, and generall approued custome, we are to censure the qualitie of a whole State; not by the private vertue or vice of any one man; nor by metaphylicallabiliraction, of the univerfall from the lingular; 49 or of the Corporation, from these of whom it is compounded. I say therefore (as I have faid elsewhere) That it were better to line under one pernicious Tyrant, than under many thousands. The reasons, prouing this, are too many to set downe : but few may suffice. The desires of one man, how inordinate socuer, if they cannot be fatisfied, yet they may be wearied; hee is not able to fearch all corners; his humour may be found, and foothed; age, or good aduice, yea, or some vnexpected accident, may reforme him: all which failing, yet is there hope, that his Successione may proue better. Many Tyrants have beene changed into worthic Kings : and many haue ill vsed their ill-gotten Dominion, which becomming hereditarie to their posteritie, hath growne into the most excellent forme of Gouernement, euen 50 a lawfull Monarchie. But they that line under a tyrannicall Citie, have no fuch hope: their Mistresse is immortall, and will not slacken the reines, vntill they bee pulled out of her hands; and her owne mouth receive the bridle of a more mightic Chariotier. This is wofull : yet their present sufferings make them lesse mindfull

CHAP.2. S.2. +.2. of the Historie of the World. of the future. New flies, and hungric ones, fall vpon the fame fore, out of which, others had alreadic fucked their fill. A new Gouernour comes yearly among them, attended by all his poorekindred and friends, who meane not to returne home emptie to their bines, without a good lading of waxe and honie. These flie into all quarters, and are quickly acquainted with euery mans wealth, or what socuer elfe, in all the Province, is worthic to be desired. They know all a mansenemics, and all his feares: becomming themselues, within a little space, the enemies that he fearethmost. To grow into acquaintance with these masterfull guests, in hope to win their friendship, were an endlesse labour (yet it must be vnder-gone) and such as e-

10 very one hath not meanes to goe about : but were this effected, what availeth it? The love of one Governour is purchased with gifts: the Successiour of this man, he is more louing than could be withed, in respect of a faire Wife or Daughter: then comes the third, perhaps of the contrarie faction at home, a bitter enemie to both his fore goers, who feekes the ruine of all that have beene inward with them. So the miferies of this tyrannic are not simple; but interlaced (as it were) with the calamities of civill warre. The Romans had a Law De Repetundis, or Of Recoucrie, against extorting Magistrates: yet wee finde, that it ferued not wholly to restraine their Prouinciall Gouernours, who prefuming on the fauour of their owne Citizens, and of their kindred and friends at home, were bold in their Prouinces, to

20 workeall these enormities rehearsed; though somewhat the more sparingly, for feare of judgement. If the subjects of Rome groned vnder such oppressions; what must we thinke of those, that were vassalls vnto Carthage? The Romans imposed no burthensome tributes; they loued not to heare, that their Empire was grieuous, they condemned many noble Citizens, for having beene ill Gonernours. At Carthage all went quite contrarie: the rapines newly denifed by one Magistrate, served as presidents to instruct another; every manresolved to doe the like, when it should fall to his turne; and he was held a notable flatesman, whose robberies had beene such, as might affoord a good share to the common treasure. Particular examples of this Carthaginian practife, are not extant: the gouernement of Verres the Roman, 30 in Sieil, that is lively fet out by Tullie, may serve to informe vs, what was the demea-

nour of these Punick Rulers, who flood in seare of no such condemnation, as Verres vnder-went. By procequuting this discourse, I might inferre a more generall Propolition; That a Citic cannot gouerne her subject Provinces so mildly, as a King: but it is enough to have shewed, That the tyrannic of a Citie is farre more intolerable, than that of any one most wicked man.

Suteable to the crueltic of fuch Lords, is the hatred of their subjects : and againe, futeable to the hatred of the subjects, is the jealousie of their Lords. Hence it sollowed, that, in warres abroad, the Carthaginians durit vie the service of African souldiers; in Africk it selfe, they had rather bee beholding to others, that were farther

40 fetcht. For the same purpose did Hannibal, in the second Punick Warre, thist his mercinaries out of their owne Countries; VI Afrim Hiffamia, Hiffami in Africa, melior Liv. Dec. 1. I.t. procul ab domo futurus vierg, miles, velut mutuu pignoribus obligati siipendia sacevent; That the Africans might ferue in Spaine, the Spaniards in Africk, being each of them like to proue the better Souldiers, the farther they were from home, as if they were obliged by mutuall pleages. It is disputable, I confesse, whether these African, and Spanish hirelings, could properly be termed Mercinaries : for they were subject vnto Carthage and carried into the field, not only by reward, but by dutie. Yet feeing their dutie was no better than enforced, and that it was not any loue to the State, but meere delire of gaine, that made them fight; I will not nicely fland vpon proprietie of a word, but 50 hold them, as Polybius allo doth, no better than Mercinaries.

The dangers growing from the use of mercinarie Souldiers, and forraigne

The extreme danger, growing from the imploiment of fuch Souldiers, is well observed by Machiauel: who sheweth, that they are more terrible to those whom they serue, than to those against whom they serue. They are seditious, vnfaithfull, disobedient, denourers, and destroiers of all places and countries, whereinto they are drawne; as being held by no other bond, than their ownecommoditie. Yea, that which is most fearefull among such hirelings, is, that they have often, and in time of greatest extremitie, not only refused to fight, in their defence, who have entertained them, but revolted vnto the contrarie part; to the vtter ruine of those Princes and States, that have trusted them. These Mercinaries (faith Machiauel) which filled all Italie, when Charles the eighth of France did paffe the Alpes, were the cause that the said French King wonne the Realme of Naples, with his Buckler without a fword. Notable was the example of Sforza, the Father of Francis Sforza, Duke of Millan; who being entertained by Queene Ioane of Naples, abandoned her service on the sudden; and forced her to put her selfe into the hands of the King of Arragon. Like vnto his father was Francis Sforza, the first 20 of that race Duke of Millan: who, being entertained by the Millanois, forced them to become his flaues; euen with the same Armie which themselues had levied for their owne defence. But Lodonick Sforza, the sonne of this Francis, by the just judgement of God, was made a memorable example vnto posteritie, in loosing his whole estate by the trecherie of such faithlesse Mercinaries, as his owne father had beene. For, hauing waged an Armie of Switzers, and committed his Duchie, together with his person, into their hands; he was by them deliuered up vnto his enemie the French King, by whom he was inclosed in the Castle of Loches to his dying day.

The like inconvenience is found, in vling the helpe of forraigne Auxiliaries. We 30 fee, that when the Emperor of Conflantinople had hired ten thousand Turkes, against his neighbour Princes; he could neuer, either by perswasion or force; set them againe ouer Sca vpon Asia fide : which gaue beginning to the Christian feruitude, that soone after followed. Alexander, the sonne of Cassander, sought aide of the great Demetrius: but Demetrius, being entred into his Kingdome, flue the same Alexander who had inuited him, and made himselfe King of Macedon. Syracon the Turke was called into Egypt by Sanar the Soldan, against his Opposite : butthis Turke did fettle himfelfe fo furely in Agypt, that Saladine his Successiour became Lord thereof; and of all the holy Land, soone after. What neede we looke about for examples of this kinde? Euery Kingdome, in effect, can furnish vs. The Bri- 40 taines drew the Saxons into this our Countrie; and Mac Murrough drew the English into Ireland: but the one and the other foone became Lords of those two

Against all this may be alleaged, the good successe of the vnited Provinces of the Netherlands, vling none other than fuch kinde of Souldiers, in their late warre. Indeede these Low Countries have many goodly and strong Cities, filled with Inhabitants that are wealthie, industrious, and valiant in their kinde. They are sout Sea men, and therein is their excellencie; neither are they bad, at the defence of a place well fortified : but in open field they have feldome beene able to stand against the Spaniard. Necessitie therefore compelled them to secke helpe abroad: and the like 50 necessitie made them for beare to arme any great numbers of their owne. For, with monie raised by their Trade, they maintayned the warre: and therefore could ill spare, vnto the Pike and Musket, those hands, that were of more vse in helping to fill the common purse. Yet what of this? they sped well. Surely they sped as ill as might be, whilest they had none other than mercinarie Souldiers. Many fruitlesse attempts, made by the Prince of Orange; can witneffe it: and that braue Commander, Count Lodowick of Nassaw, felt it to his griefe, in his retrait from Groeninghen; when in the very instant, that required their scruice in fight, his mercinaries cried out aloud for monie, and so ranne away. This was not the only time, when the hired fouldiers of the States, have either fought to hide their cowardize under a shew ofgreedinesse; or at least, by meere couctousnesse, have ruined in one houre the labour of many moneths. I will not stand to proue this by many examples : for they themselves will not denie it. Neither would I touch the honour of Monsieur to Duke of Anion, brother to the French King; faue that it is follie to conceale what all the world knowes. He that would lay open the danger of forraine Auxiliaries, needeth no better patterne. It is commonly found, that fuch Aiders make themselues Lords ouer those, to whom they lend their succour: but where shall we meet with such another as this Monsieur, who, for his protection promised, being rewarded with the Lordship of the Countrie, made it his first worke, to thrust by violence agalling yoke vpon the peoples neck? Well, hee lived to repent it, with griefe enough. Euen whilest he was counterfeiting vnto those about him, that were ignorant of his plot, an imaginarie forrow for the poore Burghers of Antwerpe, as verily beleeuing the Towne to bee surprised and wonne; the death of the Count 20 St. Aignam, who fell ouer the wall, and the Cannon of the Citic, discharged against his owne troupes, informed him better what had hapned; shewing that they were his owne French, who stood in neede of pittie. Then was his fained passion changed, into a very bitter anguish of minde; wherein, smiting his breast, and wringing his hands, he exclaimed, Helas, mon Dieu, que veulx tu faire demoy; Alas, my God, what wilt theu doe with me? So the affaires of the Netherlands will not ferue to proue, that there is litle danger in viing mercinarie fouldiers, or the helpe of forraine Auxiliaries. This notwithstanding they were obedient vnto necessitie, and sought helpe of the English Scots, and French: wherein they did wifely, and prospered. For when there was in France a King, partaker with them in the same danger; when the Queen 30 of England refused to accept the Soueraigntie of their Countrie, which they offered, yet being prouoked by the Spaniard their enemie, purfued him with continual warre; when the heire of England raigned in Scotland, a King too just and wife warre; when the near of Enganata agrees in the position of his Neighbours mi-(though not ingaged in any quartel) either to make profit of his Neighbours mi-feries, or to helpe those that had attempted the conquest of his owne inheritance: then might the Netherlanders very safely repose considence, in the forces of these their Neighbour-Countries. The fouldiers that came vnto them from hence, were (to omit many other commendations) not only regardfull of the pay that they should receive; but well affected vnto the cause that they tooke in hand; or if any were cold in his denotion, to the fide whereon he fought; yet was he kept in order, 40 by remembrance of his owne home, where the English would have rewarded him with death, if his faith had beene corrupted by the Spaniard. They were therefore trusted with the custodie of Cities; they were held as friends, and patrons; the neceffitie of the poorer fort was relieued, before the pay-day came, with lendings, and other helps, as well as the abilitie of the States could permit. When three such Princes, raigning at one time, shall agree so well, to maintaine against the power of a fourth, injurious (or at least so feeming) to them all, a Neighbour-Countrie, of the same Religion, and to which they all are louingly affected: then may such a Countrie be secure of her Auxiliaries, and quietly intend her Trade, or other businesse, in hope of like successe. But these circumstances meet so seldome, as it may 50 well hold true in generall. That mercinarie, and forraigne auxiliarie forces, are no leffe dangerous, than the enemie, against whom they are entertained.

That the moderate government of the Romans gauethem affurance to whethe fernice of their owne subjects in their warres. That in mans nature there is an affection breeding tyrannie, which hindreth the vie and benefit of the like moderation.

Here may it be demanded, whether also the Romans were not compelled to vse service of other solutions in their many great warres, but performed all by their owne citizens? for if it were their manner to arme their owne subjects; how 10 happenedit, that they feared no rebellion? if strangers; how then could they auoide the inconveniences aboue rehearfed? The answere is; That their Armies were compounded vivallie of their owne citizens, and of the Latines, in equal lnumber: to which they added, as occasion required, some companies of the Campanes, Hetrurians, Sammites, or other of their subjects, as were either interessed in the quarrell, or might best betrusted. They had, about these times, (though seldome they did implie so many,) tenne Roman Legions; a good strength, if all other helpe had beene wanting: which serue to keepe in good order their subjects, that were alwaies fewer in the Armie than themselves. As for the Latines, if consanguinitie were not a sufficient obligation; yet many priniledges and immunities, which they en- 20 ioyed, made them affured vnto the State of Rome: vnder which they lived almost at libertic, as being bound to little elfe, than to ferue it in warre. It is true, that a yoke, how calle focuer, feemes troublesome to the necke that hath been caccustomed to freedome. Therefore many people of Italie hauetaken occasion of seuerall aduantages, to deliuer themselues from the Roman subjection. But still they have been reclaimed by warre; the Authors of rebellion have sharpely punished; and the people, by degrees, have obtained such libertie, as made them esteeme none otherwise of Rome, than as the common citie of all Italie. Yea, in processe of time it was granted vnto many cities, and those farre off remooned, even to Tarfus in Cilicia, where Saint Paul was borne. That all the Burgesses should bee free of Rome it selfe. 30 This fauour was conferred absolutlie vpon some; vpon some, with restrainr of gining voice in election of Magistrates, or with other such limitation, as was thought fit. Hercunto may be added, that it was their manner, after a great conquest, to release vnto their new subjects halfe of their tribute which they had beene wont to pay vnto their former Lords, which was a readie way, to bring the multitude into good liking of their present condition, when the reuiew of harder times past, should rather teach them to fearearelaple, than to hope for better in the future, by feeking innouation. Neither would it be forgotten, as a special note of the Romans good go-List. Dist. 3. L.3. ucrnment, That when some, for their well-describing, baue had the offer to be made citizens of Rome; they have refused it, and held themselves better contented with 40 their owne present estate. Wherefore it is no maruaile, that Petellia, a citie of the Brutians in Italie, chose rather to endure all extremitie of warre, than, vpon any condition, to for fake the Romans; cucn when the Romans them selues had confessed, that they were vnable to helpe these their subjects, and therefore willed them to looke to their ownegood, as having beene faithfull to the vtmost. Such love purchased these milde Gouernours, without impairing their Maiestie thereby. The summe of all is: They had, of their owne, a strong Armie; they doubled it, by adioyning thereunto the Latines; and they further increased it, as neede required, with other helpe of their owne subjects: all, or the most of their followers, accounting the prosperitie of Rome to be the common good.

The moderate vse of sourceigne power being so effectuall, in assuring the people vnto their Lords, and consequentlie, in the establishment or enlargement of Dominion: it may feeme strange, that the practife of tyrannie, whose effects are contrarie, hath beene so common in all ages. The like, I knowe, may bee saide, of all Vice, and Ifregularitie what socuer. For it is leffe difficult (who soeuer thinke otherwise) and more fafe, to keepe the way of Iustice and Honestie, than to turne aside from it; vet commonly our passions lead vs into by-pathes. But where Lust, Anger, Feare, or any the like Affection, seduceth our reason; the same vnrulie appetite either bringeth with it an excuse, or at least-wise taketh away all cause of wonder. In tyrannie it is not fo: for as much as we can hardly descric the passion, that is of force to infinuate it felfe into the whole tenour of a Gouernment. It must be confessed, that lawleffe defires have bred many Tyrants: yet fo, that these defires have seldome been chereditarie, or long-laiting; but have ended commonly with the Tyrants 10 life, fometimes before his death; by which meanes the Gouernment hath beene reduced to a better forme. In fuch cases, the faying of Aristotle holds, That Tyran- Arist. Palib. 5. nies are of short continuance. But this doth not satisfie the question in hand. Why did 6.12. the Carthaginians exercise Tyrannie? why did the Athenians? why have many other Cities done the like? If in respect of their generall good; how could they beignorant, that this was an ill course for the safetie of the Weale publique? If they were led hereunto by any affection; what was that affection, wherin fo many thoufand citizens, divided and subdivided within themselves by factions, did all concurre, notwithstanding the much diversitie of temper, and the vehemencie of priuate hatred among them? Doubtles, we must be faine to say, That T yrannie is, by 20 it selfe, a Vicedistinct from others. A Man, we knowe, is Animal politicum, apt. euen by Nature, to command, or to obey; euery one in his proper degree. Other desires of Mankinde, are common likewise vnto bruit beastes; and some of them, to bodies wanting sense: but the desire of rule belongeth unto the nobler part of reafon; whereunto is also answerable an aptnesse to yeeld obedience. Now as hunger and thirst are given by nature, not onely to Man and Beast, but vnto all forts of Vegetables, for the sustentation of their life: as Feare, Anger, Lust, and other Affections are likewise naturall, in convenient measure, both vnto mankinde, and to all creatures that have sense, for the shunning or repelling of harme, and seeking after that which is requisite : euen so is this desire of ruling or obaying, engrafted by

30 Nature in the race of Man, and in Man onely as a reasonable creature, for the ordering of his life, in a civile forme of inflice. All these in-bred qualities are good and vsefull. Neuerthelesse, Hunger and Thirst are the Parents of Gluttonic and Drunkennesse, which, in reproach, are called beasslie, by an unproper terme : fince they grow from appetites, found in leffe worthie creatures than beaftes, and are yet not To common in beaftes, as in men. The effects of Anger, and of fuch other Paffions as descend no lower than unto bruit beasses, are held less vile; and perhaps not without good reason: yet are they more horrible, and punished more grieuously, by sharper Lawes, as being in generall more pernicious. But as no corruption is worse, than of that which is best; there is not any Passion, that nourisheth a vice 40 more hurtfull vnto Mankinde, than that which issueth from the most noble roote, euen the depraued Affection of ruling. Hence arise those two great mischieses, of which hath beene an old question in dispute, whether bee the worse; That all things, or That nothing, thould be lawfull. Of these, a dull spirit, and ouer-loaden by fortune, with power, whereofit is not capable, occasioneth the one; the other proceedeth from a contrarie distemper, whose vehemencie the bounds of Reason cannot limit. Vnder the extremitie of either, no countrie is able to sublist: yet the defective dulnesse, that permitteth any thing, wil also permit the execution of Law, to which, meere necessitie doth enforce the ordinarie Magistrate; whereas Tyrannic is more actiue, and pleaseth it selfe in the excesse, with with a false colour of iu-

50 stice. Examples of supiditie, and vnaptnes to rule, are not very frequent, though fuch natures are curry where found; for this qualitie troubles not it selfe in seeking Empire; or if by some errour of fortune, it encounter therewithall, (as when Claudius, hiding himselfe in a corner, found the Empire of Rome) some friend or else a wife, is it not wanting to supply the defect, which also crueltie doth helpe

The rule of the husband ouer the wife, and of parents ouer their children, is naturall and appointed by God himfelfe; fo that it is alwaics, and fimplie, allowable and good. The former of these, is, as the dominion of Reason over Appetite; the latter is the whole authoritie, which one free man can have ouer another. The rule of a King is no more, nor none other, than of a common Father ouer his whole countrie: which hee that knowes what the power of a Father is, or ought to bee, knowes to be enough. But there is a greater, and more Masterlie rule, which God Geren, vas. gone vnto Adam, when he faid; Haue dominion ouer the fifth of the Sea, and ouer the. for he of the aire, and oner everieliving thing that moveth upon the earth: which also hee confirmed unto Noah, and his children, faying, The feare of you, and the dread of you, 30 flan be uf on everie beaft of the earth, and upon everie fowle of the aire, upon all that moueth upon the earth, and upon all the fifthes of the Sea; into your hands are they delinered. Hee who gaue this dominion to Man, gaue also an apritude to vseit. The execution of this power hath fince extended it felfe, ouer a great part of Mankinde. There are indeed no small numbers of men, whose disabilitie to gouerne themselves, proues them, according vnto Ariflotles doctrine, to be naturallie flaues.

Yet finde I not in Scripture any warrant, to oppresse men with bondage: vn-Ari ? . Pol. J. s. c. 3 lesse the lawfulnesse thereof be sufficientlie intimated, where it is faid, That a man shall not be punished for the death of a servant, whom he hath slaine by correction, Exod catalat if the feruant line a day or two, because he is his monie; or else by the captinitie of the 40 Num.c.30.0.40 Assistantiff girles, which were made bondflaues, and the Sanctuarie had a part of them for the Lordstribute. Doubtleffe the custome hath beene very ancient : for Noab laid this curse vpon Canaan, that he should be a servant of servants and Abraham G(8.12.0.16. had of Pharaoh, among other gifts, men-ferusnts, and maide-feruants, which were none other than flaues. Christian Religion is said to have abrogated this olde kinde of feruilitie: but surelie, they are deceived, that thinke so. Saint Paul desired the li-Rod to Philem. bertie of Onesimus, whome he had wonne vnto Christ: yet wrote hee for this vnto Philemon, by way of request, crauing it as abenefite, not vrging it as a dutic. Agreeable hereto is the direction, which the fame Saint Paul giueth vnto feruants: Let eue-

1400.04.0.20. ryman shide in the same calling wherein hee was called: art thou salled, being a servant? 50 care not for it , but if thou maift bemade free, veit rather. It is true , that Christian religion bath procured libertie vnto many; not onely in regard of pietic, but for that the Christian Masters stood in seare, of being discouered by their slanes, vnto the persecuters of religion. Mahomet likewise by giuing libertie to his followers, drewe many vnto his impietie: but whether he forbad it, as vnlawfull, vnto his fectatours. to hold one another of them in bondage, I cannot tell; faue that by the practife of the Turks and Moores, it seemes he did not. In England we had many bond servants, untill the times of our last civile warres : and I thinke that the Lawes concerning villenage are full in force, of which the latest are the sharpest. And now, since slaves were made free, which were of great vie and feruice, there are growne vp a rabble of Rogues, Cutpurfes, and other the like Trades; flaues in Nature, though not of the Historie of the World.

But whether this kind of dominion belawfull, or not; Ariflotle hath well proued, that it is naturall. And certainely we finde not fuch a latitude of difference. in any creature, as in the nature of man; wherein (to omit the infinite distance in clate, of the elect & reprobate) the wifeft excell the most foolish, by far greater degree, than the most foolish of men doth surpasse the wisest of beasts. Therfore when Commisferation hath given way to Reason; we shall find that Nature is the ground even of Masterly power, and of service obedience, which is thereto correspondent. But it may be truly faid, that some countries have sublisted long, without the vse of any feruilitie: as also it is true, that some countries have not the vse of any tame carraile. Indeede the affections which vphold civile rule, are (though more noble) not so simplie needfull, vnto the sustentation either of our kinde, as are Lust, and the an like; or of eueric one, as are hunger and thirst; which notwithstanding are the lowest in degree. But where most vile, and seruile dispositions, have libertie to shew themselves begging in the streetes; there may wee more justly wonder, how the dangerous toile of fea-faring men can finde enough to vindertake them, than how the swarme of idle vagabonds should increase, by accesse of those, that are wearie of their owne more painefull condition. This may suffice to proue, that in Mankind there is found, ingrafted even by Nature, a defire of absolute dominion: whereunto the generall custome of Nations doth subscribe; together with the pleasure which most men take in flatterers, that are the basest of slaues.

This being fo, we finde no cause to meruaile, how Tyrannie hath beene so rife in all ages, and practifed, not onely in the finglerule of fome vicious Prince, but ener by confent of whole Cities and Estates : since, other vices have likewise gotten head, and borne a generall fway; notwithstanding that the way of vertue be more honourable, and commodious. Few there are that have vsed well the inferiour Passions: how then can we expect, that the most noble affections should not bee difordered? In the government of wife and children, some are vtterlie carelesse, and corrupt all by their dull conniuencie: others, by masterlierigour, hold their owne blood under condition of flauerie. To be a good Gouernour is a rare commendation; and to preferre the Weale publicke about all respects whatsoeuer, is the Verthe justly termed Heroicall. Of this Vertue, many ages affoord not many exam-40 ples. Hector is named by Aristotle, as one of them; and descruedlie, if this praise be due to extraordinarie heighth of fortitude, vsed in defence of a mans owne countrie. But if we confider, that a loue of the generall good cannot be perfect, without reference vnto the fountaine of all goodnesse: wee shall finde, that no Morall vertue. how great focuer, can, by it felfe, deferue the comemndation of more than Vertue, as the Heroicall doth. Wherefore we must fearch the Scriptures, for patterns hereof. fuch, as Danid, Iofaphat, and Iofias were. Of Christian Kings if there were many of any, by denying the praise where it is due, or by preferring a lesse excellent. But he that can finde a King, religious, and zealous in Gods cause, without enforcement 50 cither of aduer fitie, or of some regard of state; a procurer of the generall peace and quiet; who not onely vieth his authoritie, but addes the travaile of his eloquence, in admonishing his Judges to dociustice; by the vigorous influence of whose Gopernment, civilitie is infused, even into those places, that had beene the dennes of fauage Robbers and Cutthrotes; one that bath quite abolished a slauish Brehon fuch, the world would foone be happic. It is not my purpose to wrong the worth

Law, by which an whole Nation of his subjects were held in bondage; and one. whose higher vertue and wisedome doth make the prayse, not onelie of Nobilitie and other ornaments, but of abstinence from the blood, the wines, and the goods. of those that are under his power, together with a world of chiefe commendations belonging vnto some good Princes, to appeare leffe regardable: he, I say, that can finde fuch a King, findeth an example, worthie to adde vnto vertue an honourable title, if it were formerlie wanting. Vnder fuch a King, it is likelie by Gods bleffing, that a land shall flourish, with increase of Trade, in countries before vnknowen; that Civilitie and Religion shall be propagated, into barbarous and heathen countries; and that the happinesse of his subjects, shall cause the Nations farre 10 offremoued, to wish him their Souereigne. I neede not adde hercunto, that all the actions of fuch a King, cuen his bodilie exercises, doe partake of vertue: since all things tending to the preservation of his life and health, or to the mollifying of his cares, (who, fixing his contemplation vpon God, feeketh how to imitate the vnspeakeable goodnesse, rather than the inaccessible maiestie, with both of which himselfe is indued, as farre as humane nature is capable) doe also belong to the furtherance of that common good, which hee procureth. Least any man should thinke meetransported with admiration, or other affection, beyond the bonds of reason; I adde hereunto, that such a King is neuerthelesse a man must die, and may erre: vet wisedome and same shallset him free, from errour, and from death, both 20 with and without the helpe of time. One thing I may not omit, as a fingular benefite (though there be many other belides) redounding vnto this King, as the fruite of his goodnesse. The people that line under a pleasant voke, are not onelie louing to their Souereigne Lord, but free of courage, and no greater in muster of men, than of flout fighters, if neede require: whereas on the contrarie, he that ruleth as ouer flaues, shall be attended, in time of necessitie, by flauish mindes, neither louing his person, norregarding his or their owne honour. Cowards may bee furious, and flaues outragious, for a time: but among spirits that have once yeelded ynto flaueric, vniuerfallie it is found true, that Homer faith, God bereaueth a man of halfe his vertue, that day when he casteth him into bondage.

Of these things, I might perhaps more seasonablic haue spoken, in the generall discourse of Gouernment: but where so liuelie an example, of the calamitie following a tyrannicall rule, and the vse of Mercinaries, thereupon depending, did offer it felfe, as is this present businesse of the Carthaginians; I thought that the note would be more effectuall, than being barelie delivered, as out of a common place.

ò. III.

How the warre against the Mercinarie was diversife mannaged by HANNO and AMILCAR, with variable successe. The bloodie counsailes of the Mercinaries; and their finall destruction.

Eing now to returne vnto those Mercinaries, from whome I have thus farre digreffed, I cannot readilie finde, by what name henceforth I should call them. They are no longer in pay with the Carthaginian's a neither care they to pretend, that they fecke their wages alreadie due so that they are neither Mercinaries, nor Mutiners. Had they all beene subjects vnto Carthage, then might they justly have beene termed Rebels: 50 but Spendius, and others, that were the principall part of them, ought none allegeance to that State, which they endeuoured to subuert. Wherefore I will borrowethe name of their late occupation, and fill call them Mercinaries, as Polybius also doth.

These vsing the advantage of their present strength, belieged * Vtica, and Hip. * Vica is seapagreta, Cities of great importance, as being feated upon the westerne Hauen of Care tod in the thage, where it is divided by a necke of land; Hippagreta standing inwards upon the enterstowards great Lake Vitica further out vpon the Sea. Neither was the Campe at Tunes aban. Carthag, not doned, which lay filthie to hinder the Carthaginians, from palling vp into the framework. countrie: for Matho and Spendius wanted not men, to followe the warre in all of spells. As parts at once.

How the Carthaginians were amazed with this vnexpected perill, any man may Faragette conceine. But the bufineffe it selfe awakes them haltilie. They are hardly prest on ta; and by the to all fides; and therefore travailed their braines to the vttermost, how to shake off felace, God all files 3 and the state of the files and the files are the files and the files are the files and the files are the files are the files and the files are t their Generall: who failed not in his accustomed diligence of making all good pre-ismined; and paration: but had gotten together whatfocuer was needefull, as well to relieue a the place, whereon it Towne belieged, as to batter and affaile any place defended against him. With macron it these provisions, and with an hundred Elephants, he came to Viica; so suddenlie called Magathat the enemies, as men furprifed, for fooke their Trenches, and retired them telnes the very angients. vnto arifing peece of woody ground, where they might be fafe against the violence and bring beof his beafts. Hanno, thinking that he had to doe with Numidians, whose custome factoring factor 20 was, after any loffe, to flie two or three whole daies journie off; prefently entred the inflorated Towne; to shew himselfe, after this his victory. But these good fellowes, against beforecartlage whom he was to warre, had learned of Amilear, to retire and to fight againe, many was fet vp; times in one day, as neede required. Therefore as foone as they perceived, that he carding was knewe not how to vie a victorie; they affailed their owne Campe, and with great throwne down flaughter, draue the Carthaginians out of it sforcing them to hide themselves with in the shield inin Vica ; and got possession of all the store, that Hanno had brought for the reliefe milk Warre, Vaof the Towne. This bad beginning Hanno followed with sutcable indiscretion: mous it was the loofing the benefite of many faire opportunities, and fuffering the enemies to take cate the your poffession, of all the entrance from Carthage to the firme land.

For belides other places of aduantage that the Mercenaries who lived all had occupied, Hanno had suffered them to winne the onely Bridge, by which the the time of River Macar, or Bagradus, was passable vnto these, that were to travaile into the that Tyrant, Continent. This River had not many foords, nor thole calle for a fingle man to get ten the fory ouer: but vpon them all was kept fuch guard, as gaue to Amilear little hope of pre-of his crueluailing in feeking way by force. As for the Bridge it felfe, Matho & his followers were ties. 40 there lodged: and had there built a Towne, wherein to lie commodiously, intentiue onely to the custodic thereof. But Amilear had observed, that the very mouth of Bagradas y fed to be sometimes cloyed with sand and grauell, that was driven in by certaine customarie windes, and could not be driven out againe, by force of that flow River, till the wind falling, or changing, suffered the weight of the waters, to disburden their channell. Hereof he made vie; and taking his opportunitie, passed

Citizens. There was no neede to bid Spendius looke about him, when once it was heard, that Amilear was come over Bagradas: all the Mercenaries were troubled with the 50 newes; knowing that they were no longer to deale with the improvident grantie of Hanno, but with an able spirit, euen with their owne Master in the Art of Warre, whome they admired, though they hated him. But this feare was foone changed into prefumption; when more than fifteene thousand of their owne societie, were come from Vica; and other tenne thouland from the gard of the Bridge. Their

Armie was farregreater, than that of Amilear; and they were, in their owne judgement, the better men, your which confidence, they refolged to charge him on all fides, and beate him downe, in despight of his worth and reputation. With this resolution they attended upon him; watching for some advantage; and still exhorting one another to play the men, and give the onfet. Especiallie they that followed him in the Rere, had a great minde to begin the fight; whereunto their promptnesse was such, as tooke from them their former circumspection. Amilear held his way towards the Bridge, keeping himfelfe on plaine grounds, that were fitteft for the seruice of his Elephants, which hee placed in front of his Armic. Neither made hee showe of any defire to fight, but suffered the rashnesse of his enemies to increase, 10 till it should breake into some disorder. At length perceiving, that with more boldneffe than good heed, they followed him so neare, as would bee little for their good, if hee should turne upon them, he hastened his march, even to such a pace, as made a thewe little differing from plaine flight. The Mercinaries presentlie fell vpon his skirts; beleeuing, that for feare of them he was readie to runne away-But whilest they confusedly, as in sudden opinion of victorie, were driving at the heeles of those that had the Reare; Amilear wheeled about, and met them in the face, charging them hotely, but in very good order, fo that amazed with the apprehension of inexpected danger, they fled without making any resistance. In this ouerthrowe, there were fix thousand of the Mercinaries slaine, and about two 20 thousand taken; the rest fled some to the Campe at Vica; others to the Towne at the Bridge; whither Amilear followed them fo fast, that he wanne the place eafilv: the enemies being thence also fled vnto Tunes, as not having recollected their spirits to make it good.

The fame of this victorie, together with the diligence of Amilear in pursuing it. caused many Townes revolted, partly by feare, partly by force, to returne to their former obedience. Yet was not Matho wanting to himselfe, in this dangerous time. He sent about Numidia and Africk, for new supplies; admonishing the people, now or never to doe their best, for the recoverie of their freedome; hee per-Iwaded Spendius, and Autaritus that was Captaine of the Gaules, to wait vpon Amil- 20 ear, and alwaies to keepe the higher grounds, or at least the foot of some hill, where they might be fafe from the Elephants; and hee himfelfe continued to preffethe Towne of Hippagreta with an hard fiege. It was necessarie for Amilear, in passing from place to place, as his bulinesse required, to take such waies as there were: for all the countrie lay not levell. Therefore Spendius, who still coasted him, had once gotten a notable aduantage of ground: the Carthaginians lying in a Plaine, furrounded with hilles, that were occupied by the Mercinaries, with their Numidian and African succours. In this difficultie; the same of Amilear his personall worth did greatly benefit his countrie. For Naranafus, a yong gentleman commanding over the Namidians, was glad of this occasion feruing to get the acquaintance & 40 loue of fo braue a man, which he much defired : and therefore came vnto Amilear, fignifying his good affection to him, with offer to doe him all feruice. Amilear joyfully entertained this friend; promifed vnto him his owne daughter in marriage; and so wanne from the enemies two thousand horse, that following Narauasus turned vnto the Carthaginians side. With this helpe hee gaue battaile vnto Spendius: wherein the Numidian laboured to apprough is owne valour, to his new friend. So the victoria was great: for there were flaine ten thousand of Spendius his fellowes. and foure thousand taken prisoners, but Spendius himselfe, with Autoritus the Gaule, escaped to doe more mischiefe. Amilear dealt very gently with his prisoners: pardoning all offences past, and dismissing as many, as were viwilling to become 50 his followers; yet with condition, that they should never more beare armes against the Carthaginians; threatning to take sharpe reuenge vpon all, that should breake this Coucnant.

This humanitie was vehemently suspected by Matho, Spendius, and Autaritus, as

CHAP.2. S.2. tending to winne from them, the hearts of their fouldiers. Wherefore they refolued to take such order, that not a man among them should dare, to trust in the good nature of Amilear, nor to hope for any fafetie, whilest Carthage was able to doe him hurt. They counterfeited letters of aduertifement, wherein was contained, that fome of their companie, respective onely of their private benefit, and carclesse of the generall good, had a purpose to betraie them all vnto the Carthaginians, with whom they held intelligence; and that it was needfull, to looke well vnto Geles, and his companions, whom these traitours had a purpose to enlarge. Vpon this Theme Spendius makes an Oration to the fouldiours, exhorting them to fidelitie; 10 and the wing with many words, that the feeming humanitic of Amilear, toward fome, was none other then a baite, wherewith to entrap them all at once together; as also telling them. what a dangerous enemie Geleo would prooue, if hee might escape their hands. While hee is yet in the midst of histale; were lettets come, to the same purpose. Then steps forth Autaritus, and speakes his minde plainly: faving, that it were the best, year the onely way, for the common safetie, to cut off all hope of reconciliation with Carthage; that if some were divising to make their owne peace, it would goe hard with those, that had a care of the warre; that it were better to make an end of Ge/co his life, than to trouble themselues with looking to his custodie: that by such a course energe one should be ingaged in the pre-20 Sent Action, as having noncother hope left, than in victorie alone; finally, that fuch as would speake here-against, were worthie to bee reputed Traitours. This Autaritus was in great credit with the fouldiours, and could speake fundrie languages, in such fort that he was understood by all. According to his motion therefore it was agreed that Gelea, and all the other prisoners, should forthwith be put to horrible death, by torments. Neuertheleffe there were some, that for lone of Geles. fought to alter this intended crueltie; but they were forthwith stoned to death, as a Document vnto others; and so the Decree was put in execution. Neither were they herewithall contented; but further ordained, that all Carthaginian prisoners which they tooke, should be serued in like fort: and that the subjects or friends of 30 Carthage, should loofe their hands, and so be sent home: which rule they observed

Of this crueltie I need fay no more, then that it was most execrable feritie. As for the counfaile of vling it, it was like vnto the counfaile of ACHILOPHEL; All Ifrael shall heave, that thou art abhorred of thy father; then shall the hands of all that are with thee, be flrong. Such are the fruits of desperation. He that is past all hope of pardon, is afraid of his owne fellowes, if they bee more innocent; and to avoide the punishment of leffe offences, committeth greater. The cowardize of offenders, and the revengefull spirits of those that have beene wronged, are breeders of this desperation: to which may be added, some deficiencie of Lawes, in distinguishing the pu-40 nilhments of malefactors, according to their decree of the feueral crimes. A coward thinkes all prouision too little, for his owne securitie. If PHOCAS be a coward saide the Emperour MAVRITIVS) then is he murderous. To be stedfast and sure, in taking revenge: is thought a point of honour, and a defensative against new injuries. But wrongfully: for it is opolite to the rule of Christianitie; and such a qualitie disconcred, makes them deadly enemics, who otherwise would have repented, and fought to make amends, for the wrong done in passion. This was it, which wrought fo much woe to the Carthaginians; teaching Matho, and his Africans, to suspect cuen their gentlenesse, as the introduction to extreame rigour. Like vnto the errours of Princes and Gouernours, are the errours of Lawes. Where one and the same 50 punishment, is a warded vnto the leffe offence, and vnto the greater, be that hath aduentured to robbe a man, is eafily tempted to kill him, for his owne securitie,

Against these inconveniences, Mercie and Severitie, vsed with due respect, are the best remedies. In neither of which Amilear failed. For as long as these his own fouldiours were any way likely to bee reclaimed, by gentle courses; his humanitie Kkkkk 2 was readic to inuite them. But when they were transported with beastly outrage, beyond all regard of honestic and shame, he rewarded their villanie with answerable vengeance; casting them vnto wilde beasts, to be denoured:

Vntill this time Hanne, with the Armie under his command, had kept himselfe apart from Indian; and done little, as may feeme, for that nothing is remembered of him, finech his late losses. Neither was Amilear forsted want his helpe; as being able to doe better without him. But when the warre growe to such extremitie, as threatned vtter ruine to the one or the other side: then was Hanne sent for, and came to Amilear, with whom hee ioyned his forces. By this accesse of firength Indian was not enabled, to doe more than in former times: rather he could now persone onthings, such was the hartered betweene him and his wovorthic Colleague. The Townessof Visea and slippagrets, that had stood alwaies firme on the Carthaginian partie, did now reuole vino the enemie, murdering all the solidiours that they had in Garrison, and cashing their bodies forth, without suffering them to be buried. The proutsons brought by sea, for maintenance of the Armie, were sold in solue weather: and Carthage it selfes tood in danger of being be sleeged, about which Matho and Spendum consulted, whilst one of the Carthaginian Generals did (as it were) binde the others hands.

It hath in all Ages beene vsed, as the fafest course, to send forth in great Expeditions, two Generals of one Armie. This was the common practife of those two 20 mightie Cities, Athens and Rome; which other States and Princes have often imitated; perswading themselues, that great Armies are not so well conducted by one, as by two: who out of emulation to excell each other, will vie the greater diligence. They have also iouned two chiefe Commanders in equal commission, upon this further confideration; the better to restraine the ambition of any one, that should be trusted with so great a strength. For hereofall Common-weales have beene iealous, having beene taught by their examples, that have made themselves Tyrants ouer those Cities and States that have imployed them. In this point, the Venetians have beene so circumspect, as they have, for the most part, trusted strangers, and not their owne, in all the warres which they have made. It is true, that the equal 30 authoritie of two commanding in chiefe, ferueth well to bridle the ambition of one or both, from turning vpon the Prince or State that hath given them trust:but in mannaging the warre it felfe, it is commonly the cause of ill successe. In warres made neare vitto Rome it selfe, when two good friends were Confuls, or such two at least, as concurred in one desire of Triumph, which honor the greatest of any that Rome could gine) was to be obtained by that one yeeres feruice; it is no meruaile. though each of the Confuls did his best, and referred all his thoughts vnto none other end than victorie. Yet in all dangerous cases, when the Confuls proceeded otherwise than was desired, one Dictator was appointed, whose power was neither hindered by any partner, nor by any great limitation. Neither was it indeed 40 the manner, to fend forth both the Confuls to one warre; but each went, whither his lot called him, to his owne Prouince; vnleffe one businesse seemed to require them both, and they also seemed fit to be joyned in the administration. Now although it was fo, that the Romans did many times preuaile with their joynt Generals: yet was this neuer or feldome, without as much concord, as any other vertue of the Commanders. For their modestie hath often beene such, that the leffe able Captaine, though of equal authoritie, hath willingly submitted himselfe to the other, and obeyed his directions. This notwithstanding, they have many times, by ordaining two Commaunders of one Armie, received great and most daungerous ouerthrowes; whereof in the second Punick warre wee shall finde examples. 50 On the contrarie side, in their warres most remote, that were alwayes managed by one, they seldome failed to winne exceeding honour, as hereafter shall appeare. Now of those tenne Generals, which served the Athenians at the Battaile of Marathon, it may truly be faid, that had not their temper beene better, than the judgment of the people that sent them forth, and had not they submitted themselves to the conduction of Miltiades; their affaires had found the same successe which they found at other times, when they coupled Nicias and Alcibiades together in Sicil: the one being so ouer-warie, and the other so hastic, as all came to nought that they undertooke; whereas Cimon alone, as also Ariftedes, and others, having sole charge of all, did their Countrie and Common-weale most remarkeable service. For it is hard to finde two great Captaines, of equall discretion and valour; but that the one hath more of furie than of judgement, and fo the contrarie, by which the best occasions are as often ouerslipt, as at other times many actions are vnseasonably 10 vndertaken. I remember it well, that when the Prince of Condy was flaine after the Battaile of Iarnac, (which Prince, together with the Admirall Chastillon, had the conduct of the Protestant Armie) the Protestants did greatly bewaile the losse of the faid Prince, in respect of his Religion, person, and birth; yet comforting themsclues, they thought it rather an advancement, than an hinderance to their affaires. For so much did the valour of the one, outreach the adussednesse of the other, as whatfocuer the Admirall intended to winne by attending the aduantage, the Prince aduentured to loofe, by beeing ouer-confident in his owne courage.

But we need no better example, than of the Carthaginians in this prefent bufines: who, though they were fill licke of their ill grounded loue to Hanne, and were viacy willing to difgrace him yet feeing that all ranne towards ruine, through the difcord of the Generals, committed the decifion of their controueries, who the Armie that ferued vnder them. The indgement of the Armiewas, that Hanne flould depart the Camprewhich he did, and Hannida was fent in his flead, one that would be directed by Amilear; and that was enough.

After this, the affaires of Carthage began to profiper somewhat better. Matho and Spendius had brought their Armie neare vnto the Citie; and lay before it, as in a siege. They might well be bold, to hope and aduenture much; having in their Campe aboue shittie thousand, besides those that lay abroad in Garrisons. Neuerthelesse, the Citie was too strong for them to winne by assault: and the entrance of victualies they could not hinder, if any should bee sent in by strends from

Histon, King of Syracufe, though during the warres in Sicil he affifted the Remans, and fill continued in their Alliance, yet now fent fuccours to the Carthaginiums: fearing their fall, and confequently his owne; because if in on their State game the Romans formewhat to trouble their diffection, the Principalitie of Syracufe would foone be deuoured by them. The Romansalfo gaue them fomellender affifiance, and for the prefent refufed good offers made with the the Whercinaries. This they did, to show a kinde of noble difposition; which was indeed but counterfeit, as the fequele manifestly proued, Whilest Matho and his followers were busily pressing the Citic, Amilear was as diligent, in waiting at their backes, and cutting off all that came to their supply : so that finding themselves more straightly beseiged by him, than Carthage was by them, they purposed to desist from their vaine attempt, and try some other course. Hercupon they iffue into the field: where Spendius, and one Zareas an African Captaine affifting the rebellion, take vpon them to finde Amilear worke; leaving Matho in Tunis, to negotiate with their friends, and take a generall care of the bufinesse. The Elephants of Carthage, and horse of Narauasus, made Spendius fearefull to descend into the Plaines. Wherefore hee betooke himselfe to his former method of warre; keeping the mountaines, and rough grounds, or occupying the 50 straightest passages, wherein the desperate courage of his men might shew it selfe, with little disaduantage. But Amilear had more skill in this Art, than could bee matched by the labour of Spendius. Hee drew the enemie to many skirmishes; in all which the successe was such, as added courage to his owne men, and abated the ftrength and spirit of the Rebels. Thus he continued, prouoking them night and

CHAP.2. S.2 day: still intrapping some of them, and sometimes giving them the overthrow in plaine battaile: vntill at length he got them into a straight, whence ere they should get out, he meant to take of them a good account. Their judgement was enough, to perceive their owne disaduantage: and therefore they had the lesse stomach to fight; but awaited for helpe from Tunis. Amilear prudently foreseeing, that necessitie might teach them to dare impossibilities, vsed the benefit of their present feare, and shut them close vp with Trench and Rampart. There they waited miferably for fuccour, that came not: and having spent all their victuailes, were so pinched with hunger, that they fed vpon the bodies of their prisoners. This they fuffered patiently, as knowing that they had not deferued any fauour from Cartha-10 ge; and hoping, that their friends at Tunis would not be vnmindfull of them. But when they were driven to such extremitie, that they were faine to denoure their owne companions, and yet faw none appearance or likelihood of reliefe: their obstinacie was broken; and they threatned their Captaines with what they had deserued, vnlesse they would goe foorth to Amilear, and seeke such peace as might begotten. So Spendius, Zarxas, and Autaritus, fell to consultation, wherein it was refolued, to obey the multitude, and yeeld themselues, if it were so required, vnto the death, rather than to perish by the hands of their owne companions. Hereupon they fend to craue parle, which is granted; and these three come forth to talke with Amilear in person. What they could say vnto him, it is hard to coniecture: yet 20 by the conditions which Amilear granted, it feemes that they tooke the blame vpon themselves, and craved pardon for the multitude. The conditions were, that the Carthaeimans should choose, out of the whole number of these enemies, any ten whom they pleased, to remaine at their discretion; and that the rest should all be dismissed, each in his shirt, or in one single coate. When the peace was thus concluded; Amilear told these Ringleaders, that he choose them presently, as part of the ten, and so commanded to lay hands on them: the rest hee forthwith went to fetch, with his whole Armie in order. The Rebels, who knew not that peace was concluded vpon fo gentle articles, thought themselues betraied: and therefore amazedly ranne to armes. But they wanted Captaines to order them; and the fame 30 astonishment, that made them breake the Couenants of peace, whereof they were ignorant, gaue vnto Amilear both colour of inflice, in accomplishing reuenge, and ease in doing the execution. They were all flaine: being fortic thousand, or more, in number.

This was a famous exploit: and the newes thereof, exceeding welcome to Carthage; and terrible to the revolted Cities of Africk. Henceforward Amilear, with his Narauafus and Hannibal, carried the warre from Towneto Towne, and found all places readie to yeelde: Viica, and Hippagreta, onely standing ont, vpon seare of deserved vengeance; and Tunes, being held by Matho, with the remainder of his Armie. It was thought fit to begin with Tunis, wherein lay the chiefestrength of 40 the enemie. Comming before this Towne, they brought forth Spendius, with his fellowes, in view of the defendants, and crucified them under the walles; to terrifie those of his olde companions, that were still in armes. With this rigour the seige began; as if speedie victorie had beene assured. Hannibal quartered on that part of Tunis which lay towards Carthage; Amilear on the opposite side: too farreafunder to helpe one another in fudden accidents; and therefore it behoued each, to be the more circumfpect.

Matho from the walles beheld his owne destinie, in the miseric of his companion, and knew not how to avoide it otherwise, than by a cast at dice with fortune. So he brake out vpon that part of the Carthaginian Armie, that lay fecure, as if all 50 danger were past, vnder the command of Hannibal: and with so great and vnexpected furie he fallied, that after an exceeding flaughter, he tooke Hannibal prisoner; on whom, and thirtie the most noble of the Carthagian prisoners, he presently reuenged the death of Spendius by the farne torture. Of this Amilear knew nothing till it was too late; neither had he strength enough remaining, after this great losse. to continue the feige; but was faine to breake it vp, and remoue vnto the mouth of the River Bagradas, where he incamped.

The terrour was no lefle within Carthage, vpon the fame of this loffe; than had beene the joy of the late great victorie. All that could beare armes, were sent into the field, vnder Hanno; whom, it feemes, they thought the most able of their Captaines surmining the late accidents of Warre. If there were any Law among them, forbidding the imployment of one fole Generall, neare vnto their Citie (for they are knowne to have trusted one man abroad) the time did not permit, in this hastie exigent, to deuiseabout repealing it. But thirtie principall men are chosen by the Senate, to bring Hanno to Amilears campe, and by all good perswasions to reconcile them. This could not be effected in one day. It nearly touched Amilear in his honour, that the carelesnesse of Hannibal seemed to be imputed vnto him, by sending his enemic to moderate his proceedings. Neuertheleffe after many conferences, the authoritie of the Senatours prevailed; Amilear and Hanno were made friends; and thenceforth, whilest this warre lasted, Hanno tooke warning by Hannibals calamities, to followe good directions, though afterwards hee returned to his old and Lin. Dec. 3.1.1.

deadly hatred. In the meane season Matho was come abroad; as meaning to vie the reputation of his late successe, whilest it gaue some life vnto his businesse. He had reason to doe as he did: but he wanted skill to deale with Amilear. The skirmishes, and light exercises of warre, wherein Amilear trained his Carthaginians, did so farre abate the firength, and withall diminish the credit of Matho, that he resolued to trie the fortune of one battaile: wherein either his desires should be accomplished, or his cares ended. To this conclusion the Carthaginians were no lesse prone, than Matho: as being wearie of these long troubles, and insupportable expences; consident in the valour of their owne men, which had approued it felfe in many trials; and well affured of Amilear his great worth, whereunto the enemie had not what to oppose. According to this determination, each part was diligent in making prouision: inui-30 ting their friends to helpe; and drawing foorth into the fielde, all that lay in

The iffue of this Battaile might have beene foretold, without helpe of witchchraft. Matho, and his followers, had nothing whereon to prefume, faue their daring spirits, which had beene well cooled by the many late skirmishes, wherein they had learned how to runne away. The Carthaginians had reason to dare, as hauing often beene victorious: and in all points else they had the better of their enemies; especially (which is worth all the rest) they had such a commander, as was not casily to be matched in that Age. Neither was it likely, that the desire of libertie should worke so much, in men accustomed to seruitude; as the honour of their 40 State would, in Citizens, whose future and present good lay all at once ingaged in that aduenture. So the Carthaginians wanne a great victorie, wherein most of the Africans their enemies were flaine; the rest fled into a Towne, which was not to be defended, and therefore they all yeelded; and Matho himselfe was taken alive. Immediatly upon this victorie, all the Africans that had rebelled, made submission to their old masters: Vica onely, and Hippagreta stood out, as knowing how little they descrued of fauour. But they were soone forced to take what conditions best pleafed the victours. Matho and his fellowes were led to Carthage in triumph; where they suffered all torments that could be deuised, in recompence of the mischieses which they had wrought in this warre. The warre had lasted three yeeres, and a-50 bout foure moneths, when it came to this good end : which the Cathaginians, whose subjects did not love them, should with leffe expence, by contenting their Mercinaries, have prevented in the beginning.

How the Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, that were in Sardinia, rebelled: and were afterwards drinemous by the Ilanders. The faithlesse dealing of the Romans with the Carthaginians, in taking from them Sardinia. contrarie to the peace.

Hilest Mathoand Spendius were making this terrible combustion in Africk; other Mercenaries of the Carthaginians had kindled the like fire 19 in Sardinia: where murdering Bostar the Gouernour, and other Carthaginians, they were in hope to get, and hold that Iland to their own

vse. Against these one Hanno was sent with a small Armie, (such as could be spared in that busic time) consisting likewise of Mercenaries, leuied on the fudden. But these companions that followed Hanno, finding it more for their safetie, and present prosit, to iowne themselues with those that were alreadie renolted, than to indanger themselves by battaile, for the good of that commonweale, of which they had no care; began to enter into practife with the Sardinian Rebels; offering to runne one course of fortune with them in their enterprise. This their offer was kindly taken; but their faith was suspected. Wherefore, to take away 20 all icalousseand distrust, they resolved to hang vp their Commander Hanno, and performed it. A common practife it hath beene in all Ages, with those that have vndertaken the quarrell of an vniust warre, to enjoyne the performance of some notorious and villamous act, to those that come into them as seconds, with offerto partake, and to affift the impious purposes which they have in hand. It is indeed the best pawne, that desperate men can deliuer to each other, to performe some fuch Actions, as are equally unpardonable to all.

By such a kind of crueltie did the engratefull Mantineurs murder a Garrison of Achaians, fint vnto them for their defence against the Lacedamonians, by Aratus; who, when hee had formerly possess himselfe of their Citie, by right of warre, did 30 not onely spare the sacke and spoile thereof, but gaue them equal sreedome with the rest of the Cities vnited. These Renolis are also common in our Court-warres, where, in the conquelts of newe fortunes, and making of newe parties, and factions, without the depression or destruction of oldestricads, we cannot be receiued and trufted by old enemics. Cefont les conps de vicille eferime. Thefe, (fay the

These Mercinaries in Sardinia were no whit lesseviolent in their purpose, than were Spendiue, and his affociates: onely they wanted a Methoamong them, to negotiate with the inhabitants of the Prouince. The Ilanders were no leffe glad, than the fouldiours, that the Carthaginians were expelled the Countrie : but they 49 could not agree about the profit of the victorie. The Surdinians thought that it was enough, if they rewarded the fouldiours for their paines taken. Contrariwife, the fouldiours were of epinion, that the title of the Carthaginians to that Ile, was devolved vnto themselves, by right of conquest. The same quarrell would (in likelihood) have rifen, betweene Spendius with his Mercenaries, and their African friends; if the common defire of both had once taken effect; vilesse the riches of Carthage, had ferued to content them all. But in Sardinia, where there was none other valuable reward, than possession and rule of the Countries the matter was not eafily taken vp. So they fell to blowes, which how they were dealt I know not; but finally, the Mercenaries were driuen out, and compelled to fauethemfelues in 114-50 ite. Before their departure out of Sardinia, they had inuited the Romans into it; with as good right, as the Mamertines had called them into Sicil. Yet this offer was refufed, vpon reasons that follow.

the Carthaginians tooke almost fine hundred, and held them in prison. Hereof was made a great complaint: so that the Romans sent Embassadours to Carthage, requiring satisfaction. It was no time for the Carthaginians to dispute: they quietly yeelded to release them all. This was so kindly taken, that they forbad all their Merchants, to trade thenceforth with the Rebels; admonishing them to carrie all prouisions to Carthage. And vpon the same reason, did they for beare to meddle with Sardinia, or to accept the Citie of Vica, offering it felle vnto their subjection. This might have ferued, as a notable example of the Roman faith, to all posseritie: had not the iffue proued, that it was meere regard of greater profit, which kept them fo temperate, no longer than the hope lasted of thriuing better thereby, than they should have done by open breach of faith. The whole estate of Carthage depended, at that time, vpon the vertue of Amilear: who had he beene ouerthrown by Spendius or Mathe, in one maine battaile, that mightie Citie must either haue fallen into thebarbarous hands of merciles villaines, or have humbled her felfe vnder protection of the Romans, with whom shee had lately striuen for superioritie. That extreame necessitie, whereinto Matho reduced the Citie, by the fortune of one fallie made out of Tunis, is enough to proue, that Carthage was not farre from fuch a miserable choice. Wherefore it was not wisely done of the Romans, to make such demonstration of kindnesse, and honourable dealing, as might invite a rich, but 20 finking shippe, to runne her selfe aground vpon their shore. But when all was well ended in Africk, and the Carthaginians began to prepaire for the recourse of Sarainia: then did Ambition put off her goodly vizour. The Romans perceiuing that Carthage, beyond their hope, had recovered her feete againe; began to strike at her head. They entertained the proffer of those Mercinaries, that were fled out of Sardinia; and they denounced warre against this enfeebled and impouerished Citic, under a shamelesse pretence, that the preparations made for SARDINIA, were made indeed against Rome it felfe. The Carthaginians knew themselves vnable to relift; and therefore yeelded to the Romans demand; renouncing vnto them all their right in Sardinia. But this was not enough. They would have twelve hundred talents, in re-20 compence belike (for I fee not what reason they could alleage) of the great feare which they had endured, of an inualion from Carthage. It is indeed plaine, that they impudently fought occasion of warre. But necessitie taught the Carthaginians patience; and the monic was paied, how hardly focuer it was raised. From this time forward, let not Rome complaine of the Punick faith, in breach of Couenants: she her selfe hath broken the peace alreadie; which Amilear purposeth to make her dearely repent; but what Amilear lives not to performe, shall bee accomplished by Hannibal his renouned sonne.

How the affaires of Carthage went betweene the African Rebellion, and the lecond Punicke Warre.

He injurious dealing of the Romans, expressing their delire to picke a quarrell; ferued to infrust the Carthaginian in a necessarie lesson.
That either they must make themselues the stronger, or else resolution to be obedient with other than the terms are more mightie. In a Citic long accustomed to rule, the brauer determination easilie tooke place: and the best meanes were thought vpon, for the increase of puissance and Empire. The 50 strength, and the icalousie of the Romans, forbade all attempts vpon the Mediterran seas; but the riches of Spaine, that lay vpon the Ocean, were vnknowen to Rome: wherefore that Prouince might serue, both to exercise the Carthaginians in warre, and to repaire their decaied forces, with all needfull supplies. Of this Spanish Expedition, the charge and soueraigne trust was committed vnto Amilear: vpon

Hanne, with fome other envious men, that were of his faction, tooke little pleafure in the generall loue and honour, which daily increased towards Amilear and his friends. Yet could they not denie him to bee the most worthic of command in all the Citie: onely they commended peace and quietneffe; aduifing men to beware of prouoking the Romans, in whose amitte they faid, that the felicitic of Carthage did contift. By such discourses, harsh to the cares of good Citizens, who had feeling of the wrong done to their Commonweale; they got none other reputation, than of fingularitie; which the ignorant fort suspected to be wisedome.

But the glorie of Amilear was continually vpheld and enlarged, by many notable feruices that he did, to the fingular benefit of his Countrie. He passed the Streights of Hercules, (now called the Streights of Gibraltar) and landed on the westerne coast of Spaine; in which Countrie, during nine yeares that he liued there, he subjected vnto the State of Carthage the better part of all those Provinces. But finally, in a battaile that he fought with a Nation in Portugale, called the Vettones, (defending himselfe a long time with an admirable resolution) hee was inuironed and slaine: carrying with him to the grave the same great honour and same, by which in many fignall victories, he had aquired the name of a fecond Mars.

After the death of Amilear; Asárubal his sonne in law was made Generall of the 20 Carthaginian forces in Spaine. This was a good man of warre; but farre better in practife and cunning, than in deedes of armes. By his notable dexteritie in matter of negotiation, he greatly enlarged the Dominion of Carthage: adding fo many fubices and confederates thereunto, that the Romans began to groweicalous againe of this hastie increase. He built a goodly Citie, vpon a commodious Hauen, in the Kingdome of Granado, opposite to that of Oranin Africa, and gaue it the name of New Carthage, which to this day it nearely retaineth, being called now * Carthagena. With this fuccessed of the Carthaginians in Spaine, the Reman were not a lit-tle troubled; but begin to cause their owne negligence. For whereas they had formerly taken so much paines to beate them out of the Ile of sieil, as suspecting their 20 neighbourhood there; they had now, by cumbring themselues in a warre of farre lesse importance, (whereof I shall speake anone) given them leysure, without interruption, to recouer vpon their owne Continent, a Dominion by farre exceeding, both in the bodies of men and in revenue, that which the Romans had taken from them. But how to helpe this, at the present they knew not; for they daily expected to be invaded by the Gaules, their ancient enemies, and nearest neighbours to the West. But hee needeth little helpe of force, that knoweth himselfe to bee feared : it is enough if hee request; fince his request shall have the vertue of a

Yet were the Romans etterly destitute of all good colour; that might helpe them 40 to intermeddle in Spaine. The Spaniards were then vnacquained with Rome, whereof (in probabilitic) they scarce had heard the name : so that there were no Mamertines, nor other such Rebels, to call in Roman succours. But in the enterprise of Sardinia, the Romans had learned an impudent pretence, that might also serue their turne in Spaine. For though it were apparent, that the Spanish affaires had no relation to the peace between these two Cities; and though it were nothing likely, that Asdrubal had any purpole, to extend his victories vnto the gates of Rome, or to any of the Roman frontiers: yet (as if some such matter had beene suspected) they sent vnto him, requiring that hee should forbeare to proceed any further, than to the Riuer of Iberus. In addressing their messengers, rather to Astrabal, than to the Citic 50 of Carthage; they seeme to have hoped, that howsoever the generalitie of the Carthaginians had sweetly swallowed many bitter pilles, to avoide all occasion of warre with Rome: yet the brauerie of one man might proue more fastidious, and, refenting the iniurie, returne such answere, as would intangle his whole Countrie in the quarrell, that they fo much defired; and might embrace at leafure, when once they had found apparent cause. But Astrubal tinely deluded their expectation. He pretended no manner of diflike at all: and, whereas they would have this infolent couenant inferted into the articles of peace; he tooke vpon him to doc it, of his owne power, with fuch appearance of conformitie to their will, that they went their waves contented and fought no further.

If it had beene fo, that the State of Carthage, thereunto preffed by the Romans, for feare of prefent warre, had ratified this new composition made by Aldrubal: yet should it not have stood bound in honour, to observe the same carefully, valesse an oath had also beene extorted, to make all fure. But fince all passed quietly, vnder the bare authoritie of A/drubal; this Capitulation was none other in effect, than a fecond breach of peace; whereof the Romans might be accused more justly, than they could accuse the Carthaginians of periurie, (as they after did) for refusing

By this Treatie with Afarubal, the Romans wanne some reputation in Spaine. For when it was once conceived by the Spaniards, that the Citie which would needes be mistresse over them, stood in feare her selfe, of receiping blowes from a stouter Dame: there were foone found fome, that by offering themselves to the protection of Rome, became (as they thought) fellow-feruants with Carthage. But the Car-20 thaginians will shortly teach them another lesson. The Saguntines, a people on the South fide of therus, entred into confederacie with the Romans, and were gladly accepted. Surely it was lawfull vnto the Romans, to admit the Saguntines, or any other people (neither subject, nor open enemic in warre to the Carthaginians) into their focietie; and vnlawfull it was vnto the Carthaginians, to vie violence towards any that should thus once become confederate with Rome. Neverthelesse, if wee confider the late agreement made with Afdrubal; wee shall finde that the Romans could have none other honest colour of requiring it, than an implicit couenant of making the River Iberus a bound, over which they themselves would not passe, in any Discouerie or Conquest by them intended to bee made upon Spaine: in which 20 regard, they might have some honest pretence to require the like of the Carthaginians ; though Rome as yet had no foote, on the one fide of Iberus, whereas Carthage, on the other fide of that River, held almost all the Countrie. Howsoever it were; this indignitie was not To easily digested, as former injuries had beene. For it was a matter of ill consequence, that the Nations which had heard of no greater power than the Carthaginian, should behold Saguntum resting securely among them, vpon confidence of helpe from a more mightie Citie. Wherefore either in this respect; or for that the sense is most feeling of the latest injuries; or rather for that now the Carthaginians were of power to doe themselves right: warre against Saguntum was generally thought vpon, let the Romans take it how they lift. In fuch 40 termes were the Carthaginians, when Afdrubal died, after hee had commanded in Spaine eight yeeres: (being flaine by a flaue, whose master hee had put to death) and the Great Hannibal, sonne of the Great Amilear, was chosen Generall in his

The estate of Greece from the death of PYRRHVS, to the raigne of PHILIP the Conne of DEMETRIVS

N the long terme of the first Punick warre, and the vacation following. betweene it and the fecond; the effate of Greece, after the death of Pyrrhus, was growne fomewhat like vnto that, wherein Philip of Maceden had found it; though farre weaker, as in an after-spring. The ro whole countrie had recourred, by degrees, a forme of libertie: the pettie tyrannies (bred of those inferiour Captaines, which in the times of generall combustion, had seised each upon such Townes as he could get) were, by force or accident, extirpated and reformed; and some States were risen to such greatnesse. asnot onely served to defend themselves, but to give protection to others. This conversion to the better, proceeded from the like diffensions and tumults in Macedon, as had beene in Greece, when Philip first began to incroch vpon it. For after many quarrels and great warres, about the Kingdome of Macedon, betweene Antigonus the elder, Caffander, Demetrius, Lyfimachus, Seleucus, Pyrrhus, and the Gaules: Antigonus, the sonne of Demetrius, finally got and held it, reigning fixe and thirtie 20 yeeres; yet fo, that hee was diners times thence expelled, not onely by the Gaules. and by Pyrrhus, as hath beene alreadie shewed, but by Alexander the sonne of Pyrrhus the Epirot, from whose father he had hardly wonne it. This happened vnto him by the repolt of his fouldiours, even at fuch time, as having overthrowne with great flaughter an Armie of the Gaules, hee was converting his forces against the Athenians, whom hee compelled to receive his Garrisons. But his yong sonne Demetrius raised an Armie; wherewith he chaced Alexander, not onely out of Man cedon, but out of his owne Epirus, and restored his father to the Kingdome.

By the helpe of this yong Prince Demetrius (though in another kinde) Antigonus got into his possession the Citadell of Corinth; which was justly termed the fetter of 20 Greece. The Citadell called Acrocorinthus, flood upon a fleep rockie hill on the North fide of the towne; and was by nature and art fo ftrong, that it feemed impregnable. It commanded the towne; which was of much importance, as occupying the whole breadth of the Isthmus, that running betweene the Agean and Jonique Seas, joyneth Peloponne fus to the Maine of Greece. Wherefore he that held poffession of this Castle, was able to cut off all passage by land, from one halfe of Greece vnto the other; befides the commoditie of the two Seas, vpon both of which, this rich and goodly Citie had commodious hauens. Alexander, the fonne of Polysperchon; and after his death, Cratesipolis his wife, had gotten Corinth in the great shuffling of Prouinces and Townes, that was made betweene Alexanders Prifices. Afterwards it paf- 40 sed from hand to hand, vntill it came, I know not how, to one Alexander; of whom I finde nothing elfe, than that he was thought to bee poisoned by this Antigonus. who deceived his wife Nicea thereof, and got it from her by a tricke. The device was this. Antigonus fent his yong Demetrius to Corinth, willing him to court Niced. and sceke her marrage. The foolish olde widdowe perceived not how vnfit a match she was for the yong Prince, but entertained the fancie of marriage; whereto the old King was even as readie to confent, as was his sonne to defire it, and came this rher in person to solemnize it. Hereupon all Corinth was filled with sacrifices, feasts. plaies, and all forts of games: in the middest of which, Antigonus watched his time, and got into the Castle, beguiling the poore Ladie, whose icalousie had beene ex- to cceding diligent in keeping it. Of this purchase he was so glad, that he could not containe himselfe within the grauitie beseeming his old age. But as bee had stollen it; fo was it againe stollen from him: neither lived he to revenge the losse of it, being alreadie spent with age.

Demetrius

Demetrius, the fonne of this Antigonus, fucceeding vnto his father, reigned ten yeeres. He made greater proofe of his vertue before he was King, than after. The Dardanians, Atolians, and Acheans, held him continually bufied in warre, wherein his fortune was variable, and for the more part ill. About these times the power of the Macedonians began to decaie; and the Grecians to call off their voke.

CHAP.2. S.6.

Philip, the onely fonce of Demetrius, was a yong child when his father died and therefore Antigonus, his vncle, had the charge of the Kingdome, during the minoritie of the Prince; but he affumed the name and power of a King, though hee respected Philip as his owne sonne, to whom he left the Crowne at his death: This Antigonus was called the Tutor, in regard of his Protectorship; and was also called Dolon, that is 25 much as Will-gine, because he was flow in his liberalitie. He represfed the Dardanians, and Theffalsans, which molested his Kingdome, in the beginning of his raigne. Vpon confidence of this good feruice, hee tooke flate vpon him, as one that rather were King in his owne right, than onely a Protectour. Hereupon the people fell to mutinie; but were foone appealed by faire words, and a feeming vnwillingnesse of his to meddle any more with the Government. The clohaians tooke from him the Civie of Athens, foone after Demetrius his death; and likely they were to have wrought him out of all or most that hee held in Greece, if their owne effate had not beene endangered by a nearer enemie. But citile diffention. 20 which had ouerthrowne the power of Greece, when it flourished most; ouerthrew it easily now againe, when it had scarcely recourred strength after a long sicknesses and gaue to this Antigonus no leffe authoritie therein, than Philip, the father of Alexander, got by the like aduantage.

These Achaians, from small beginnings, had increased in short time to oreat ftrength and fame: fo that they grew the most redoubted Nation of all the Greekes. By the equalitie of their Lawes, and by their clemencie (notwithstanding that they were a long time held under by the Macedonians and Spartans) they did not onely drawall others by their love and alliance, but induced, through their example, the rest of the Cities of Peloponnesus, to be gouerned by one Lawe, and to vie 20 one and the same fort of waights, measure, and monie.

Aratus, the Sicyonian, was the first that vnited them againe; and gaue them courage, after that they had beene by the Macedonian Captaines divided into many Principalities. In elder times they were gouerned by Kings, as most of the great Cities of Greece were; to which kind of rule they first subjected themselves, after the descent of the Heraclida, when Tisamenus the sonne of Orestes posses the Territorie of Achaia. In this estate they continued to the time of Gyees; after whome, when his fonnes fought to change the Legall government of their Predecessours into T yrannie, they expelled them, and made their State popular; as feeming most equall. This forme of Commonweale had continuance, with some small an changes according to the diversitie of times, till the reigne of Philip and Alexander Kings of Macedon: who tempest-like ouerturned all things in that part of the world: For those twelve Cities, called the Cities of alliance, whereof Helice, and Bura of Olenus, the Sea had caten up a little before the Battaile of Lendfres; were; by diffurbance of the Macedonians, divided from each other, and trained into a warre, no leffe foolish than cruell, among themselves. But in the one hundred and foure and twentith Olympiad, in which, or neare it, Ptolomie the fonne of Lagus, Lyfimachus; Seleucus, and Ptolomie Ceraunus, left the world; two of the ten remaining Cities and people, namely, the Patrenles and the Dimei, vnited themselves, and laid the foundation of that generall accord, and re-vnion, which after followed. For having 50 beene, some of them Partisans with fundrie Macedonian Captaines, and others hauing beene gouerned by pettie Kings; they began to fasten themselues in a strong league of amitic, partly, in the olympiad before spoken of, and partly, at such time as Pyrrhus made his first voiage into Italie. Now after the vniting of the Patrenses and Dimai, to whome also the Cities of Tritaa, and Phara, joyned themselves:

Agira

Agira chased out her Garrisons: and the Burians, killing their Kings, entred with the Geraunians into the same Confederacie. These Cities, for twentie and fine yeares, vied the same forme of Gouernement with the Achaians; who by a Senatorie and two Prætors, ordered all things in their Commonweale; and foone after. by one Prætor, or Commander: of which, Marcus Carynensis was the first, and Aratus the

This Aratus was a noble yong Gentleman of Sieyon, who living at Argos in exile, whilest his Countrie was oppressed by Tyrants, found meanes, through the helpe of other banifled men, to enter their owne Citie by night, with ladders; whence they chaced the Tyrant, and restored the people to libertie. This was in the time of An- 10 tigonus Gonatas King of Macedon, a Prince more busie in watching what to get among the Greekes, than wife in looking to his owne. For feare of Antigonus, the Sicyonians entred into the Athaian league: which though at that time it received more increase, by their accession, than it added strength to them; yet the benefit of this conjunction ferued well enough against Antigonus, whose subtletie was som what greater than his valour. As the industrie and counfaile of Aratus delivered his Countrie from bondage, and fortified it by the Achaian league: fo further, by lis great liberalitie, with the exceeding great cost of one hundred and fiftie talents, he pacified the inexplicable controversies, betweene the banished Siegonians, which returned with him. and the other Citizens that had possession of these mens Lands; as also with the same 20 mony he drew many others to affift him in those enterprises following, that redounded to the fingular good of all Achaia. The monie he obtained of Ptolemie Euergetes King of Egypt; who partly had a defire to hold fome strong and sure friendship in Greece, partly was delighted with the conversation of Aratus himselfe, that made a dangerous voiage to him into Agypt, and fed his pleasure in goodly pictures, with the gift of many curious peeces, wherein the workemen of sieyon excelled.

The first of Aratus his great attempts, was the surprize of the Acrocorinthus or Citadell of Corinth; which he wan by night, being thereinto guided by some thecues that he had hired for the purpole, who living in the place, had practifed to rob Antigonus his treasurie, passing in and out by a secret path among the rocks. Yet was 20 he faine to fight for it, ere hee could get it: though indeede Antigonus his Souldiers were rather ouer-come by their owne feare, than by any force of the affailants; as miltrufting left the Achaians were more in number, than in truth they were, and haping loft the advantages of the place alreadic, vpon which they had prefumed, before they were aware of any enemic.

In these kinde of night-services, ambushments, surprises, and practises, Aratus was very cunning, aduenturous, and valiant: in open field, and plaine battaile, hee was as timorous. By this strange mixture of cowardize and courage, he ministred argument of disputation, to Philosophers and others; Whether a valiant man (as he was effected, and in some cases approued) might looke pale and tremble, when 40 he beganne battaile; and whether the vertue of Fortitude were diversified, by the fundrie natures of men, and in a manner confined, vnto feuerall forts of action. In resoluing which doubts it may be said; that all vertue is perfected in men by exercife, wherein they are trained by occasion: though a natural inclination standeth in neede of little practife; whereas the defect hereof must be supplied with much instruction, vse, good successe, and other helpe, yet hardly shall grow absolute in generall. Such was Aratus in matter of Warre. In fincere affection to his Countrie he was unreprougable, and so acknowledged: as his following actions will testific.

When Acrocorinthus was taken, and joyned vnto the Common-wealth of Achaia, the Megarians revolted soone after from Antigonus, and entred into the same Corpo- 50 ration. So did the Trazenians, and the Epidaurians : whereby this new creeked State grew fo powerfull, that it aductiured to take Athens, from the Macedonians; and Argos, and Megalopolis, from T yrants that held them. The enterprise upon athens was of none effect. For though Aratus wasted the Ile of Salamis, to show his strength, and fent home the Athenian prisoners, without ransome, to allure the Citie by thew of love : verthe Athenians stirred neither against him, nor for him, as being now growne honelt flaues to the Macedonians. Vpon Argos the aduenture was carried more frongly. The Achaians came fometimes to the gates of the Cirie, but the people thirred not once they entred it, and might have wonne it, if the Citizens , would have lent any helpe to the recouctie of their owne freedome; fundrie times, and with diverse event, they fought with the T yrants (who rose vp one after another in Arges) in open field, and flue one of them in battaile; but all sufficed not: untillat length Ariftomachus the Tyrant was fo terrified, perfwaded, and hired, by Aratus, that he consented to refigne his estate. The like did Xenon the Tyrant of Hermione, and Cleonymus that had oppressed the Phliasians. Whilest this businesse with the Argines was on foot, Lyfiadas the Tyrant of Megalopolis was fo well handled by stratus, that, without compulsion, he gaue libertie to his Citie, and annexed it to the Councell of Achaia: whereby he got fuch credit, that hee was chosen Generall of their forces (which was a yearly Office, and might not be held two yeares together by one man) every fecond yeare, for a certaine while, Her and Aratus fuccccding one another by turnes. Butthose late Tyrants, and new Citizens, Lysiadas and Aristomachus, were carried with private passion, from care of the general good; in which courses they opposed dratus, to the great hurt of Ashain, as shall appeare 20 in due time.

The Achains having obtained fo much puiffance and reputation, that Ptolemie King of Ægypt was become Patron of their Alliance, and (in title of honour) Generall of their forces by Sea and Land; made open Warre vpon Demetrius the-Sonne of Antigonus Gonatas, for the libertie of Athens. It is strange and worthie of noting. That when Aratus in this quarrell had loft a battaile, the Athenians wore Garlands, in figne of loy, to flatter their good Lords the Macedonians, that had wonne the victorie. Such were now the Athenians become; in whom the rule was verified, that holds true in generall of the multitude, Aut humiliter feruit, aut fuperbe dominatur; It is either base in seruice, or insolent in command. Neuerthelesse 30 when Demetrius was dead, Aratus performed that by monie which he could not by force; and corrupting the Captaine of the Macedonian Garrison, purchased libertie to the Athenians, who thenceforth held good correspondence with the Achauns, louing them, and speaking well of them, which was all that they could doe but into their Corporation they entred not, fcorning it belike, in regard of their owne out-worne glorie. Now as the Common-wealth of Achaia daily increased within Peloponnesus, by inflice and honeffie; so did the Atolians, in the vtter part of Greece, yea and within Peloponne (us it felfe, waxe very powerfull, by sturdinesse of bodie, and rude courage in fight, without helpe of any other vertue. They had floutly defended themselues 40 against Antipater and Craterus; partly by during to doe and fuffer much; partly by the naturall strength and fastnesse of their Countrie; but especially by the benefit of the time, which called away these famous Captaines to other bulinesse, as hath beene related. They had molested Cassander, in fauour of Antigonus; and were themselues as much plagued by him, and by the Acarnanians, a little sour flour Nation, that tooke his part. Afterwards they had to doe with Demetrius a floring of the first Antigonus, and more or leffe, with all the Kings of Macedon succeeding him. They likewise held often Warre with the Acurnanians, Athamanians, Epirots, and many Cities in Pelaponnelus: fo that they were hardened with perpetual transile , feldome putting off their Armour. But their hardinesse ill deserted the name of va-50 lour; feeing they, had no regard of honestic orfriendship; measuring all things by their owne infolent will, and thinking al people base minded, that were not as fierce and outragious as themselves.

Thefor Etolians had lately made great spoiles in Peloponnesus, and occupied a good part of the countrie. They had inuaded the friends of the Acheans; taken and facked Lilli 3

Pallene; where although they were foundly beaten by Aratus, yet their defire of gaine made them greed to of a new voiage thither as to a Countrie wherin form what was to be gotten. But they were forced to looke another way, by Demetrius the fonne of Antigonus Gonatas: who preffed them fo hardly, that they were driven to feeke helpe of the Acheans: which they obtained. The warre which the Acheans made vpon Demetrius, without Peloponne fus, in Attica; though it tended to expelling the Macedons out of Greece, vet the benefit thereofredounded chiefly vnto the Atolians, at whose instance it was set on foot : for thereby were the Macedonian forces diuerted from them. Neither was this good turne vnacknowledged: though very basely the Atolians, giving thankes in wordes, devised how to requite the benefit 10 with fomegreat mischiefe. They saw that the Acheans were desirous, to bring all Peloponne (us into their Alliance and Corporation; of which intent, the Laced amonians were very icalous. Wherefore thefe + tolians laboured earnestly, to fet the Lacedamonians and Achaans together by the eares : hoping that if this might come to passe, they themselves should be called into helpe (it skilled not on what side) and fo get no small share, both in bootie and Territorie. Neither did they forbeare to communicate this their device vnto Antigonus; offering to make him partaker of their gaine, whom they knew to be offended with the many loffes, that his Kingdom had sustained by the Achaans. Of this plot Aratus was aware : who therefore determined to suffer many indignities, rather than to give the Lacedamonians cause to 20 take armes. But this resolution was taken somewhat too late; and not altogether in his owne power to hold. He had been e medling with the Arcadians, that were dependants of Lacedamon: and thereby had proupled the Lacedamonians to looke about them; feeing that all Peioponnesus, excepting themselves, the Eleans, and a few Arcadians their friends (who also were attempted) was alreadie become Achean.

The Citic of Sparta was in ill case about these times; and subject to the injuries of any stronger Neighbour. Pyrrhus had greatly weakned it : The Atolians entring Laconia with an Armie, had carried away fiftie thousand flages; and, which was worfe, their discipline was corrupted. Anarice and Luxurie raigned among them. the poore was oppressed by the rich, and the generotitie of spirit, that had sometime 20 beene their generall vertue, was hardly now to be found among the best of them. There were left in Sparta no more than seven hundred naturall Citizens; of whom not about one hundred had lands: all the rest were needic people, and desirous of innouation. Hercupon followed intestine sedition; which endangered the Citie most of all. Agis a good King, who sought to reforme the disorders of the State, exhorted the people to a strict observation of Lyeurgus his lawes. To which purpose he caused them to passe an Act, for the abolishing of all debts, and equal division of lands. All the yonger, and the poorer fort were glad of this: but the rich men opposedit. These had recourse vnto Leonidas the other King, (for in Sparta were two Kings) who tooke their part: being himselfe a dissolute man, as one trained up in the 40 Court of Syria, whence also he had his wife. In this contention Leonidas was expelled the Citic, and a new King chosen in his stead. But Agis his friends and Counfailors in this enterprise, abused his good meaning to their owne private commoditie. They were haltie to take away all debts, and cancell bonds, for they themfelues were deeply indebted; but the division of lands they afterwards hindred, because their owne possessions were great. Hence arose a tumult in Sparta, which these menincreased, by their foule oppression of the poorer Citizens. So that in fine Leonidas was brought home, and restored to his Kingdome, and the two aduerse Kings driven to take Sanctuarie; out of which, Cleombrotus, the late-made King, was difmiffed into exile : but Agis was trained forth , drawne into prison , and there by his 50 enemies condemned and Grangled, together with his Mother, and his old Grandmother. The like to this was neuer knowne in Sparta; and (which is the more odious) this crueltic proceeded from the Ephori, Magistrates that should have given Patronage to the lawes, vling their power, and more power than to them belonged, against a King, that had proceeded orderly in reforming the Citie, as the lawes

The death of Agis was much lamented by all good Citizens; and ferued to establish the impotent rule of a few tyrannicall oppressors. In which case Aratus might well hope, to adopue Lucadaman to the Abram Compon-wealth: though it were great insultice to take such aduantages, and attempt by force, that which would have redounded to the generall good of Pelaponnessus, and to the benefit of Spartait selle, it could have been envought by persuation.

But the same man who redressed the disorders of Sparta, and reuenged the death of Agis, did also requite the injust attempts of the Acheans, even in their owne kinde: obtruding upon them by force, an union of all Peloponne (us; though little to their good liking, for that the Lacedemonians and their King, should have been the principall; not they and their Prator. Leonidas having thus caused Agis to be slaine, tooke his wife that was very rich and beautifull, and gaue her in mariage (perforce) to his owne sonne Cleamenes. This yong Prince fell greatly enamoured on his wife, and fought to winne-her affection, as well as he had her person. He discoursed much with her about the purpose of her former husband Agu, and by pittying his misfortune, began to entertaine a defire of accomplishing that, wherein Agu had failed. So comming himselfe to be King, whilst he was very yong, hee gladly embraced all 20 occasions of warre: for that he hoped by strong hand to effect that, which Agis, by proceeding formally, in so corrupt an estate of the Citie, had attempted to his owne ruine. Therefore when the Ephori gaue him in charge, to take and fortifie Atheneum, a Temple on the marches of Laconia, to which both they and the Megalopolitans pretended title; he readily performed it. Hereof Aratis made no complaint, but fought to take by surprise Teges and Orchomenus, Cities then confederate with the Lacedsmonians: wherein, his intelligence failing, he lost the labour of a painefull nights trauaile, and discouered his enmitte to Sparta; of which Cleomenes was nothing forric. By these degrees the warre began. In the entrance whereto Aratus had discovered the Atolian practife, and therefore would have staied the quarrell from proceeding too farre. But Lysiadas and Aristomachus would needes fight, and he could doe none other than be ruled by them; especially seeing Cleomenes was so vrgent. Aristomachus was at that time General of the Acheans, (He & Lyfiadas being of great account. fince they had abandoned their tyrannie) who fent vnto Aratus, lying then in Athens, and required his affistance in a journie to be made into Laconia. No diffwasions of Aratus would ferve : therefore he came in person, and tooke part of a businesse, litle pleasing him in the present, and lessein the future. When he met with Cleomenes. he durst not fight; but opposed himselfe against Aristomachus, who desired to give battaile. Yet had the Acheans twentie thousand foot, and one thousand horse, in their Armie: whereas Cleomenes had no more than flue thou and in all. This gaue repu-40 tation to the Lacedemonian, and railed an ill report vpon Aratus; which Lysiadas helped to make worse, by accusing his cowardize. Neuerthelesse the Acheans would not fall out with Aratus their Benefactor, but chose him their Generall the year following against Lysiadas his accuser that sued for the place. Being Generall himselfe, it behoued him to confute, with deedes, the flanderous wordes of Lysiadus. Thereforche purposed to set vpon the Eleans : but was met withall on the way, neare vnto the Mount Lycam, by Cleomenes; who vanquilhed him in a great battaile, and draue him to hide himselfe all night for feare, so that he was thought to have beene slaine. This miladuenture Aratus recompensed by a trick of his owne more naturall occupation: performing with his broken Armie, that which could hardly haue been ex-50 pected, had he been victorious. For whilft there was no suspition of any great matter that he could vndertake; he secretly wrought with some of the Mantineans, who did let him into their Citie. The Mantinaans had once before joyned themselues with the Athaians; but shortly vpon feare, or some other passion, they gave themselves to the Atolians; and from the Atolians, presently after this victorie. to Cleomenes. from whom immediately they were thus won. For this their leuitie they were not punished, but freely admitted now againe into the Achean Societie. As this good successe repaired the credit of diatus; so another battaile almost ruined it. Cleamenes and he encountred neare vito Megalopolis, where the Achaans had fomewhat the better at the first, but their Generall durst not follow his advantage. Thereupon Lyllades, of whom we spake before, grew somewhat impatient with anger; and taking with him all the horse, brake vpon the Lacedemonians, whom hee routed at the beginning, but purfuing them too farre into places of hard paffage, he was flaine by them, and his followers driven back vpon their owne Companions; in fuch fort, 10 that finally all the Armie was difordered, and put to flight. This was a great loffe, and incenfed the Acheans against Aratus: yet their indignation proceeded no further, than that they refused to make any longer contribution, towards the pay of those Mercinaries which he had waged. This Aratus tooke patiently, and followed the warre nevertheleffe; wherein though Cleamenes wanne fome I ownes, and Aratus got the better in one small fight, yet litle of importance was done; the Acheans being wearie, and the Spartan King intentiue to another businesse.

Cleamenes having led into the field all that were like to hinder his purpose, and tired them with painefull journies, for fooke the Achean warre on a fudden, and came vnexpected home to Sparta, where hee flue the Ephori, and restored by force 20 the ancient discipline of Lycurgus. Then gaue hee an accompt of his doings: and the wing by what degrees the Ephori had incroched upon the power of Kings, and many disorders had growne in the Cities he justified his proceedings, and forthwith began to make equal division of the Lands, reducing all to the first institution. He also supplied the defect of Citizens, by choosing new, our of such as were friends to the State, and valiant men: fo that henceforth his Countrie might not altogether fland in neede of mercinarie helpe, as it lately had done, to faue it felfe from the .Etolians, Illyrians, and other enemies. All this was dispatched in great hafte; the Spartans well fatisfied; and Cleomenes him felfe readie in the field, ere his enemies could take advantage of these his domesticall troubles.

The Acheans hearing of this great alteration in Sparta, thought that it would be long, ere Cleomenes durst iffue forth of the Citic, for feare of some rebellion. But it was not long ere they heard, that he had walted all the Countrie of Megalopolis; hadranged over all Arcadia at his pleasure; and was admitted into Mantinea; and readic to take other places, even of Achaia. These newes displeased them not a little: but they must patiently endure to heare worse. For when Cleamenes had shaken off the power of the Ephori, that curbed his authoritie, hee proceeded more roundly in his worke; being better obeyed, and by better men. His Laced emonians refumed their ancient courage; and be himfelfe had the heart to demand the Principalitic of Greec. He did not therefore henceforth contend, about the pofferfion 40 of a few Townes: but adventured to winne or loofe all. The Atolians, in facour of his attempt, declared themselves on his side; and whereas he had gotten Manti-Page, Tegen, and other places, to which they had fome title, they willingly renounced all their interest vnto him.

Aratus did apprehend the danger of his Countrie, and faw that Antigonus with the Atolians, or perhaps without them, would shortly make an end of that, which Cleamenes had thus begunne. Therefore hee denifed how to prouide against the worst, and either to repaire all, or (if it could not bee to faue all from vtter ruine. The office of Generall when it was next put vpon him, hee refused; fearing to bee so farre press as to hazzard in one battaile all 50 the force of his Countrie, to which as hee had never any affection, nor perchance courage, fo was his manner of warfare otherwife. For he commonly actempted by furprile, and defended upon the advantage of place, after the manner of the Irib, and of all other Nations, ouer-charged with numbers of men. Yet did he not for fake the care of the weale publike, though in aiming at the generall good, it feemes that private passion drew him into an ill counse. He saw, that Megalopolis could not be defended without making a dangerous hazzard of battaile; that Mantines had not only opened her gates unto Cleamenes, but flaine the Achean Garrison that lay therein; that other Townes had yeelded vinto him, without compulsion; and that Aristomachus, once T yrant of Argos, and since Generall of the Acheans, was now revolted vnto the enemic, following the fortune of Cleomenes. Ptolemie was too farre off to helpe; and the neareneffe of Antigonus was very dange-10 rous ; yet might beviefull; if this King would (as Polybius faith) like others, be friend or enemie, as should best agree with his owne profit. To make triall hereof, draine or entine, as mone our agree with insowne profit. I o make trait nereot, Aratiginated with some of Aegalopolis, whom he found apt vinto his purpose; and interested them how to deale with both Antigonus, and the Acheans.

The Citie of Megalopolis had beene well affected to the Macedonians, euer fince the time of Philip the Father of Alexander, who had obliged it vnto him by some especiall benefits. At this time it lay nearest vnto the danger; was very faithfull, and therefore deserved succour; yet could not well bee relieved by the Acheans, with their owne proper strength. Wherefore it was thought meet, that Embassadours should bee sent vnto the generall Councell of Achaia, requesting seaue and 20 good allowance, to trie the favour of Antigonus in their necessitie. This was granted, for lack of what elfe to answere: and the same Embassadours dispatched away to Antigenus. They did their owne errand briefly; telling him of the good will and respect which their Citie had of long time borne vnto him and his Predecesfours; of their present neede; and how it would agree with his honour to give them aide. But when they delinered the more generall matter, wherein Aratus had given them instruction; shewing how the ambition of Cleomenes, and violence of the Etolians, might redound to his owne great loffe or danger, if the one and the other were not in time preuented; how Aratus himselfe did stand affected; and what good likelihood there was of reducing the Acheans under the Patronage of 30 Macedon: then beganne Antigonus to lend a more attentine care to their discourse, He embraced the motion: and to give it the more life, he wrote vnto the Megalopolitans, that his helpe should not be wanting, so faire forth, as it might stand with the Acheans good liking. Particularly he commended himselse, by these Messengers, to Aratus; afluring them, that he thought him elfehighly bound to this honourable man, whose former actions he now perceived, not to have beene grounded vp-on any hatred to the Macedonians, but only vpon a inft and worthic love to his owne Nation. With this answere they returne to Megalopolis: and are presently sent away to the Councell of Achaia; there to make some speedie conclusion, as the necellitie of the time required.

The Acheans were gladto heare, that Antigonus was so inclinable to their defire; and therefore were readie to entertaine his fauour, with all good correspondence. Hereunto Aratus gaue his consent; and praised the wisedome of his Countrimen, that fo well difcerned the best and likeliest meanes of their common safetie; adding neuerthelesse, that it were not amisse, first of all to tric their owne abilitie; which if it failed, then should they doe well to call in this gracious Prince, and make him their Patron and Protector. Thus hee shewed himselfe moderate, in that which himselfe of all others did most wish: to the end, that hee might not afterward fultainethe common reprehension, if any thing fell out amiste, linee it might appeare, that he had not beene Author of this Decree, but only followed, and that 50 leifurably, the generall consent.

Neurrhelesse in true estimation, this sinenesse of Aratus might have beene vsed, with his greater commendation, in a contrarie course. For it had beene more honourable, to make an end of the Warre, by yeelding vnto Cleomenes that power which they gaue vnto Antigonus: fince therby he should both have freed his

Countrie from all further trouble; and withall should have restored ynto the vniuerfall state of Greece, that honorable condition, whereof the Macedonians had bereft it. But it is commonly found (which is great pittie) that Vertue having rilen to honour by degrees, and confirmed it selfe, (as it were) in the seat of Principalitie, by length of time, and successe of many actions; can ill endure the hastic growth of any others reputation, wherewith it fees it felfe likely to bee ouer topped. Other cause to despise the Lacedamonians there was none; than that they lately had been in dangerous case : neither could any reason be found, why Aratus should prefer Antigonus before Cleamenes, than that he had flood in doubt of the one, when he thought himselfe more mighty than the other. Wherfore he was justly plagued, when he saw his owne honors reverfed by the infolent Macedonians; and in flead of living as a companion with Cleomenes, that was descended of a long race of Kings, the posteritie of Hercules, was faine to doe facrifice vnto Antigonus, as vnto a God, and was finally poisoned by Philip, whose Nobilitie was but of fine descents, and whom perhaps he might have feenchis fellowes, if he had not made them his Lords. By this inclination to the Macedonians, the loue of Ptolomie was loft : who forthwith tooke part with Cleomenes, though he did not supply him with such liberalitie, as hee had yied to the Acheans; being warned, as may seeme, by their example, to be more warie both in trusting and difbursing. Cleomenes himselfe, whilest this businesse with Antigonus was a foot, passed through Areadia with an Armie, and laboured by al meanes 20 to draw the Acheans to battaile. At the Citie of Dymes in Achaia were allembled all the remaining forces of the Nation; with which it was concluded, to make triall, whether perhaps they might amend their effate, without feeking helpe of the Macedonian. Thither went Cleomenes, and there fought with them : where hee had fo great a victoric, that the enemie was no longerable to keepe the open field. The calamitie was fuch, that dratus himfelfe durft not take vpon him to be their General, when his turne came in the next election. Wherefore the Acheans were compelled to fue for peace; which was granted vpon this casie condition: That they should not arrogate vnto themselves the command of Peloponnesus, but suffer the Lacedemonians (as in former ages) to be their Leaders in Warre. Hereunto if they would 30 condescend, he promised vnto them, that he would presently restore all places taken from them, and all his prisoners ransom-free: also that they should enjoy their owne Lawes and Liberties without mole flation. This gentle offer of Cleamenes was very pleasing to the Acheans: who desired him to come vnto the Citic of Lerna, where a Parliament should be held, for the conclusion of the Warre.

Now seemed the affaires of Greece likely to bee settled in better order, than they had euer beene fince the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warres, yea or fince the Persian Invalion: when God, who had otherwise disposed of these matters, hindred all, with a draught of cold water, which Cleomenes dranke in a great heat, and thereupon fell extreme fick, and so could not be present at Lerna, but caused the Parliament to 40 be deferred to another time. Neuerthelesse he sent home the chiefe of his prisoners, to shew that he meant none other than good faith. By this faire dealing he confirmed the Acheans in their defire of his friendship: who affembled againe at Argos, there to establish the League. But Aratus was violently bent against it; and sought by great wordes, and terrible threats, to make his Countrimen afraid of resoluing. When all would not ferue turne, he betooke himfelfe to his cunning; and fent word to Cleomenes, that hee should doe well to leave his Armie behinde him, and come alone into Argos, receiuing Holtages for fafetie of his person. Cleomenes was alreadic farre on his way, when he met with this advertisement: and tooke it in ill part, that he should be thus deluded. For it had beene an easie matter, to have told him so much at the first, and not have made him come so farre with an Armie, which afterwards he must dismisse. Yet that which chiefly seemes to have troubled him, was the drift of his oppugners; who fought thereby, either to make him wait without the gates, and deale only with themselues and their Messengers; or if he would ad-

uenture himselfeinto the Citie, then to depriue him of all Royall shew, that might breede respect of him in the Multitude. This was that indeede which Aratus seared. and for which he fought to hinder his comming thither in person : lest the people, hearing the promises of Cleomenes ratified by his owne mouth, should presently be wonne with his gentle wordes, and finish the bargaine without more adoe. Therefore Cleomenes wrote vnto the whole Councell, bitterly complaining against these ingling tricks: and Aratus was not farre behinde with him, in as bitter an Oration. So between feare of the one, and reuerence of the other, the Affembly knew not how to proceede, but abruptly brake vp, leauing all as it were to fortune. Cleamenes tooke his aduantage of their present weakenesse, and renewed the Warre. Many Cities yeelded vnto him willingly; many heeforced; and partly by force, partly by terrour, he wanne Argos, which neuer King of Sparta before him could doe. In this cafe Aratus fent his owne fonne to Antigonus, entreating him to deferre no time, but come prefently to relieue the distressed Acheans. Antigonus gaue as good words as could be wished: saving that he vtterly refused to doe any thing, vnlesse he might first haue Acrocorinthus put into his hand. This demand was somewhat like vnto that of the Hunter, who promifed to helpe the Horse against his enemie the Stagge: but with condition, that the Horse should suffer himselfe to bee sadled and bridled. Aratus was herewithall contented, but wanted all honelt colour to doe it: feeing the Corinthians had no way descrued, to be thus given away to the Macedonians. Yet at length an occasion was found; for that the Corinthians, perceiuing what he intended, were minded to arrest him. So hee withdrew himselfe out of their Citie, and fent word to Antigonus, that the Castle should bee readie to let him in. The Corinthians on the other fide ranne to Cleomenes; who loft no time, but made hafte with them to Corinth, where he fought how to get possession of their Castle, or at least to faue it from Antigonus, by furrounding it with Trenches , that none might iffue nor enter without his leaue. Whileft this was in doing, he tooke speciall order, that Aratus his house and goods, within the Towne, should be safely kept for the Owner; to whom hee fent Messenger after Messenger, desiring him to come to agree-20 ment, and not to bring in the barbarous Macedonians, and Illyrians, to Peloponnelis: promiting that if he would hearken to these perswasions, then would hee give him double the same pension, which hee had beene wont to receiue of King Ptolemie. As for the Castle of Corinth, which was the gate of Peleponnesus, and without which none could hold affured soueraigntie of the Countrie; he desired that it might not be committed vnto his owne disposition, but be iountly kept by the Lacedamonians and Achaens. All this entreatic ferued to no purpofe. For Aratus, rejecting veterly the motion, fent his owne fonne as an Hoftage to Antigonus; and laboured with the Acheans, to put Acrocorinthus into his handes. Which when Cleomenes vnderflood. he feifed upon the goods of Aratus in Corinth, and wasted all the Countrie of Sieron.

CHAP.2. S.6. of the Historie of the World.

whereof this his Aduersarie was natiue, Antigonus in the meane time drew neare to the Isthmus; having passed with his Armie through Euba, because the Atolians held the freights of Thermopyle against him. This they did, either in fauour of Cleomenes, which they pretended; or in doubt of the greatnesse, whereunto the Macedonians might attaine by the good succeffe of this journic. At his comming thither he found the Lacedemonians readie to forbid his entrance: and that with sufficient strength; yet with no purpose to hazzard battaile, but rather to wearie him thence with hunger, against which he came not well prouided. Antigonus therefore laboured hard to make his way by force; but he was not able fo to doe: hee fecretly got into the Corinthian Hauen; but was 50 violently drinen out againe, with great loffe of men; finally he resolued to turne afide, and fecke a paffage ouer the gulfe of Corinth, to Sieyon, or some other part of Achaia; but this required much time; and great preparation, which was not easily

gonus, and no lede troubled his Enemies. The Acheans were gotten into that Cities and the Garrison which Cleamenes had left therein, though it was not driven out of the Citadell, yet was hardly diftieffed, and flood in neede of present helpe. Areas had alwaies beene enemie to Sparta, and well affected to the Kings of Macedon When Cleamenes tooke it, he forbare to chase out those whom he most suspected; partly, at the entreatie of friends; and partly, for that they all made shew to be glad of his prosperitie. They were glad indeede of Cleamenes his victories, both in Argos and elsewhere, as many as hoped that he would cause all debtors to be discharged from their creditours, as he had lately done in Sparta. But that which Cleomenes had done in Sparta, was agreeable to the Spartan institution: in other places, where it would to haue beene tyrannicall, he did it not. Thereupon, fuch as were disappointed of their vniust hopes, beganne to turne good Common-wealths-men; and called him Tyrant for his doings at home, because hee would not doe the like abroad. So they tooke their time; inuited the Achaans; affailed his Garrison; cut in peeces the Rescue that he sent; and compelled him at length, to for sake the defence of Corinth, and looke vnto the enemies that were behinde his back. For when he vnderstood. by continual mellages, that his men which held the Citadell at Argos, were almost loil : hee beganne to feare, left his labour in guarding the entrie should grow friuolous; the Acheans in the meane while spoiling all that lay within. Therefore hee for fooke his cultodic of the Ishmue, and made all hafte towards Argos: which if hee 20 could faue, he meant to trust fortune with the rest. And so farre he prevailed at his comming to Argos; that both Argines and Acheans were glad to house themselves, leauing him Matter of the streets : when the horse-men of antigonus were discouered a-farre off, hasting to relieue the Citizens; and Antigonus himselfe (to whom Corinth was yeelded, as soone as the Spartan had turned his back) following apace with the bodie of his Armic. Cleomenes therefore had no more to doe, than to make a safe retrait. This he did; and got him home into Laconia: loosing in short space all, or most, of that which he had beene long in getting.

Antigonus having shewed himselfe at Argos, and commended the Citizens, went into Arcadia; where he wanne such Castles as were held for Cleomenes, and restored 30 them to the old Poffesfors. This done, he tooke his way to Agium, where was held a Parliament by the scheans: to whom he declared the cause of his comming, and Spake braue wordes, that filled them with hope. The Acheans were not behinde withhim; but made him Captaine Generall ouer them and their Confederates: and further entred into couenant with him, That they should not deale with any Prince or State, either by writing or Embassadour, without his consent. All this while, and somwhat longer, dratus was the only man, that seemed to rule the Kings heart : carrying him to Sicyon, his owne Towne (for Winter was comeon) where he not only feasted him as a great Prince, but suffered more than humane honours, as facrifices and the like, to be done vnto him. This example of Aratus and his Si- 40 cyonians, was followed by the rest of Achaia: which had made (for footh) a very wife bargaine, if in stead of Cleamenes that would have beene a King, it had obtayined the protection of a God. But this God was poore; and wanting wherewith to pay his Macedonians, imposed the burthen upon the Acheans. This was hardly taken : yet worse must be endured in hope of better. Neither was Aratus himselfe ouer-carefully respected; when the statues of those T yrants, which he had throwne downe in Argos, were againe creeted by Antigonus; or when the statues, which he had erected, of those that had taken Acrocorinthus with him, were all throwne downe by the same King, and one only left vnto himselfe at his earnest entreatic. It might therefore appeare, that this God was also spightfull. Neuerthelesse in taking reuenge vpon those that offended him, Aratus did satisfie his owne passion by the aide of these Masedonians. For with extreme torments he did put Arislomachus to death, who had beene once Tyrant of Augos; afterwards Generall of the Acheans; and from them renolting vnto Cleomenes, did fall at length into their hands. In like fort handled hee (though not as yet) the Martineans, for their ingratitude and crueltie flewed to the Achaens. For he flue all the principall Citizens, and fold the refl, men, women, and children, all for bond-flaues: diuding the fooile; two parts to the Macedonians, and the third to the Achaens. The Towne it felfe was given by Antigens to the Argiues: who peopled it with a Colonie of their owne; and Aratus having charge of this businesse, caused it to be enew-named Antigonia. Surely of this crueltie there can bee no better excuse; than even the flatteric, which Aratus was driven to vet to Antigonia; foras fluent as it was a token of feruilitie; whereinto they had viged and brought him; whom he, as in revenge thereof, did thus require, to But leaving to speake of this change, which the comming in of the Macedonian wrought, in the Ciuill flate of the Achaens; Let vs returne vnto his ware against

The next Sommer Antigonus wanne Tegea, Mantinea, Orchomenus, Herea, and Tel-phulfa. Mantinea he dispeopled, as was faid before; in Orchomenus he placed a Garison of his Macedonians; the rest he restlored to the Achaens: with whom he wintred at Agium, where they held a Parliament. Once only Cleomens had met him this yeare; and that was on the borders of Lappaia, where hee lay readicto defend his owne Territorie. The reading why he shirted po further, apor followed Antigonus to Mantinea, and to those other Townes that hee wanne, was this: Hee had see Soul-and diers, and not monic enough to wage more. Ptolemie the Ægyptian promifed much, but would performe nothing, whelfe he might have Clearmens his owne Mother, and his children in pledge. The were fent into Ægypt 3 yet the aide came not. For Ptolemie was flow; as dealing in the bufinefle of Greece, rather for his mindes fake, than upon any apprehension of necessities. Clearmens therefore prouided for him-felfe, as well as his owne abilitie would ferrue. He manumised all the theisters, which were the Lacedemoins flaues: taking monic for their libertic, and arming two thousand of them, after the Macedonian fashion. Hauing thus increased his forces, hee ame on the fudden to Megalopsis; that lay secure, as hauing defended it selfein more dangerous times, and hauing now Antigonus neare at hand in Ægium. The Towne he wanne: but after he was entred, all that were fit to beare armes, role haftily againft him, and though they could not driue him out, yet faued the multitude, to whom they gaue a Port free for their efcape. He sent after the Citizens, offering their Towne and goods to them againe, if they would bee of his partie. But they brauchy refunded his offer: wherefore he sacked and ruined it, carrying with him to Spurts a great bootie that he found therein. These newes assonished the Acheans at Esiam: who thereupon brake up their Parliament. Antigonus sent hastily for his Mescalinism, out of their wintering places; but they were so long in comming, that Cleamens was fafely gone home. Therefore he returned them back to their lodgings, and went himselfeto Argos, there to passe the rest of this valueke winter, somewhat so further from the eyes of the grieued Acheans. When he had laine awhile at Argos, further from the eyes of the grieued Acheans.

there from the eyes of the grieued Achaeus. When he had laine awhile at Argas, Cleomers was at the gates, with no great number of men, yet with more than Amigonus had then about him. The Argiust perceiving that their Countrie would be fpoiled, if Antigonus did not iffue into the field; were very earnest with him to goe forth and fight. But he was wifer, than to be moved with their clamours; and fuffered them to see their villages burnt; to bid him resigne his Office of Protector, victo some that were more valiant; and to satisfie their passions with solids wordes; rather than hee would be ouer-come in fight, and thereby loose more honour than could easily be repaired. By this Cleomens had his delire, in weakning the reputation of his enemie: though he thereby added neither sollowers, nor other strength, who

Afterwards, when the leason was more fit for warre, Antigonus gathered together all his troups; meaning to requite these brauado's of his enemie, with the conquest of Sparta. Cleamenes on the other fide, laboured to keepe the warre from his ownegates; and therefore entred vpon the Countrie of Argos, where he made, fisch 4.10

Cleomenes fled vnto Sparta: where hee had no defire to stay, finding only two hundred left, of fixe thousand Spartans that hee had led vnto this battaile, and most of his hired Souldiers dead, or gone away. So he perswaded his people to yeeld themselves vnto Antigonus; and promising to doe all that should at any time lie in his owne power, for their good, he halted away to the Sea-fide (where he had shipping long before prouided, against all that might happen) and imbarqued himselfe for Egypt. He was louingly entertayned by Ptoleme Euergetes; who undertooke to reftore him to his Kingdome; and (perhaps) meant no leffe, as being much delighted with his gallant behaujour and qualities. In the meane feafon hee had a pension allowed him, of foure and twentie talents, yearely. But this Ptolemie died; and his sonne Ptolemie Philopater succeeded him; a vicious yong Prince. wholly gouerned by lewd Women, and base Men, vnmindefull of all vertue, and hating any in whom it was found. When therefore Cleamenes was delirons to returne into Greece, whither the troubles in Peloponnelus did feeme to inuite him : Ptolemie, and his Minions, would neither give him aide; nor yet dared to difmiffe him (as he defired) to trie his owne friends in Greese, because hee was too well acquainted with the weakenesse of Egypt : nor well knew how to detaine him against his will. At length they deuised matter against him, and made him prisoner. The last act of him was; that with thirtie of his Countrinien, bee undertooke 20 a desperate enterprize; breaking out of the prison, and proupking the Alexandrians to rebell, and seeke their libertie. In which attempt hee slue some enemies of his that he met; and having walked vp and downe the fireets, without reliffance (no man offering to take his part, or, which is very frange, to fight against him on the Kings behalfe) He, and his Companions, agreed together to bee Ministers of their owne death. Vpon his dead bodie Ptolomie was bold to shew his indignation; and flue his Mother and Children, that had beene fent thither as Hostages, together with the wines of his Adherents, as many as were there, attending youn the old Queene. Such was the end of Cleomenes; a generous Prince, but Sonne of Leonidas, who had caused Aeis, with his Mother and Grand mother, to 20 come to fuch a bloudie end, as now befell his owne Wife, Sonne, and Grandchildren.

After the Victorie at Sellssia, Antigonis without resistance entred Sparts: whereinto neuer the force of any Enemie, before him, could make way. Hee kindly entreated the Citzens, and lest them to their owne Lawes and Gouernement: tarrying there no longer, than two or three dayes; after which he hastened out of Peloponnes (in, and neuer returned. The cause of his speedie departure was, an advertisement that he received out of Mueedans; how the slbstrass cuer-ranne, and destroied the Countrie. Had these news come a little sooner; or had Cleomens either deserved the fight, a few dayes longer, or at least-wise tarried, a few dayes after the fight, in Sparts: the Kingdome of Lackstones would have stood, and perhaps have extended it selse over all Greece. But God had otherwise de-

Antigenus fought a great battaile with the Ilbyrians, and ouer-came them. His Kingdome descended vnto Philip, the some of Demetrius, being then a Boy: as also about the same time it was, that Antichoka, surnamed (1 know not why) the Great; and Fiolemic. ### d. VII.

How the Illyrians infelled the coast of Greece; and how they were fubdued by the Romans.

Hilest thinges thus passed in Greece; and whilest the Carthaginians were to bufic in their conquest of Spaine: the Romans had found themselues worke among the Sardinians and Corficans, that were eafily subdued at first, and easily vanquished againe, when they rebelled. They made alfo warre with the Illyrians, wherein they got much honour with little paine. With the Gaules they had much adoc, that lasted not long; being rather, as Linie faith, a tumult than a warre. So that by all these light exercises, their valour was hardly kept from ruft. How they got the Ilands in the Mediterran Sea; it hath beene showed before; of their dealings with the Illyrians and Gaules, it is not meet to

The Illyrians inhabited the Countrie, now called Slauonia: a troublesome Nation, 20 impatient of rest, and continually making warre for gaine, without other regard of friend or foc. They were inuited by Demetrim King of Maceden, to helpe the Mydionians, his friends, that were belieged by the Etolians, for that they refused to be of their focietie. Before the Illyrian fuccours came, the Mydionians were fo farre front. that the Atolians contended about the bootie: the old Prætor, or chiefe Magistrate of their Nation, who was going out of his Office, clayming to haue the honor of the victorie, and the diuision of the spoile to be referred vnto him; for that he had in a manner brought the fiege to an end, and wonne the Towne : others, that were in hope to be chosen into the Office, contradicting this, and desiring that old orders might be kept. It was a pretie firife, and somewhat like to that of the French in later 20 ages, who thought vpon dividing the prey, before they had wonne the victories. which anon they loft, at Poitiers and at Agincourt. The Atolians wifely compounded the difference, ordering it thus; That the old, and the new Prætor, should bee iountly intitled in the victorie, and have equall authoritie, in distribution of the gettings. But the Illyrians finished the strife much more elegantly, and after another fashion. They arrived, and landed, ere any was aware of them; they fell vpon the Ætolians; and though good relistance was made, yet got the victoric, partly by force of their owne multitude, partly by helpe of the Mydionians, that were not idle in their owne businesse, but stoutly sallied out of the Towne. Many of the Etolians were flaine, more were taken, their Campe and all their baggage was loft : the Illy- AQ rians tooke the spoile, and went their way; the Mydionians erected a Trophie, infcribing the names, both of their old and new Magistrate (for they also chose new Officers at the same time) as the Atolians had directed them by example.

The fuccesse of this voiage, highly pleased Agron King of the Illgrians: not only in regard of the monie, wherewith Demetrius had hired his affiliance; or of the bootie that was gotten; but for that having vanquished the stoutest of the Greekes, hee found it not vneasie, to enrich himselfe by setting vpon the lesse warlike. For joy of this, he feasted, and dranke so immoderately, that he fell into a Pleurisse, which in few daies ended his life. His Kingdome, together with his great hopes, he left vnto Tenta, his wife.

Tenta gaue her people free libertie, to robbe all Nations at Sea, making no difference betweene friend and foe; as if thee had beene fole Mistresse of the falt Waters. Shee armed a fleet, and fent it into Greece: willing her Captaines, to make Warre where they found aduantage, without any further respect. These fell with the westerne coast of Peloponnesus; where they invaded the Eleans, and Messenians. Afterwards they returned along by Epirus, and flaied at the Citie of Phanice, to take in victualles and other necessaries. There lay in Phanice eight hundred Gaules; that having beene Mercinaries of the Carthaginians, went about to betray, first Agricentum, then Erry, to the Romans; but failing to doe either, they nevertheleffe revolted. and were for their misdeedes disarmed, and sent to Sea by the Romans, yet entertained by these Epirots, and trusted to lie in Garrison within their Towne. The Gaules were foone growne acquainted with the Illyrians, to whom they betraied Phanice 1 which deferued none other, in trufting them. All Epirus was presently in armes and hastned to drive out these vnwelcome guests. But whilest the Epirots lay before the Towne, there came newes into their Campe, of another Illyrian Armie, that was marching thitherward by Land, under one Seerdilaidas; whom Queene Teuta had fent to helpe his fellowes. Vpon this advertisement, a part of them is fent away towards Antigonia, to make good that Towne, and the streights adjoyning, by which these new commers must enter into their Countrie; another part of them remaines at Phanice, to continue the fiege. Neither the one, nor the other, feed well in their businesse. For Scerdilar las found meanes to joyne with his fellowes; and they that were befreged within Phaniee, fallied out of the towns, and gaue fuch an ouerthrow 20 to the Epirots, as made them despaire of fauing their Countrie, without great and speedie helpe from abroad. Wherefore Embassadours were sent to the Acheans and Atolians: crauing their helpe, with very pittifull termes of entreatie. They obtayned their fuit; neither was it long, before an Armie, fent by these two Nations. was readie in Epirus, to present battaile vnto Scerdilardas. But Scerdilardas was called home, by letters from Testa the Queene, that fignified a rebellion of fome Illyrians against her: so that he had no minde to put his forces to hazzard, but offered compolition; which was accepted. The agreement was, That the Epirots might ranfome their Towne, and all their people that were prisoners; and that the Illyrians should quietly depart, with all their bootie and slaves. Having made this profitable 20 and honourable bargaine; the Illyrians returned into their owne Countrie by Land, fending their bootic away by Sea. Attheir comming home, they found no fuch great trouble, as that which they brought, or had occasioned in this voiage. For in fulfilling the commandement of their Queene, they had taken many Italian Marchants, whileft they lay at Phanice; and made them good prize. Hereof the complaints, made vnto the Roman Senate, were fo frequent, that Embassadours were fent to require of Testa, that shee should abstaine from doing such injuries. These Embassadours found her very jolly; both for the riches which her fleet had brought in; and for that flee had, in fhort space, tamed her Rebells, and brought all to good order, faue only the towne of Iffa, which 40 her forces held streightly belieged. Swelling with this prosperitie, shee could hardly affoord a good looke to the virmannerly Romans; that found fault with her doings; and calling them by a true name, Pyracie, required amends. Yet when their speech was ended, shee youchsafed to tell them, That injurie in publike shee would doc them none: as for private matters, no account was to be made of them; neither was it the manner of Kings, to forbid their Subjects to get commoditie, how they best could, by Sea. But (said the yonger of the two Embassadours) we Romans have a manner, and a very laudable one, to take revenge in publike, of those private wrongs, that are borne out by publike authoritie: therefore we shall teach you, God willing, to reforme your Kingly manners, and learne better of vs. These words the 70 Queene tooke so impatiently, that no reuenge could satisfie her, but the death of him that had spoken them. Wherefore, without all regard of the common Law of Nations, shee caused him to be slaine: as if that had beene the way, to set her heart at reft; which was indeede the meane, to disquiet and afflict it ever after.

led by A. Posthumius. They trouble not themselves any more, with requiring faristaction: for this injurie is of such nature, as must be requited with mortall warre. It is indeede contrarie to all humane Law, to vse violence towards Embassadours: the reason and ground whereof, seemes to bee this; that since without mediation. there would never be an end of warre and destruction, therefore it was equally receiued by all Nations, as a leffon taught by Nature, that Embaffadours should paffe freely, and in fatetie, betweene enemies. Neuertheleffe, as I take it, this generall Law is not without limitation. For if any King, or State, lay hold vpon Embassashould draw into the quarrell; then is it as lawfull, to vie violence to those Embalfadours (thus implosed, to make the warre more terrible) as it is to kill the men of warre, and subjects, of an enemie. And so might the Athenians have answered it, when they flue the Lacedemonian Embassadours, that were sent to Xerxes, to draw him into a warre upon the Athenians. Neither are those Embassadours, which practife against the person of that Prince, in whose Countries they reside, warranted by any Law what focuer. For whereas the true Office of an Embaffadour reliding, is the maintenance of amitie; if it be not lawfull for one Prince, to practife against the life of another, much leffe may an Embaffadour doe it, without incurring justly the no priviledge at all. But we will leave this dispute to the Civilians; and goe on with the reuenge, taken by the Romans, for the flaughter of their Embaffadour Co-

The Illyrian Queene was secure of the Romans, as if they would not dare to stirre against her. Shee was indeede in an errour; that hath vidone many of all forts, greater and leffe than flee, both before and fince: Having more regard onto fame, than onto the substance of things. The Greekes were at that time more famous than the Romans; the Ætolians and Epirots had the name of the most warlike people in Greece; these had shee casily vanquished; and therefore thought, that with the Romans shee should be litle troubled. Had she considered, that her whole Armie, which wrought 20 fuch wonders in Greece, was not much greater, than often thousand men; and that neuertheleffe, it preuailed as much, by oddes of number, as by valour, or skill in armes; thee would have continued to vie her advantage, against those that were of more fame than ftrength, with fuch good caution, that flee should not have needed to oppose her late-gotten reputation, against those that were more mightie than her felfe. But fine was a woman, and did what fine lifted. Shee fent forth a greater fleet than before, under Demetrius of Pharos; with the like ample commission, to take all that could bee gotten. This fleet divided it selfe; and one part of it fell with 2 Dyrrachium; the other, with Corcyra, Dyrrachium was almost surprized by the Illyrians; vet was it refeued by the flout Citizens. In b Coreyra the Illyrians landed; 40 wasted the Isle; and belieged the Towne. Hereupon the Etolians and Acheans were called in to helpe; who came, and were beaten in a fight at Sea; loofing, befides others of leffe note, Marcus Carynenfis, the first Prætor of Achaia, whom Aratus fucceeded. The Towne of Coreyra, difmaied with this overthrow, opened the gates vnto Demetrius Pharius; who tooke possession of it, with an Illyrian Garrison; sending the rest of his forces to besiege Dyrrachium. In the meane season, Teuta was angrie with her Captaine Demetrius: I know not why: but fo, as he refolged to trie any other course, rather than to trust her.

The Romans were even readie to put to Sea, though vncertaine which way to take, when advertisement was brought to C. Fuluius the Confull, of Demetrius his 50 feare and discontent. Likely it was, that such an occasion might greatly helpe to adnance the bulinesse in hand. Wherefore the Consull failed thither; where hee found the Towne of Coreyra fo well prepared to his hand by Demetrius, that it not only received him willingly, but delivered into his power the Illyrian Garrison, and submitted it selfe vnto the Roman protection.

Sea, confifting of two hundred faile, commanded by C. Fuluius; the other by Land, dours fent by their enemies, not vnto themselves, but vnto some third, whom they to fame danger of punishment, with other Traitors; in which case, his place gives him 20 CHAP.2. S.8. of the Historie of the World.

After this good beginning, the Confull failed alongst the coast, to apollonia; ac- c Apollonia. 2 companied with Demetrius, whom he vied thenceforth as his counfailer and guide. Citie neare To Apollonia came also Posthumus, the other Consull, with the Land-Armic, numbred at twentiethousand foot, and two thousand horse. Thence they hasten towards Dyrrachium, which the Illyrians had befieged; but vpon newes of the Roman Pintus calls to Armie, they disperse themselves. From thence the Romans enter Illyria, and take Parthenia; beat the Illyrians by Sea, take twentic of their ships; and enforce the Queene Tenta to forsake the coast, and to couer her selse in Rison, farre within the Land. In the end, part of the Romans haste them homeward, and leave the best places of Illyria in the hands of Demetrius; an other part flaies behinde, and profecutes the warre, in fuch fort, that Tenta was forced to begge peace: which shee obtained upon miscrable conditions; to wit, That shee should quit the better part of Illyria and pay tribute for the rest; and from thenceforth, neuer fend any of her ships of warre, towards the coasts of Greece, beyond the Iland of Lisa: except it were some one or two vessells, vnarmed, and by way of Trade.

After this Illyrian warre, the Romans sent Embassadours into divers parts of Greece, fignifying their loue to the Countrie, and how, for good will thereunto, they had made warre with good fuccesse you Testa, and her people. They hoped be-like, that some distressed Cities would take this occasion, to desire their patronage: 20 which if it hapned, they were wife enough to play their ownegames. But no such matter fell out. The Embassadours were only rewarded with thankes; and a decree made at Corinth, That the Romans thenceforth might be partakers of the Ifthmian passimes. This was an idle courtese, but well meant by the vaine Greekes, and therefore well taken by the Romans: who by this Illyrian Expedition got nothing in Greece, faue a little acquaintance, that shall be more hereafter.

o. VIII.

Of the warre betweene the Romans and Gaules, somewhat before the comming of HANNIBAL into Italie.

He Gaules that dwelt in Lumbar die, were the next, against whom the Romans tooke Armes. These were a populous Nation, and often molested Rome; fometimes with their owneforces, and sometimes with the affishance of those that inhabited France. Once their fortune was good; when they tooke Rome, and burnt it: though the iffue of that warre proued not answerable to the beginning, if we may give credit vnto Roman Historians. In following times, their successe was variable, and commonly bad. Many ouerthrowes they received; and if they got any victoric, it yeelded them no profit, but was soone extorted out of their hands. They were indeed emore fierce, than well aduised: lightly stirred up to warre, and lightly giving ouer. At the first brunt, they were faid to be more than men; but when that was past, lesse than women. The Romans were acquainted with their temper, by long experience; and knew how to handle them: yet gaue alwaies carefull he de to their approch, were it only bruited. For the danger of them was fudden, and vncertaine; by reason of their neighbourhood, and want of intelligence among them. Few of their attempts woon Rome, were called warres, but tumultus Gallici; tumults of the Gaules; and rightly. For they gaue many alarms to Italie, and vsed to rise with great Armies but 50 after a few dayes march, and sometimes before their setting forth, any small occa-fion served to dispert them. Having receive, an overthrow; they would rest ten, or twelve yeares, sometimes twentie or third: till they were stirred vp againe, by yonger heads, vnacquainted with the danger. Whileft they refled; the flate of Rome, that against these made only defensive warre, had leisure to grow, by setting vpon others. He ein God prouided well for that Monarchie, which hee intended to raife : that the Gaules neuer fell vpon Italie, with a mightie power, in the time of any other great and dangerous warre. Had they attempted to conquer it, whilest Pyrrhus was travailing in the same enterprise; or in either of the two former Punick warres: it may be doubted what would have become of this imperious Citie. But it seemes that the Ganles had no better intelligence in the affaires of Italie, than strangers had in Gaule. At least, they knew not how to vie their times : and were therefore like to fmart, when soeuer the enemies, whom they had much prouoked, and little hurt, should finde leisure to visit them at their owne home ; which was now after the first Punick Warre. Once before this, the Romans had beene bold, to set 10 vpon the Gaules in their owne Countrie : and that was three yeares before the comming of Pyrrhus into Italie. At that time the Senones, a Tribe of the Gaules invading Hetruria, and besieging Arretium, had wonne a great battaile, and flaine L. Cacilius with the most of his Armie. Manius Curius the new Confull, sent Embassadours to them, to treat about ransome of prisoners. But these Embassadours they flue. Therefore when fortune turned to the better, the Romans followed it so well, that they expelled these Senones out of their Countrie, and sent a Colonic of their owne to inhabit it. This caused the Boi, another people of Gaule, to scare the like meafure: who thereupon tooke armes, and drew the Hetrurians to their fide. But the Romans ouerthrew them in two great battailes; and thereby made them fue for peace, 20 which lasted untill this end of the Illyrian warre.

It vexed the Gaules, to fee a Roman Colonie planted in their Countrie; who had been eaccustomed to enlarge their bounds, by driving out their Neighbours pertheie Bon were force. Wherefore they laboured with the Transalpines ( fo the Romans called those in France, as lying from them beyond the Alpes, though to vs they are nearer; like as they called Cifalpines, or by-hither the Alpes, those who dwelt betweene them and the Mountaines) to draw them to their partie: reasonably presuming, that as their distunction had caused their losse, so their vnion might recompence it, with large amends. But the businesse was so foolishly carried, that the Cifalpines and Transalpines, fell together by the eares: putting the Romans only to a tumult, without fur- 30 ther trouble of warre: Soone after, they were viged by a greater indignitie, to goe more substantially to worke. For C. Flaminius, a popular man in Rome, proposed a Decree which was ratified by the people; That, besides one Colonie alreadie planted in the territorie of the Senones, as many more should be caried thither, as would ferue to people the whole Countrie betweene Ancona and Ariminum: exterminating vtterly those Gaules. Such an offer, were it made in England, concerning either Virginia, or Guiana it selfe, would not ouer-joy the Multitude. But the Commonaltie of Rome tooke this in so good part, not with standing all danger joyned with the benefit, that Flaminius had euer after their good will.

This dreadfull President extremely displeased the Boij: who being Neighbours 40 to Ariminum, seared the like displantation. And because all the rest of the Gaules had reason to resolue, that themselves also should bee rooted out by degrees; the great Nation of the Insubrians, which inhabited the Duchie of Milan, joyned with the Boil , and vpon a common purse entertained the Gessates, Nations about Rhodanus, wagcable as the Switzers in these times. The Gessates having received a great Imprest, come to the field under the conduct of their Kings, Concelitanus and Aneroeflus: who with the Boij and Insubrians, compound an Armic of fiftie thousand foot, and twentie thousand horse, and those of the best men, and best appointed, that euer inuaded the Roman Territoric; to whom, the Seno-ealli, that had beene beaten out of their possessions, gaue a great increase of strength. On the contrarie side, the Venetians, and the f Cenomanni, adhes, dto the Romans: as better beleeuing in their prosperitieand riling fortune. For feare of whose incursions therefore, the Gaules were forced to leave a good part of their Armie, on the frontier of Milan: With the rest of their forces they entred into Tuscane. The Romans hearing of this danger, fend Amilius to Rimine, to stop their paffage; and in the place of C. Atilius their other Confull, who then was in Sardinia, they imploy one of their Prætors, for the detence of Tufcane.

Being at this time greatly troubled, with the confideration of this powerfull 'Armie, which the Gaules had affembled, they caused a view to bee taken, as well of all their owne forces, as of those of their Allies: who were no lesse willing than themfelues, to oppose the incursions of the barbarous people; fearing, as they had cause, that their owne destruction could not bee preuented otherwise, than by the good fortune of Rome. The numbers, found in this Muster, deserue to be recorded : because they set out the power of the Romans in those dayes. With the Consulls they sent forth to the warre foure Legions of their owne : euery Legion consisting of flue thousand two hundred foot, and three hundred horse; and of their Allies, thirtie thousand foot, and two thousand horse. There were also appointed for Supplies (if any misaduenture came to these) of the Sabines and Hetrurians fiftie thousand foot, and foure thousand horse; which Armie was to be lodged in the border of Hetruria. Of the Vmbri and Sarsinates, which inhabited the Apenines, there were twentie thousand; and of the Venetians and Cenomans, other twentie thousand: which latter Armies were directed, to inuade the Boi, that forcing them to defend their owne Territories, the generall Armie of the Gaules should be thereby greatly dimi-20 nished. There were besides these, to bee readic against all vincertaine chances of warre, thirtie thousand foot, and fifteene hundred horse, garrisond in Rome it selle, of their owne people; and of their Allies, thirtie thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Ouer and about these great troupes; in the Roll of the Latines, that was sent vnto the Senate, there were numbred fourescore thousand foot, and fine thousand horse; in that of the Samnites, seuentie thousand foot, and of horse seuen thousand; in that of the B lapyges, and Mellapyges, fiftie thousand foot, and sixteene thousand horse; the Lucays sent a list of thirtie thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the h Marsi, i Marrucini, k Ferentani, and the Vestimi, of twentie thousand foot, and foure thousand horse. The Romans had also two Legions in Sicil, and about Tarentum, 20 contayning eight thousand sourch undred foot, and sourch undred horse. So as of the Romans and Campans jointly, reckoning men armed, and fit to beare armes, there were registred two hundred and fiftie thousand foot; and of horse, three and twentie thou fand : of which, reckoning the Romans apart, there were an hundred and fiftie thousand foot, and about fixe thousand horse. Casting vp the whole forces of all the Provinces in Italie, both of the Romans and their Confederates, it amounted to feuen hundred thousand foot, and seuentic thousand horse. But the number is fomewhat miffe-cast by Polybius; not with a purpose to enrich himselfe by the dead paies: for where he reckons nine hundred horfe too many, he falls short nine thoufand two hundred of the foot.

How great focuer this Muster was, it seemes to have beene like vnto that, which Lodowick Sforza made, when Lowes the twelfth invaded Milan: at what time, the better to encourage himselfe, and his subjects, hectooke a Roll of all persons able to beare armes, within the Duchie, though indeed he were neuer able to bring a tenth Ferentines, fault part of them into the field. Certaine it is, that the battailes of Trebia, Trasimene, Leander. and Canne, did not confume any fuch proportion, as was answerable to this large accompt. Yet were the Romans faine to arme their flaues, even for want of other Souldiers, after their ouerthrowat Canne. Wherefore the maruaile is not great, that the Carthaginians and others were little terrified, with report of fuch a multitude. For all heads are not fit for helmets: though the Roman Citizens were, in generall,

50 as good fighting men, as elfewhere might be found. Notwithstanding all these counter-preparations, the Gaules keepe on their way: and entring into Tulcane, destroy, and put to fire and fword, all that lay before them. From thence they march directly towards Rome; hoping to finde the Romens, rather in deliberation, than in the field. But their intelligence failes them. For the Roman Armic, fent into Tuscane, having taken some other way than they did, and finding that it had miffed of them, came againe fast after them, to arrest them in their journie. Hereof when they heard the rumour, fearing to be charged on their backs, they turned head : and in the same euening discourred the Roman Armie, by whom they incamped. It was now a matter of apparant necessitie, that fight they must Wherefore they helped themselues with a stratageme: that shewed no great fineneffe of wit, but fuch, as well befeemed those that had none other occupation than warre; and flood them in good flead at the present. In the dead of the night, they cause their foot to march away, but not farre: leaving their horse in guard; to whom they give order, to come off at the first light of day, with such a speede, as might 10 rather argue a running away, than a retrait, as if they had not dared to abide buttaile. The Romans, interpreting this their haltic departure, as the Gaules defired they should, follow them in disorder. The Gaules returne; charge them; and kill fixe thousand upon the place; the rest take a peece of ground of aduantage, and defend themselues, till L. Emilius, being at Ariminum, comes to their succour. Vpon the comming of the Confull, the Gaules confult, whether they should give the Romans battaile, or forbeare. In which dispute, Anerocstus, one of their Kings, persuades them, rather to returne into their owne Countries; where after they had disposed of the great spoiles and riches which they had gotten, they should then renew the warre, being without carriage, pefter, or other impediment. This aduice they all 20 embrace; for feeing they that were Mercinaries, had obtained what they came for. to wit, the spoiles of their enemies; they thought it wisedome, to bazzard neither it, nor themfelues, any further.

This indeede had beenea good resolution, if they had taken it, before the enemie had beene in fight. But as well in the warres of these latter ages, as in former times, it hath euer beene found extreme dangerous, to make a retrait in the Head of an enemies Armie. For although they that retire, doe often turne head; yet in alwaies going on from the pursuing enemie, they finde within a few miles, either flreight, hedge, ditch, or place of disaduantage, which they are inforced to passe in disorder. In fuchcases, the Souldier knowes it, as well as the Captaine, that he which for sakes 30 the field, perceives, and feares, some advantage of the Enemies. Feare, which is the betraier of those succours that Reason offereth, when it hath once possess the heart of man, it caffeth thence both courage and vinderstanding. They that make the retrait, are alwaies in feare to be abandoned; they that leade the way, feare to be ingaged: and so the hindmost treads on his heeles that is foremost, and consequently, all difband, runne, and perifh, if those that fauour the retrait, be not held to it by men ofgreatcourage. The miserable overthrow, that the French received in 2/4ples, in the yeare 1503. vpon a retrait made by the Marques of Sal, doth testifie no leffe. For although a great troupe of French horse, sustayned the pursuing enemie a long time, and gaue the foot leifure to trotaway; yet being retarded by often turnings, the Spanish foot ouer-tooke, and defeated them vtterly. During the warres between the Imperials, and the French; Boist and Mont were lost at Brignolles, who in a brauerie would needes fee the enemie, before they left the field. So was Stroß? ouerthrowne, by the Marques of Marignan, because he could not be perswaded, to dislodge the night before the Marques his arrivall. Therefore did the French King Francis the first, wifely : when without respect of point of honour, he dislodged from before Landerfey, by night; as many other, the most adulfed Captaines, (not finding themselues in case to give battaile) have done. Je ne trouve point (sath the Marshall Moneve) au fait des armes chose si difficile, qu'one retrait; I sinde nothing in the arte of warre fo difficult, as to make a safe retrait. A sure Rule it is, that there 50 is leffe dishonour to dislodge in the darke, than to be beaten in the light. And hereof Mr. dela Noue giues this judgement, of a daies retrait, made in France, presently beforethe battaile of Moncountour. For (faith he) flaying vpon our reputation, in Thew not to diflodge by night; we lost our reputation indeede, by diflodging by day:

whereby we were forced to fight vpon our disaduantage, and to our roine. And yet did that worthic Gentleman, Count Lodowick of Naffau, brother to the late famous Princed Orange, make the rettait at Monotonition, with fo great refolution, as hee faued the one halfe of the Protestant Armie, then broken and disanded, of which my felle was an eye, witherse; and was one of them that had cause to thanke him for it.

Now the Gaules, embracing the fafe aduice (as they take it) of one of their Kings; turne their backs to the enemie, and their faces homeward. **Jemilius followes them, as neare as he can, without ingaging himfelfe attending his adunatage. In the meane while, C. **Jetilius the other Confull, with the Legions of Sardinia*, lands at Pifa; so as the Gaules, inclosed between etwo Armies, are forced to fight. They therefore equally firengthen their Reare, and Front, T. fo fulfatine **Jetilius* the very appoint the Gallestein, and the Salamois is in the Front, they range the Piemontois and the rest of the Gaulestein thabiting upon the Ruier of Po. The manner of the fight Polybius describeth at large: which was well fought of all hands. But in the end the Gaulesteil, and so did Attilus the Confull: who died in the place, accompanied with the two Kings of the Gaules (S. **Concolitanus* and **Aneroestus*), with fortic thousand of their Validias.

After this fatall ouerthrow, the Gaules Toft courage; and, ere long, all that they held in Italie. For they were inuaded the yeare following this ouerthrow, by the 20 new Confulls, Fuluius, and Manlius. The Romans knew well how to vie their victorie: they gaue not ten, twentie, or thirtie yeares time, to the Gaules, to repaire their forces, as the Gaules had done to them. These new Confulls beat the Boij ; but by reason of the great raines that fell, and the great pestilence that raigned, they were compelled for that present to surcease. In the second yeare, Furius, and Flaminius, inuade the Milanois; and prevaile very farre, being strongly assisted by the Conomanni and the Venetians. Neuertheleffe these Consulls were reuoked out of their Province, by the Senate of Rome, and compelled to refigue their Office: because the Augures, or South fayers, had found, that some token or other of the Birds (in which, and all forts of their divination, the Romans were extremely superstitious) had not 30 only foreshewed little good, when they were chosen, but had also nullified the election. C. Flaminius, receiving letters of this revocation, from the Senate, and being otherwiseaduertised of the contents, was not hastie to open them: but first gaue battaile vnto the enemies, vanquished them, and spoiled their Countrie; then pervsed the letters; and returning home obtavned a triumph, fore against the will of the Senate, and not altogether with good liking of the people, who yet bare him out, for that hee fided in faction with the Commonaltie, though a man of great Nobilitie.

This was that Flaminius, who had propounded the Decree, for dividing the Countrie of the Senones among the people of Rome. He was the first, or one of the first, that understanding the Majesshe of Rome is the wholly in the people, and no otherwise in the Senate, than by way of Delegacie, or grand Commission; did not stand highly upon his birth and degree, but courted the multitude, and taught them to know and vsc their power, ouer himselfs, and his fellow-Senators, in reforming their disorders. For this, the Commons highly esteemed him, and the Senators as deeply hated him. But he had the surers side and found imitatours, that rose by the same arte, which in processe of time, grew the only or chiefe way to preferment.

Flaminiss and his Colleague, being depoted; Aclaudius Marcellus, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio, were chosen Confulls, for the rest of that yeare. The Gaules about this time delired peace, and were like to have obtayned it: though the new Confulls yo were against it, as fearing to want worke. But when thirtie thousand of the Gessate following their King Britomarus, were come over the Alpes, and joyned with the Insulance and the Confulls has a lother discourse, there they betigged Averre, at owne not faire from You use to Garden the Alpes, and when the Fronius Country (so faire had the Romans pierced alreadie) in the Duchie of Assistant. To divert them from this fiege, Britemarus late downe before Classicium, a Towne in the same Track, with great part of his forces: leaving the rest, with the Insubriums, to attend vpon the Confulls at Aerrs, and to look to the defence of Assian. But this would not suffice, to make the Roman breake vp their slege. Date classic, taking with him the greatest part of the horse, and six hundred foot lightly armed, thought to deale well enough with those at Classiciums. Britemarus heard of the Confulls comming; and met him vpon the way: so suddenly, that the Romans had no leisure to rest themselves after their journie, but were compelled instantly to sight: Herein Ritionswin had done well; if he had not forthwith, in a rash braverie, lost his game at a cast. He had advantage enough in number, both of horse and foor: but hee thought so well to of his owner personal valour, that he rode out single before his Armie, proucking any one to fight with him. Asserblium was no lest daring, than the barbarous King: whether more wise in this action, I will not dispute; he was more fortunate, and that sufficed to commend him. He slue and distanced Britemarus, in presence of both Armies: whereby his owne men tooke such courage, and his enemies were 6 dismaid, that without much trouble of fight, the Romans obtained a great victorie.

This was the third and last time, that cuer any Roman Generall slue the Generall of the enemies, with his owne hand. To this kinde of victorie, belonged a peculiar triumph; whereof only Romulus, Cossins, and this Abareellus, had the honour; I daresay, that the two Seipios, and diuers other Roman Captaines, especially Cossin, 20 were better men of warre than any of these three; though they neuer offered up to I vp 17 ER, Opima spokes, The Armonn of a Generall, slaine by themsclues, when they were Generalls, not perhaps affected to to doe.

After this victorie, Acerra was yeeleded to the Romans; and Milan foone after: with all that belonged to the Cifalpines, or Gaules, that dwelt in Lumbardie. Thus was that valiant and mightie Nation, that had for fo many yeares weed the State of Rome, and in former times taken the Citiet felfe, brought to nothing in a fhort time; their pleafant and fertile Territorie polfeth by the Romans; and the remainder of thiefi Nation, inhabiting Italie, to many as would not fubject their necks to the Roman yoke, either forced to abandon their Countries, or to hide themselines in 30 the cold and barren Mountaines, like Out-lawes and Thecues. And thus did the Romans spend the three and twentie yeares, following the peace made with Cartage. In part of which time, they were at fuch leifure, that they closed with Cartage. In part of which time, they were at fuch leifure, that they closed with Cartage. In part of which they neuer did before, (it standing alwaics open, when they had any warre) sauce once, in the raigne of Namas; nor in long time after, untill the raigne of Augustus. But this their prefent happinesse was not to last long:

a dangerous warre, and perhaps the greatest that had euer beene, was to come vnto their gates; which being well ended, they might boldly vndertake, to extend their Monarchie as farre, as their ambition could reach.

10 The wirrs of HANNIBAL in Spaine. Quarrels betweene the Romans and Carthaginians.

HANNIBAL beforgets and taketh Sagantum; whileft the Romans are buffed with the Illyrians. Ware proclaimed betweene Rome and Carthage.

A N N 1 B A L, the fonne of Amilear, was about fixe and twentie yeares old, when hee was chofen Generall of the Carthogianis forces in Spaine. Hee was cleded by the Armic, as foone as Afandal was dead: and thee-lection was ratified by the fate at Carthage; wherewith Hanns and his Complices were nothing pleafed. This was now the third of the Barchine familie (fo called of Amilear, whofe furnam was Barcas) that had command in chiefe, ouer the men of warre. Which honour would perhaps have been leffe enuicd, by thefe domesticall enemies; if the Allies and Friends of the Barchine house, had not also borne the whole sway in government, and been the only men regarded, both by the Senate and the People. This generall goodwill, as it was first purchased by the most worthie deserts of Amilear, in saving his Countrie from imminent ruine, enlarging the Dominion thereof, and enriching it 20 with treasures, and great reuenewes; so was it retained by the same good artes . among his friends and followers. Hanno therefore, and his Partifans, being neither able to taxe the vertue of their enemies, that was vnreproueable; nor to performe the like feruices ynto the Common-weale; had nothing left, whereby to value themselves, excepting the generall reprehension of Warre, and cautelous advice, of not propoking the Romans. This they scaloned otherwhiles with detraction; saying, that the Barchine faction went about to oppresse the libertic of the Citic. But their malicious wordes were vnregarded; and if it were factious, to beare ill will to Rome, then were all the Citizens, (very few excepted) no leffe Barchine, than Hannibal himselfe. For it was long since apparent, that the oath of the Romans, to the ar-An ticles of peace, affoorded no fecuritie to Carthage; were fine neuer fo quiet, and officions: vnleffe face would yeeld to become their Subject. Since therefore the peace was like to hold no longer, than untill the Romans could finde some good advantage, to renew the Warre : it was rather defired by the Carthaginians, that whilest their owne state was in good case, the warre should beginne; than that in some vnhappie time of famine or pestilence, or after some great losse of Armie or Fleet, they should be driven to yeeld vnto the impudent demands of their enemies; and to give away basely their lands and treasures, as they had lately done; or miserably fight, vpon termes of disaduantage.

This disposition of his Countrimen, Hannibal well understood. Neither was he 50 ignorant (for his father, and other friends, had long time decinical of this businesses that in making warre with the Remans, it was no small advantage to get the flart of them. If once he could bring an Armicinto Italia, without molestation; there was good hope, that he should sind friends and assistants, euen of those people, that helped to increase the Reman atmics in forreigne wars. But this could neuer be effe.

cted, if the matter were openly diffouted at Carthage. For it was to be doubted, that the Carthagemin, how glad foeuer they would bee, to heare that he had fet the warre on foote, would neuertheleffe be flow and timorous, as commonly men are in the beginning of great enterprifes, if the matter were referred to their deliberation. Which if thould happen; then were the Romans like to be made acquainted, not onely with the generalities of his purpole, but with fuely particulars as mult be difficult of the world of, in procuring allowance to his deffigne. This might fuffice to diforder the whole Proied. Wherefore, he refolued to lay fiege vnto Saguntum; which might forme not greatly to concret the Romans; and would highly pleafe the Carthageminans, that had fresh in mind the indignitie, of that Spanish Townes alliance with their to false friends. So should hee assaic both the patience of his enemies, and the disposition on 6 his owne. Citizens.

Having this concluded, he neuertheleffe went faire and orderly to worke; and beginning with those that lay next in his way, approched vino Saguntum by degrees. This he did (faith Luie) to going fome colour to his proceedings: as if he had not principally intended the warre, againft Saguntum, but had beene drawne thither by courfe of business. Ye reason reachest plainly, that without regard of such formalities, it was needefull to finish the Conquet to the rest, before he did any thing that should proboke the Romans. First therefore he entred vpoints Territorie of the *Oleastes; and having belieged Althas (Linic callets) the Carteas) their chiefe cities became, in a sew dayes, Malter not only thereof, but of all the other townes of their Countrie. This Nation which he first vndertooke, being subdued, and the winter at hand; he rested his Armie in Now Carthage, or Carthagena; and imparted liberally to the Souldiers, the spoiles he had gotten in his late conjuest.

In the Spring following, he purfued the warre against the a Vaccet : and without any areat difficultie, wanne first Salmantica, now called Salamanca; and after it, b Arbueala, by affault: though not without a long fiege, and great difficultie. But in his returne, he was put to the heighth, both of his courage, and of his Martiall judgement. For all fuch of the Vaccai, as were able to beare armes, being made delperate by the spoile of their Countrie, with those of Salamanea, and of the Oleades, that 20 had escaped in the late ouer-throw, joyning themselues with the Toletans; compounded an Armie of an hundred thousand able men; and sayed Hannibal on the bankes of the River Tagus, which runneth to the Sea by Lisbourne in Portugale. Tacfe foure Nations, having had experience of Hannibals invincible courage, and that he neuer faw enemie, vpon whom hee durft not give charge; were throughly refouned, that his naturall valour would at this time no leffe neglect the cold aduice of discretion, than at other times it had seemed to doe, when the like great occasion perswaded him to vse it. But hee that makes himselfe a bodie of Crystall, that all men may looke through him, and discerneall the parts of his disposition; makes himselfe (withall) an Asse; and thereby teacheth others, either how to ride, or 40 drive him. Wife men, though they have fingle hearts in all that is just and vertuous; yet they are like coffers with double bottomes: which when others looke into, being opened, they see not all that they hold, on the sudden, and at once. It is true, that this subtile Carthaginian, when he served under Astrubal, was, of all the men of marke in the Armie, the most aduenturous. But that which may beseeme a Captayne, or inferiour Commander, doth not alwaies become a Chiefe; though it bath fometime succeeded well with such great ones, as have beene found more fortunate, than wife. At this time, our great Man of warre knew as well how to diffemble his courage, as at other times to make it good. For he with-drew himselfe from the River side, as if fearefull to foord it; thereby to draw ouer that great multi-tude, from their bankes of advantage. The Spaniards; apprehending this in such fort, as Hannibal defired that they should; thrust themselves in furie and disorder. into the swift streame, with a purpose to charge the Carthaginians, abandoning (as they thought for feare) the defences on the contrarie fide. But when Hapnibal faw them in their way, and well-neare ouer; hee turned back his Elephants, to entertayne them at their landing; and thruft his Horfe-men, both aboue and beneath them, into the Riuer. Thefe, carrying a kinde of Lance de 297, harpe at both ends, which they held in the middeft of the flaffe; had fuch an advantage ouer the foot, that were in the Riuer, vnder their firokes, clattered together, and vnable to moue or lhift their bodies, as on firme ground: that they liew all thofe, (in a manner) without refiltance, which were alreadic entred into the water; and purfied the reft, that fled like men amazed, with 60 great a flaughter, as from that day forward, there was not any Spaniard, on that fide the Riuer of therm, (the Sagnationies excepted) that had the daring to life up their handes again the Carthaginians.

The Sagnatines, perceiting the danger towards them; cryed before they were hurt. They fent Embaffadours to Rome, and bemoned themselves, as likely to fuffer that, which afterwards they fuffered indeede; only because of their alliance and friendship with this honourable Citie, which the Carthaginians hated. This tale moued the Senate : but much more a report, that Saguntum was alreadic belieged. Hereupon some crie out, that Warre should bee proclaymed by Land and Sea; as alfothat the two Confuls should be fent with Armies, the one into Spaine, the other into Africk ... But others went more Roman-like to worke; and carryed it. So it was only concluded; that Embaffadours should be sent into Spaine, to view the state of 20 their Confederates; which were indeede none other, than the Saguntines. For if Hannibal intended warre against Rome, it was likely, that he would give them, ere it were long, a more plaulible occasion to take armes against him; if hee had no such purpose; yet would it be in their power, to determine what they lifted themselues, voon the report of these Embassadours; and this their grauitie, in being not too rash at first, would scrue to countenance their following Decree. Of these Embasfadours Linie reports, that they found Hannibal before Saguntum; but could not get audience of him, and therefore went to Carthage, where also they were not regarded, nor heard. But Polybius, an Historian of finceritie leffe questionable, tels, that they found him at Carthagens and had conference with him , though fuch as 20 left them doubtfull. This is more agreable to the reft of Hannibal his whole course. And furely wee might wonder, why the Carthaginians should afterwards admit a

And furely wee might wonder, why the Carlinginian should afterwards admit a more peremptoric Embassage (as Linic confesses) and fall to disputation about the couenants of peace; if they had rejected that which was sent upon none other pretence, than preuention of warre.

Whilest the Embassadours passed to and fro, Hannibal prepared not only his forces, but some Roman pretences, against Sagantum. He found out Mamertines, or people that should doe as the Mamertines in Sicil had done for the Romans; and implore his helpe against the Saguntines. These were the Turdetani; a Nation adjoyning to Saguntum, and having many quarrells with them: (as happens commonly 40 among Neighbours) of which, Hannibal himselfe had hatched some. Finding therefore such an occasion, what soener it was, as made him able to say, that the Saguntines had first prouoked him, ere he medled with them ; he made no more adoc, but fate downe with his whole power before their Towne. Hee was now more fecure, than he had formerly been, of his owne Citizens: for that they had not entertayned the Roman Embassadours, with any trembling reverence, as of late yeares they had beene wont. Neuerthelesse, he was glad of any handsome colour, to shadow his actions; not only because the warre, which he so much desired, was not proclaimed, but that he might not be checked in his sourfe, as an open enemie, before hee could fet foot in Italie. The Romans had the like, though contrarie delire. They were glad 50 of the quarrell: as hoping, that Carthage, with all thereto belonging, should thereby in short space become their owne. Yet were they not hastic to threaten, before they were readie to strike; but meant to temporize, vntill they had an Armie in readinesse to be sent into Spaine, where they thought to make Saguntum, the seate of the Warre.

In the meane while, Demetriss Pharius, whom the Romans had made King ouer a great part of Illyria, rebelled against them; either for that hee found himselfe ouerftreightly tyed up by them, with hard conditions; or rather because hee was of an unthankefull disposition. The commotion of the Gaules, and afterward. the fame of the Carthaginian warre, emboldened him to despise his Benefactors and Patrons: whom he ought to have defended and aided, in all perills, even with the hazard of his whole efface, which hee had received of their gift. But hee was a Traitor to his owne Queene; and therefore dealt according to his kinde, with those that had rewarded him for being fuch. First, he built ships, and spoiled the Isles of Greece : against the couenants to which he was bound. Then he aduentured further, and sei- 10 fed yoon fome places, that the Romans kept in their owne hands. If he had become fooner, or rather if he had flaied fomewhat longer, he might have fped better. For the bufineffe with the Gaules, was ended; with Hannibal, not throughly begun; when he declared himselfe, by his doings, an enemie, and was vanquished. The Roman Conful, Emilius, was fent against him: who in seucn daies wan the strong Towne of Dimalum; and thereby brought such terror vpon the Countrie round about, that Embaffadors were fent from all places, to yeeld themselves, without putting him to further paines. Only the Citic of Pharus, in which Demetrius lay, prepared to relift: which it might have done long, if the hot headed Rebell had not been too foolish. Amilius landed a great part of his Armie, in the Isle of Pharus, by night; and be- 20 flowed them in couert; presenting himselfe the next morning, with twentie ships before the Towne, and offering to force the Hauen. Demetrius with all his power iffued out against the Consul; and was soone intercluded from the Towns, by those that lay in ambush. Wherefore he fled away through by-paths, to a creeke, where he had shipping readie for him, and embarqued himselfe : leaving all his estate vnto them, of whose liberalitie he first had it.

- This bulinesse, though it were soone dispatched, yet prevented it not the siege of Saguntum: before which Hannibal fate downe, ere Emilius was landed in Illyria. In the beginning of the fiege, the Carthaginians were much discouraged, by reason of the braue fallies made by the Saguntines; in one of which, their Generall received a dan- 20 gerous wound in the thigh, that caused him to lie many daies vnable to moue. Neuertheleffe he was not vimindfull of his worke in the meane while; but gaue order to raife certaine moueable Towers, that might equal those which were built on the walls of the Citie; and to prepare to batter the curtaines, and make a breach. These being finished and applied had soone wrought their effect. A great and large breach was made, by the fall of diners Towers, and a great length of wall; whereat an hor affault was given: but it was fo well fustained by the Saguntines, as the Carthaginians were not only beaten from the breach, and out of some ground within the Towne. which upon the first furie they had won; but they were pursued even to their owne trenches and camp. Neuertheleffe the Carthaginian Armie, wherein were about an 40 hundred and fiftie thousand men, did so wearie the townesmen with continual travaile, that at length it got within the walls; and was only hindred from taking full possession of the Citie, by some counter-workes of the Saguntines, that were also readie to be won. In this extremitie, there was one Alcon a Saguntine, that conveyed himselfe out of the Towne, to treat with Hannibal for some accord. But the conditions which the Carthaginian offered, were so seuere, and without all compasse of honour, as Alcon durst not returne to propound them to his countrimen. For Hannibal demanded all that they had; gold, filuer, plate, and other riches within the Citie: yea, the Citic it felfe to be abandoned by the Citizens; promifing, that hee would affigne some other place for their habitation : not allowing them, to carricout with 50 them any other thing, wherewith to fulfaine themselues, than the clothes on their backs; or other armes to defend them, than their nailes and teeth. Yet might they farre better have submitted themselves vnto this miserable appointment, (seeing thereby they might have enjoyed their lives, and faued the honor of their wives and daughters) daughters) than to hauerefled at the differction of the Conquerour, as foone after they did: by whom their wines and daughters were defloured before their faces; and all put to fword, that were aboue fourteeney eares of age. For it was a poore comfort, which a great number of them tooke; when not daring to fight, and fell their blond at the dearefl rate, they flut themfelues by like molt wretched creatures, in their owne houses, and therein burnt themselues with all that they had: fo dying wreuenged. The treasures found in Saguntum, which were very great, Hambulk tept, therewith to pay his Armie: the flaues, and other bootic, he diuded among his Souldiers; referuing some things of choice, wherewith to present his services are extended to the present of the pres friends at Carthage, and to animate them vnto the Warre. These tidings exceedingly vexed the Romans; who had good cause to because ie at their owne flownesse, in forbearing to send helpe vnto the Saguntines, that held out eight moneths, looking still for succour, in vaine. Wherefore they determined to repaire their honour, by taking sharpe reuenge. To this end they sent Embassadonrs againe to Carthage : demanding only, Whether it were by generall consent and allowance of the Carthaginians, that HANNIBAL had made warre upon Saguntum: which if they granted (as it seemed they would) then to give them defiance. Hereunto answere was made, in the Senate of Carthage, to this effect. That this their second Embaffage, how focuer qualified with milde words, was indeede more in folent than 20 the former. For in that, they only required justice against Hannibal; but in this, the very State and Common-wealth of Carthage, was vrged to pleade guiltie, or not quiltie. But (faid the Carthaginian speaker) whether the Generall of our Armie in Spaine, in belieging Saguntum, have only followed his owne counfaile; or whether he did it, by direction from vs: it is not the question which the Romans ought to aske vs. That which is indeede worthy examination or dispute, is; Whether it were lawfull, or unlawfull, for HANNIBAL to doe as hee bath done. For it belongs to vs, to call our owne Commanders in question, and to punish them according to their faults and errours; to you, to challenge vs, if wee have done any thing contrarie to our late League and Contract. It is true, that in our negotiation with Luctatius the 30 Conful, the Allies of both Nations were comprehended : but the Saguntines were nor then of your Allies, and therefore no parties to the peace then made; for of your Allies in the future, or of ours, there was no dispute. As touching the last apreement, betweene you and Afdrubal, wherein you will fay that the Saguntines were comprehended by name; it is you that have taught vs, how to answere that particular. For what society ou found in the Treatie betweene vs and Luctatius, to your owne disaduantage, you cast it vpon your Consuls presumption; as promifing those things, for which he had no warrant from the Senate and People of Rome. If then it bee lawfull for the Romans, to disauow the actions of their Confuls and Commanders, concluding any thing without punctuall and precise warrant; the 40 fame libertie may we also assume, and hold our selves no way bound in honour, to performe those bargaines, which Adrubal hath made for vs, without our commandement and confent.

This was an impertinent answere, and little better than a meere cauill. For Luctatius the Confull, in his Treatie of peace with the Carthaginians, had expressly referred the allowance thereof to the people of Rome. It had beene therefore much better, to have dealt plainely; and to have alleaged. That after this League was made, and confirmed on both parts, it was broken by the Romans. In robbing the Carthaginians of the sile of Sardinia, and withall of twelve hundred talents: which perjurie the state of Carthage, being now growneable, would revenge with open 50 warre. As for the Sagamines; it little skilled that the Romans had admitted them into consederacie, and forthwith inserted their names into the Treatie of peace with Marubal. feeing that the Treatie with Marubal. all other business between Roman and Carthage, following the violence and breach of peace, in taking away Sardinia, were no better than Roman injuries; as implying this commination, Dec.

what focuer wee require, elfe will wee make warre, without regard of our oath, which wee haue alreadie broken.

But this the Carthaginians did not alleage, forgetting, in heat of contention (as Polybins takes it) the best of their Plea. Yet since Linie himselfe doth remember and acknowledge, that the taking of Sardinia from the Carthaginians, did inflame the fnirit of Amilear with delire of reuenge: we may reasonably thinke, that the mention of this injurie was omitted, not so much upon forgetfulnesse, as for that it was not thought convenient, by ripping vp such ancient matter of quarrell, to shew that the warre, now towards, had long beene thought vpon, and like to be made with extraordinarie force; in other manner than heretofore. In conclusion, the Carthaginian to Senate moved the Roman Embaffadours, to deliver vnto them in plaine termes the purpoles of those that sent them, and the worst of that, which they had long determined against them : as for the Saguntines, and the confining of their Armies within Theres; those were but their pretences. Wherupon Q. Fabrus gathering vo the skirt of his Gowne, as if somewhat had beene laid in the hollow thereof, made this short reply: I have here (quoth he) in my Gown-skirt both Peace and Warre: make you (my Masters of the Senate) election of these two, which of them you like best, and purpose to embrace. Hereat all cryed out at once; Euen which of them you your felfe haue a fancie to offer vs. Marrie then (quoth Fabius) take the Warre, and share it among you. Which all the Affembly willingly accepted.

This was plaine dealing. To wrangle about pretences, when each part had refelued to make warre, it was meerely friuolous. For all these disputes of breach of peace, have over been emaintayned by the partie vnwilling, or vnable to fustaine the warre. The ruftie fword, and the emptic purfe, doe alwaies pleade performance of concenants. There have beene few Kings or States in the World, that have otherwise understood the obligation of a-T reatie, than with the condition of their owne aduantage and commonly (feeing peace between ambitious Princes, and States, is but a kinde of breathing) the best-aduised have rather begunne with the sword. than with the trumpet. So dealt the Arragonois with the French in Naples; Hanrie the second, of France, with the Imperialls, when he wrote to Brifac, to surprise as many places as he could, ere the warre brake out; Don John, with the Netherlands; and Philip the second, of Spaine, with the English, when in the great Imbarge he tooke all our thips and goods in his Ports.

But Hannibal, besides the present strength of Carthage, and the common feeling of injuries received from these enemies, had another private and hereditarie desire. that violently carried him against the Romans. His father Amilear, at what time he did sacrifice, being readie to take his journie into Spaine, had solemnely bound him by oath, to pursue them with immortall hatred, and to worke them all possible mischiese, as soone as he should be a man, and able. Hannibal was then about nine yeares old, when his father caused him to lay his hand upon the Altar, and make 40 this vow: fo that it was no meruaile, if the impression were strong in him.

That it is inhumane, to bequeath hatred in this fort, as it were by Legacie, it cannot be denyed. Yet for mine owne part, I doe not much doubt, but that some of those Kings; with whom wee are now in peace, have received the like charge from their Predeceffors, that as soone as their coffers shall be full, they shall declare themselves enemies to the people of England.

è. I I.,

HANNIBAL takes order for the defence of Spaine and Africk. His iournie into Italie .

Arre being thus proclaymed, Hannibal refolued, not to put up his fword, which hee had drawne against the Saguntines, vntill hee had therewith opened his passage vnto the gates of Rome. So began the fecond Punick Warre; fecond to none, that euer the Senate and People of Rome fustained. Hannibal wintred at Carthagena; where he licenced his Spanish Souldiers to visit their friends, and refresh themselves against the Spring. In the meane while he gaue instructions to his brother Afdrubal, for the gonernement of Spaine in his absence. Hee also tooke order, to fend a great many troupes of Spaniards into Africk, to equal the numbers of Africans formerly drawne thence into Spaine; to the end, that fo the one Nation might remaine as pledges and gages for the other. Of the Spaniards, he transported into Africh thirteen thousand, eight hundred, and fiftie foot, and twelue hundred horse; also eight hundred flingers of the * Baleares. Belides thele, he lelected foure thouland foot, all young men, * Maintee do and of qualitic, out of the best Cities of Spaine; which he appointed to be garrifond Minutes.

20 in Carthage it felfe, not fo much in regard of their forces, as that they might ferue for holtages: for among those foure thousand, the best of the Spanish Cirizens, and those that swayed most in their severall States, had their Sonnes or Kinsmen. Hee also left with his brother, to guard the coast and Ports, fiftie and senen Gallies; whereof thirtie feuen were prefently armed, and appointed for the warre. Of Africans, and other Nations strangers, he left with him about twelve thousand foot and two thousand horse, besides one and twentie Elephants.

Having in this forttaken order for the defence of Spaine and Africk; he fent Difcouerers before him, to view the passages of the Pyrenean Mountaines, and of the Alpes He alfo fent Embaffadors to the Mountainers of the Prienes, and to the Gaules.

30 to obtaine a quiet paffage: that he might bring his Armic entire into Italie, and not be compelled to diminish his forces, by any warre in the way, till hee came to encounter the Romans. His Embaffadors, and Discouerers, being returned with good fatisfaction; in the beginning of the Spring, he past ouer the River of Iberia, with an Armie consisting of fourescore and ten thousand foot, and twelve thousand horse. All those parts of Spaine, into which he had not entred before, hee now subdued : and appointed Hanno (not that old enemic of his house, who fate still at Carthage) to gouerne Spaine on the East fide of Iberus; to whom he left an Armie of ten thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Being arrived at the borders of Spaine, fome of his spanish Souldiers returned home, without asking leave: which that o-40 thers might not also doe, or attempt, he courteously dismissed many more, that seemed willing to be gone. Hereby it came to passe, that the journie seemed the lesse winning cook gone. The cook teams to partly that the obtained enterties redious vitor those that accompanied him; as being not enforced by compulsion. With therest of his armic confishing now but of fiftie thou land foot, and nine thou fand horse, he past the Pyrenees and entred into Gaule. He found the Gaules that bordered yoon Spaine, readie in Armes, to forbid his entrance into their Countrie : but wonne them, with gentle speech, and rich presents that he bestowed vpon their Leaders, to fauour his Expedition. So without any molestation, hee came to the banke of Rhodanus; where dwelt, on each fide of the River, a people called Volce. These were vnacquainted with the cause of his comming; and therefore sought to so keepe him from paffing ouer the water. But he was greatly affifted by fome of those Gaules, that inhabited on the West side of Bhodanus, to wit, by those of Vinaretz and Lionnois, For although many of them had transported themselves and their goods, into the Countrie of Daulphine; thinking to defend the further banke against him: yet fuch as remained, being defirous to free their Countrie of fo many ill guests, were better pleased to have their Countrimen beaten, which had abandoned them. than to have their owne store of corne and cattaile wasted, by the long stay of so great an Armie, as lay vpon them. For which reason, they helped him to make boates; informed him of another more easie passage, higher vp the River; and lent him guides. When the veffells for transportation of his Armie were in readinesse; he fent Hanno, the sonne of Bomilear, vp the River : himselfe in the meane while making countenance to enter the Foorde below. The end of this labour was: that Hanno charging the Ganles vnawares vpon their owne side, and Hannibal, at the same time, passing the River in their faces, the further banke was wonne, though with fome difficultie; and the enemies difperfed. Yet was hee greatly troubled in con- 10 ueying ouer his Elephants; who meruailously feared the water. He was therefore driven to make raffes of trees, and cover them with earth and turfe; whereof hee fastened one to each banke, that might serue as a bridge, to and from another, of the fame fort, but loofe, vpon which the beafts were towed ouer.

Having past this first brunt, and over-come both the rage of the River, and of those that defended it, he was visited by the Princes of the Gaules Cifalpines, that inhabited Piemont and Milan, who lately had revolted from the Romans. Thefeinformed him of the passages of the Alpes, that they were not so difficult, as common report made them; and from these he received guides, with many other encouragements. All which not withflanding; hee found himfelfe extremely incumbred by 20 the Savoians: and loft, both of his carriages, and of his Carthaginians, more than willingly he would, or had formerly thought that he should. For he was twice mainely affailed by them, before he could recouer the plaine Countries on the other fide. And whereas this iournic ouer the Mountaines cost him sifteene dayes trauaile, he was enery day, more or leffe, not only charged by those Mountainers, but withall, extremely beaten with grieuous weather and fnow: it being in the beginning of Winter, when he beganne, and ouer-came this passage. But the faire and fertile Plaines, which were now readie to receive them; with the affiftance and conduct of the Cifalpine Gaules, who by their proper forces had so often inuaded the Roman Territorie; gaue them great comfort, and encouragement to goe on : having no- 30 thing elfc of difficultie remayning, but that which from the beginning they made accompt to ouer-come, by their proper valour and refolution; namely the Roman Armies, and refiftance.

ð. III.

How the Romans in vaine (elicited the Spaniards and Gaules totake their part. The rebellion of the Cifalpine Gaules against the

He Countries of Spaine and Gaule, through which the Carthaginians marched thus farre, had beene follicited before, by the fame Roman Embaffadours, who had denounced the warre at Carthage. Thefe.as they were instructed by the Senate, tooke Spaine in their way homeward from Carthage, with a purpose to draw into the Roman Alliance, as many of the Cities and Princes as they could; at least, to disswade them from contracting any friendship with the Carthaginians. The first which they attempted, were the Volscians, a people in Spaine; from whom, in open affembly, they received by one that spake for the rest, this vncomfortable answere. With what face (saith 50 he) can yee Romans perswade vs to valew your Alliance, or to preferre it before the friendship of the Carthaginians; seeing we are taught by the example of the Saguntines, to be more wife, than so? For they, relying on your faith, and promised assistance, have beene veterly rooted out, and destroied by the Carthaginians; whom they might elfe haue held their affured friends, and good neighbours, as we, and other the people of Spaine haue found them. Yee may therefore be gone, with this resolution from vs, That for our parts (and so I thinke, I may answere for the rest of our Countrimen ) the Romans henceforth are not to expect any kindnesse at our handes: who are resoluted, neuer to make accompt of their protection, nor amitie. From the Volcians, the Embassadours tooke their way towards the Gaules; vsing their best arguments to perswade them, not to suffer the Carthagintans to passe into Italie, through their Territorie: and withall greatly glorifying themselues, their firength, and large Dominion. But the Gaules laught them to scorne, and had hard-10 ly the patience, to heare them speake. For shall we (said one of their Princes) by refifting Hannibals passage into Italie, entertaine a warre which is not meant to be made against vs? Shall we hold the warre among our selues, and in our owne Territorie. by force, which marcheth with a speedie pace from vs, towards our ancient enemics ? Haue the Romans deserved so well of vs, and the Carthaginians so ill, that wee should set fire on our owne houses, to saue theirs from burning ? No, wee know it well, that the Romans haue alreadic forced some Nations of ours, out of their proper Territorie and inheritance; and constrained others, as free as themselues, to pay them tribute. We will not therefore make the Carthaginians, our enemies; who haue no way as yet offended vs, nor we them.

With this vnpleasing answere the Embassadours returned home: carrying no good newes, of friends likely to helpe them; but rather some assurance from the people of Massilia, which were Confederates with Rome, that the Gaules were determined to take part with their enemic. Of this inclination, the Cifalpine Gaules gaue hastie proofe. For when the newes was brought into Italie, that the Carthaginians had passed Iberus, and were on the way towards Rome; this alone sufficed to stirre vp the Boij, and Insubrians, against the Romans. These people were lately offended at the plantation of new Roman Colonies, at Cremona, and Plucentia, within their Territories. Relying therefore vpon the Carthaginian fuccour, which they supposed to be now at hand; they laid aside all regard of those hostages, which they had given 30 to the Romans, and fell vpon the new Colonies. The Townes it seemes that they could not winne; for Hannibal shortly afterfailed to get them. But they forced the Roman Commissioners, (who belike were abroad in the Countrie) to flie to Modena: where they belieged them. The fiege of Modena had continued some small time; when the Gaules, having little skill in affaulting Cities, waxed wearie, and seemed defirous to haue peace, and to come to some good accord with the Romans. This they did of purpose, to draw on some meeting; that they might therein lay hand vpon the Roman Deputies, thereby to redeeme their Hostages, in way of exchange. And it fell out, in part, according to their wish. For the Romans sent out Embassadours to treat with them, and to conclude a peace; whom they detayned. Manlius the 40 Prætor, who lay in these quarters with an Armie, hearing this outrage; marched in all haste to the reliefe of the belieged. But the Gaules, having laid a strong ambush in a wood loyning to the way, fel vpon the Prætor so opportunely, as he was vtterly ouerthrowne, and all his followers left dead in the place; a few excepted, that recouered, by fast running, a little village, but defencible, vpon the River of Po. When this was heard at Rome, C. Atilius, another of the Prætors, was hastily sent, to relieue the belieged, with one Legion, and five thouland of the Roman affociates: which forces were taken out of the Confuls Armie, and supplied by a new leuie

As the Gaules were too rash and hastie: so were the Romans too slow, and indeede too ill-aduised, in the beginning of this warre. They were not perswaded, that 10 Carthage, which had almost scruilely endured so many indignities, in time of the late peace; would be fo braue and couragious on the fudden, as to attempt the conquest of Italie it selfe. Wherefore they appointed one of their Consuls, to make warre in Spaine, the other in Africk: refling secure of all danger at home. Titus Sempronius tooke his way toward Africk, with an hundred and threefcore Quinqueremes, or Gal-

lies, of fine to an Oare; which preparation may feeme to threaten even the Citie of Carthage, to which it shall not come neare. P. Cornelius Scipio, the other Conful. made all possible haste, by the way of Genoa, into Provence; and vsed such diligence. having the winde also fauourable, as in fine dayes he recovered Massilia. There hee was advertised, of Hannibal his having passed the River of Rhodanus; whom hee thought to have found busic yet awhile in Spaine. Hannibal had also newes of the Confuls arrivall; whereof he was neither glad, nor forrie; as not meaning to have to doe with him. Each of them fent forth Scouts, to discouer the others number and doings : Hannibal, about five hundred Numidians; Scipio, three hundred of his better appointed Roman horse. These met and fought, and the Numidians were 10 beaten; yet could not the Romans greatly bragge, having flaine only two hundred. and loft of their owne, one hundred and fortie. But when scipio drew neare, to have met with the Carthaginians; he found, that they were gone three dayes before; and that (as hee then found affuredly true) with an intent to looke vpon the walls of Rome. This interrupted his intended voiage into Spaine. Neuertheleffe hee fent away thither his brother Cn. Cornelius Scipio, with the greatest part of his Fleet and Armie, to trie what might bee done against Afdrubal, and the other Carthaginian Lieutenants in that Countrie. He himselfe, taking with him a few choice bands, returned by Sca to Pifa; and so passing through Tuscane into Lumbardie, drew together the broken troupes of Manlius and Milius, that lately had beene beaten by the 20 Gaules: with which forces he made head against the enemie, thinking to finde him over-laboured, with travaile of his painefull journie.

Iue moneths Hannibal had spent in his tedious journie from Carthage- 30 na; what great muster he could make, when hee had passed the Alpes, it is not easily found. Some reckon his foot at an hundred thousand, and his horse at twentie thousand; others report them to have been only twentie thousand foot, and fixe hundred horse. Hannibal himfelfe, in his Monument which he raifed, in the Temple of Juno Lacinia, agreeth with the latter fumme. Yet the Gaules, Ligurians, and others that joyned with him, are likely to have mightily increased his Armie, in short space. But when he marched Eastward from the bankes of Rhodanus, he had with him eight and thirtie thousand foot, and eight thousand horse; of which, all sauethose remembred by himselfe in 40 the Inscription of his Altar in Juno's Temple, are like to have perished, by diseases, enemies, Riuers, and Mountaynes; which mischiefes had deuoured, each, their seuerall shares.

Having newly passed the Apes, and scarce refreshed his wearied Armiein the Countrie of Piemont; he fought to winne the friendship of the a Taurini, who lay next in his way. But the Taurini held warre at that time with the Infubrians, which were his good friends; and refused (perhaps for the same cause) his amitie. Wherefore he affaulted their Towne; and wanne it by force in three dayes. Their spoile ferued well to hearten his Armie; and their calamitie, to terrifie the Neighbour places. So the Gaules, without more adoe, fell vnto his fide: many for feare, many to for good-wil, according to their former inclination. This disposition ranne through the whole Countrie: which joyned, or was all in a readinesse to joyne, with the Carthaginians; when the newes of Scipio the Conful his arrivall, made some to be more aduifed, than the reft. The name of the Romans was terrible in those quarters : what was in the Carthaginians, experience had not yet laid open. Since therefore the Roman Conful was already gotten through the most defencible passages, ere any speech had beene heard of his approch : many fate still, for very feare, who else would faine haue concluded a League with these new-come friends; and some, for greater seare, offered their service against the Carthaginians, whom neverthelesse they wished well to fpeede.

This wavering affection of the Province, whereinto they were entred, made the two Generals halten to the triall of a battaile. Their meeting was at Ticinum, now called Paula; where each of them wondred at the others great expedition: Hanni-10 bal thinking it strange, that the Conful, whom he had left behinde him on the other side of the Alpes, could meet him in the face, before hee had well warmed himselfe in the Plaines; Scipio admiring the strange aduenture of paffing those Mountaynes, and the great spirit of his Enemie. Neither were the Senate at Rome little amazed, at Hannibals successe, and sudden arrivall. Wherefore they dispatched a Messenger in all haste vnto Sempronius, the other Consul, that was then in Sicilia, giving him to vnderstand hereof; and letting him further know, that whereas he had beene directed to make the warre in Africa; it was now their pleasure that hee should forbeare to profecute any fuchattempt, but that hee should returne the Armie vnder his charge, with all possible speede, to saue Italie it selfe. According to this order, Sem-20 pronius sent off his Fleet from Lilybeum; with direction to land the Armie at Arminum, a Port Towne not farre from Rauenna: quite another way from Carchage, whither he was making haste. In the meane while, Scipio and Hannibal were come so neare, that fight they must, ere they could part asunder. Hereupon, both of them prepared the minds of their Souldiers, by the best arguments they had : vnto which Hannibal added the Rhetorick of a present example, that he shewed vpon certaine prisoners of the Savoyans, which he brought along with him, fitted for the purpose, into Italie. For these, having beene no lesse miserably settered and chained, than sparingly fed; and withall so often scourged on their naked bodies, as nothing was more in their delire, than to be delinered from their miseries by any kinde of present 20 death; were brought into the middle of the Armie: where it was openly demanded, which of them would fight hand to hand with some other of his Companions, till the one of them were flaine; with condition, being the Victor, to receive his libertie, and some small reward. This was no sooner propounded, than all of them together accepted the offer. Then did Hannibal cause lots to be cast, which of them should enter the List, with such weapons, as the Chieftaines of the Gaules were wont to vse in single combats. Euery one of these vnhappie men wished, that his owne lot might speede; whereby it should at least be his good fortune, to end his miseries by death, if not to get a reward by victorie. That couple, whose good hap it was to be chosen, fought resoluedly : as rather desiring, than fearing death; and having 40, none other hope, than in vanquishing. Thus were some few couples matched, it skilled not how equally for all these poore creatures were willing, vpon what soeuer vneuen termes, to ridde themselues out of slauerie. The same affection that was in these Combatants, and in their fellowes which beheld them; wrought also vpon the Carthaginians, for whom the spectacle was ordayned. For they deemed happie, not only him, that by winning the victorie had gotten his libertie, together with an horse and armour: but even him also, who being slaine in fight had escaped that miferable condition, vnto which his Companions were returned. Their Generall perceiuing what impression this dumbe shew had wrought in them; beganne to admonish them of their owne condition, speaking to this effect. That he had laid before them an example of their owne estates: seeing the time was at hand, wherein they were all to runne the same fortune, that these slaues had done; all to liue victorious and rich; or all to die, or (which these prisoners esteemed farre more gricuous) to liue in a perpetuall slauerie: That none of them all, in whom was common sense, could promife to himselfe any hope of life by flight; since the Mountaines, the Ri-

uers, the great diflance from their owne Countries, and the purfuit of mercileffe Enemies, mult needes retrench all fuch impotent imaginations. He therefore praied them to remember, that they, who had euen now praifed the fortune both of the Victor, and of the vanquilhed, would make it their ownecafe; feeing thiere was neuer any in the world, appointed with fuch a refolution, that had euer beene broken, or beaten by their enemies. On the contraire, he tool them, that the Romans, who were to fight vpon their owne foile, and in view of their owne Townes; who knew as many waites to faut themfelues by flight, as they had bodies of men to fight with-all, could now ay entertaine fuch a refolution as theirs: feeing the fame necessfite, (to which nothing feemes impossible) did no way presset them, to constraine them. To In this fort did Hannibal, with one shall all argument, That there was a mease, between Pritorreand Death, encourage his Companions. For (faith a great Captayne of France) la commostite de la retraiste aduance la futte. The commoditie of a retrait, dath of severally aduance a shart naming away.

Scipio, on the other fide, after that he had given order for the laying of a bridge ouer the River of Ticinus, did not neglect to vie the best arguments and reasons hee could, to encourage the Armie he led: putting them in minde of the great conquests and victories of their Ancestors; against how many Nations they had prevailed; and ouer how many Princes, their Enemies, they had triumphed. As for this Armic commanded by Hannibal, although it were enough to tell them, that it was no 20 better than of Carthaginians, whom in their late warre they had so often beaten, by Land and Sea; yet he prayed them withall to confider, that at this time it was not only fo diminished in numbers, as it rather seemed a troupe of Brigants and Theeues, than an Armie like to encounter the Romans; but fo weather-beaten, and starued, as neither the men, nor horses, had strength or courage to sustante the first charge that should be given voon them. Nay (said he) yee your selves may make judgement what daring they have now remayning, after fo many travailes and miferies; freing when they were in their best strength, after they had past the Roane, their horse-men were not only beaten by ours, and driven back to the very Trenches of their Campe, but Hannibal himselfe, fearing our approch, ranne head long towards 20 the Alpes: thinking it a leffe dishonour, to die there by frost, famine, and precipitation, than by the tharpe twordes of the Romans, which had to often cut downe his people, both in refrica, and in Sicil.

It was not long after this, ere the two Generalls met: each being farre advanced before the groffe of his Armie, with his Horfe; and the Roman having also with him fome light-armed foot, to view the ground, and the enemies countenance. When they discovered the approach one of the other; Scipio sent before him his horsemen of the Gaules, to beginne the fight, and bestowing his Darters in the void ground betweene their troupes, to affift them: himfelfe with his Roman men at armes, following foftly in good order. The Gaules (whether defirous to trie the mettall of the 40 Carthaginians, or hoping thereby to get fauour of the Romans) behaued themselucs couragiously, and were as couragiously opposed. Yet their foot that should have aided them, shranke at the first brunt, or rather fled cowardly away, without casting a Dart; for feare of being troden downe by the enemies horse. This notwithstanding the Gaules maintayned the fight, and did more hurt than they received: as prefuming that they were well backt. Neither was the Conful vnmindfull to relieue them : their hardinesse deserging his gide; and the hastie slight of those that should haue flood by them, admonishing him that it was needfull. Wherefore hee aduentured himselfe so farre, that he received a dangerous wound; and had beene left in the place, if his sonne (afterward surnamed Africanus) had not brought him off: 50 though others give the honour of this refeue, to a Ligurian flaue. Whilest the Romans were bulied in helping their Conful; an vnexpected ftorme came driving at their backs, and made them looke about how to helpe themselves. Hannibal had appointed his N umidian light horse, to give vpon the Romans in flanke, and to compaffe them about, whileft he with his men at armes fuffained their charge, and met them in the face. The Namidians performed this very well: cutting in peeces the feattered foot, that tanne away at the fift encounters, and then falling on the backs of thole, whole lookes were faltened vpon Hamibal and Scipio. By this imprefison, the Koman were fluitled together, and rowced: 16 that they all betooke them to their foeede, and left wnto their enemies the honour of the day.

when Sepio faw his horfe thus beaten, and the reit of his Armie thereby greatly discouraged the thought is a point of wisedome, having lost so many of his Fleet vpon the first puffe of winde, to take Port with the rest, before the extremes of the voon the first patie of winde, to take Port with the Test, better the extrement of the tempest oue-trooke him. For he saw by the lowring morning, what manner of day it was like to proue. Therefore his battaile of soot being yet vubroken, hee in a manner shole, the retrait; and recovered the bridge ouer Trianus, which he had formerly built. But notwithstanding all the haste that he made, heelest sike hundred of his Reare behinde him: who were the last that should have passed, and staid to breake the bridge. Herein he followed this rule of a good man of warre, Steetsamen quandos, dubium videatur, tastam mulet arripiat fugum: [uza min sliquando laudanda: which must be vnderstood in this fort; st. a Generall of an Armie, by some empositeres us beginnings doubt the successe; to finde his Armie searful or wavering; it is more profitable to stead a soft extrait, than to abide the omeerstain eacast of battail.

It was two dayes after, ere Hammbal could paffe the River; Scipio the whileft refetting his men, and cafing himselfe of his wound in Platentis. But as Soone as Hammbal preferred his Armie before the Towne, offering battaile to the Remans, who durft not accept it, nor iffue forth of their campe; the Gaules; that hitherto had followed Scipio for feare, gathered out of his feare courage to forfake him. They thought that now the long-desired time was come, in which better Chieffaines and Souldiers, than Aneres Ilus, Britmanus, and the Gesslate, were come to helpe them: if they had the hearts to helpe themselves. Wherefore the same night they fell vpon the Reman campe; wounded and slew many 5 efpecially of those guards that kept watch at the gate; with whose heads in their hands, they field outer to the Cartaginians, and presented their service. Hammbal received them exceeding courteoully, and dissimily them to their owne places: as men likely to bee of more vestoo him, in personaling the rest of their Nation to become his Consederates, than in any other feruice at the present.

About the fourth watch of the night following, the Consul stale a retrait, as hee had done before; but not with the like ease and securitie. *Hannihal* had a good eye yoon him; and ere he could get farre, sent the *U smidian* after him: following himselfe with all his Armie. That night the *Romans* had received a great blow, if the Numidians, greedie of fpoile, had not staid to ransack their campe; and thereby giuen time to all, saue some sew in Reare, that were slaine or taken, to assist the Ruer 40 of Trebia, and sauc themselues. Seipio, being both vnable to trauaile by reason of his wound, and withall sinding it expedient to attend the comming of his fellow-Conful; incampes himselfe strongly ypon the bankes of Trebia. Necessitier equired that he should do does, yet this diminished his reputation. For euery day, more and more of the Gaules sell to the Cartheginian side; among whom came in the Boi, sthat brought with them the Roman Cömissioners, which they had taken in the late Insurrection. They had hisherto kept them as Pledges, to redeeme their owne Hostages: but now they deliuer them yo to Hamibal, as tokens and pledges of their assessment in his work of helpe they conceived better hope of recovering their owne men and lands. In the meane while, Hamibal, being in great scarcitic of victualles, so attempted the taking of Classidium, a Towne wherein the Romans had laid yp all their thore and munition. But there needed no sorce; a Brundassan, whom the Romans had laid yp all their thore and munition. But there needed no sorce; a Brundassan, whom the Romans had laid yp all mans had trufted with keeping it, fold it for a little monie.

The newes of these disasters, brought to Reme, filled the Senate and People, rather ther with a defire of haltie reuenge, than any great forrow for their loffe received: feeing that, in a manner, all their foot, wherein their strength and hope consisted. were as yet entire. They therefore halled away Sempronius, that was newly arriued, towards Ariminum, where the Armie, by him fent out of Sicil, awaited his comming. He therefore hasted thither; and from thence be marched speedily towards his Colleague: who attended him vpon the bankes of Trebia. Both the Armies being joyned in one, the Confuls denifed about that which remained to bee done: Sempronius receiping from Scipio the relation of what had paffed fince Hannibals arrivall; the fortune of the late fight; and by what errour or miladuenture the Romans were therein foiled: which Scipio chiefly laid on the repolt and treason of to Sempronius, having received from Scipio the state of the affaires in those parts: fought by all meanes to trie his fortune with Hannibal, before Scipio were recoursed of his wounds, that thereby he might purchase to himselfe the sole glorie of the victorie, which he had alreadie, in his imagination, certainely obtayned. He also feared the election of the new Confuls: his owne time being well-neare expired. But Scipio perswaded the contrarie; objecting the vnskilfulnesse of the new-come Souldiers ; and withall gaue him good reason, to assure him, that the Gaules, naturally vn. constant, were upon termes of abandoning the partie of the Carthaginians; those of them inhabiting betweene the Riuers of Trebia, and Po, being alreadic repolted, 20 Sempronius knew all this as well as Scipio: but being both guided and blinded by his ambition, he made hafte to finde out the difhonour, which he might otherwise eafily have avoided. This resolution of Sempronius was exceeding pleasing to Hannibal, who feared nothing to much as delay and loffe of time. For the strength of his Armie, confishing in strangers, to wit, in Spaniards and Gaules; he no leffe feared the change of affection in the one, than the impatiencie of the other; who being farre from their owne home, had many passions mouing them to turne their faces towards it. To further the defire of Sempronius, it fell out fo, that about the same time, the Gaules inhabiting neare vnto Trebia, complained of injuries done by the Carthaginians. They did not supply Hannibal with necessaries, as hee supposed that 20 they might have done; although hee daily reprehended their negligence, telling them, that for their fakes, and to let them at libertie, hee had undertaken this Expedition. Seeing therefore how little they regarded his wordes, he was bold to be his owne Caruer; and tooke from them by force, as much as he needed of that which they had. Hercupon they flie to the Romans for helpe: and, to make their tale the better, fay that this wrong is done them, because they refused to joyne with Hannibal. Scipio cared not much for this : he suspected their fallhood, and was assured of their mutabilitie. But Sempronius affirmed, that it flood with the honour of Rome. to preserve the Confederates from suffering injurie; and that hereby might be won the friendship of all the Gaules. Therefore he sent out a thou sand horse: which com- 40 ming vnlooked for vpon Hannibal his forragers, and finding them heavie loaden.cut many of them in peeces, and chaced the rest euen into their owne campe. This indignitic made the Carthaginians fallic out against them : who caused them to retire falter than they came. Sempronius was readie to back his owne men; and repelled the enemies. Hannibal did the like. So that at length, all the Roman Armic was drawne forth; and a battaile readie to bee fought, if the Carthaginian had not re-

This victoric (for fo the Conful would have it called) made the Romans in penerall defirous to trie the maine chance in open field : all the perswasions of Scipio to the contrarie notwithstanding. Of this disposition Hannibal was aductised by 50 the Gaules, his spies, that were in the Roman Campe. Therefore he bethought himfelfe how to helpe forward the victorie, by adding fome stratagem to his forces. He found in the hollow of a water-course, ouer-growne with high reede, a fit trench to couer an ambush. Thereinto he cast his brother Mago, with a thousand choice horse, and as many foot. The rest of his Armie, after they had well warmed. and well fed themselues, in their campe, he led into the field, and marched towards the Conful. Early in the morning, he had fent ouer Trebia some companies of Numidian light horse: to braue the enemie, and draw him forth to a bad dinner, ere he had broken his fast. Sempronius was readie to take any opportunitie to fight : and therefore not only iffued out of his campe, but foorded the River of Trebia, in a most cold and miserable day; his foot being wet almost to the arme-holes: which, together with the want of foode, did so enfeable and coole their courages, as they wanted force to handle the armes they bare. Strong they were in foot, as well of their owne Nation, as of the Latines : having of the one, fixteene, of the other, twentie thousand. The masse of these they ranged in a grosse Battalion, guarded on the flankes with three thousand horse: thrusting their light armed, and Darters, in loose troups in the head of the rest, in the nature of a Vantguard. The Carthaginian numbers of foot, werein a manner equall to their enemies; in horse, they had by farre the better, both in number and goodnesse. When therefore the Roman horse, ranged on the flankes of their foot, were broken by the Namidians; when their foot were charged both in front and flanke, by the Spaniards, Gaules, and Elephants; when finally the whole Armie was vnawares preft in the Reare, by Mago and his two 20 thouland, that role out of their place of ambush: then fell the Romans, by heapes. vnder the enemies swordes; and being beaten downe, as well fighting in disorder, as flying towards the River, by the horse-menthat pursued them, there escaped no more of fixe and thirtie thousand, than ten thousand of all forts. Horse

Three great errours Sempronius committed, of which every one deserved to be recompenced with the loffe that followed. The first was, that hee fought with Hennibal in a Champaine, being by farre inferiour in horse, and withall thereby fubicat to the African Elephants, which in inclosed or vn-even grounds, and woodlands, would have beene of no vie. His second errour was, that he made no disco-30 perie of the place vpon which he fought; whereby he was grofly ouer-reacht, and infnared, by the ambulh which Hannibal had laid for him. The third was, that he drencht his foot-men with emptic stomachs, in the River of Trebia, even in a most cold and frostic day, whereby in effect they lost the vse of their limbs. For as one faith well; There is nothing more inconvenient and perilous, than to prefent an Armie, tyred with trauaile, to an enemie fresh and fed; since where the strength of body faileth, the generolitie of minde is but as an unprofitable vapour.

The broken remainder of the Roman Armie, was collected by Scipio, who got therewith into Placentia; stealing away the same night, which was exceeding raynic, from the Carthaginians; who either perceived him not, because of the shewers; or 40 would not perceive him, because they were over-wearied. Sempronius escaped with extreme danger; flying through the Countrie that was ouer-runne by the enemies horse. Hee was attended by more, than were requisite in a sccret flight; yet by fewer, than could have made reliftance, if the enemie had met with him. Neuertheleffe hee got away, and came to Rome, where hee did his office in chooling new Confuls for the yeare following: and then returned into his Province, with a fresh fupply against Hannibal.

The departure of HANNIBAL from the Cifalpine Gaules into Hetruria. FIAMINIUS the Roman Conful flaine; and his Armie destroyed by the Carthaginians, at the Lake of

He Winter growing on apace, was very sharpe, and vnfit for service: to the great contentment of the Romans, who being not able to keepe 10 the field, lay warme in Placentia, and Cremona. Yet Hannibal did not fuffer them to rest very quiet : but vexed them with continuall alarmes; affayling divers places; taking fome; beating the Gaules their adherents; and winning the Ligarians to his partie, who presented him, in token of their faithfull love, with two Roman Ouxflors or Treasurers, two Colonels, and fiue Gentlemen the Sonnes of Senatours, which they had intercepted. Thefe, and in generall all fuch Prifoners as he had of the Romans, he held in streight places, loden with yrons, and miserably sed: those of their followers hee not only well entreated, but sent them to their Countries without ransome; with this protestation, That he therefore undertooke the Warre in Halie, to free them from the 20 oppression of the Romans. By these meanes hee hoped, and not in vaine, to draw many of them to his partie and affiliance. But the Gaules were not capable of fuch perfuations. They flood in feare, left hee fhould make their Countrie the feate of the Warre, and perhaps take it from them. They were also more grieved than reason willed them, at his feeding vpon them, and wasting their Territorie. Wherefore some of them conspired against his life; others admonished him of the danger: and these that gaue him the aduice, were readic soone after to practise against him; but were in like fort detected. He was therefore glad to vie Perwigs of haire, and false beards of divers colours, to the end that he might not be described, nor known, to those that should vndertake to make him away. Faine hee would have passed to the Apennines, vpon the first appearance of Spring; but was compelled by the violence of weather, to tarrie among the Gaules, till hee had seen more Swallowes than one. At length, when the yeare was fomewhat better opened, he refolued to take his leave of these giddie Companions, and bring the warre nearer to the gates of Rome. So away he went, having his Armie greatly increased with Liqurians and Ganles; more serviceable friends abroad, than in their owne Countrie. That the passage of the Apernine Mountaines was troublesome, I hold it needlesse to make any doubt. Yet fince the Roman Armies found no memorable impediment, in their marches that way : the great vexation which fell vpon Hannibal, when hee was tranailing through and ouer them, ought in reason to be imputed rather to the 40 extremitie of Winter, that makes all wayes foule, than to any intolerable difficultie in that journie. Neuerthelesse to avoid the length of way, together with the refistance and fortifications, which may not improbably be thought to have beene crected upon the ordinarie passages towards Rome: he chose at this time, though it were with much trouble, to trauaile through the Fennes and rotten grounds of Tufeanc. In those Marishes and bogges, he lost all his Elephants, sauc one, together with the vie of one of his eyes; by the moistnesse of the aire, and by lodging on the cold ground, and wading through deepe mire and water. In briefe, after hee had with much adoe recoursed the firme and fertile Plaines; he lodged about Arretium: where hee fomewhat refreshed his wearied followers, and heard newes of the 50 Roman Confuls.

C. Flaminius, and Cn. Seruilius had of late beene chosen Consuls for this yeare: Seruilius, a tractable man, and wholly gouerned by aduice of the Senate; Flaminius, an hot-headed popular Orator; who having once been robbed (as hee thought) of his Confulthip, by a deuice of the Senators, was afraid to be ferued to againe, vnleffe hee quickly finished the warre. This jealous Conful thought it not best for him to be at Rome, when he entred into his Office, left his adversaries, by favning fome religious impediments, should detaine him within the Citie, or finde other bufinesse for him at home, to disappoint him of the honour, that hee hoped to get in the Warre. Wherefore he departed feeretly out of the Towne; and meant to take possession of his Office, when the day came, at Ariminum. The Fathers (so the Senators were called) highly displeased with this, renoked him by Embassadors : but he neglected their injunction; and hasting to meet with the Carthaeinians tooke his way to Arretium, where he shortly found them.

The fierie disposition of this Conful, promised vnto Hannibal great affurance of victoric. Therefore he prouoked, with many indignities, the vehement nature of the Roman: hoping thereby to draw him vnto fight, ere Seruilius came with the reft of the Armie. All the Countrie betweene Fefula and Arretium, hee put to fire and fword, even under the Confuls noie, which was enough to make him flirre, that would not have fitten ftill, though Hannibal had beene quiet. It is true, that a great Captayne of France hath faid : Pays gaste v'elle pas perdu: A walled Countrie is not thereby lost. But by this waste of the Countrie, Flaminius thought his owne honour on to be much impaired; and therefore advanced towards the Enemie. Many advifed him (which had indeede beene best) to have patience awhile, and stay for his Colleague. But of this he could not abide to heare: faying, that he came not to defend Arretium, whilest the Carthaginians went, burning downe all Italie before them. to the gates of Rome. Therefore he tooke horse; and commanded the Armie to march. It is reported as ominous, that one of their Enlignes stuck so fast in the ground, as it could not be plucked up by the Enfigne-bearer. Of this tale, whether true or falle, Tullie makes a jeast : faying, that the cowardly knaue did faintly pull at it (as going now to fight) having hardily pitched it into the earth. Neither was the answere of Flaminius (if it were true) disagreeable hereto. For he commanded, that 20 it should be digged up, if feare had made the hands too weake to lift it : asking with all; whether letters were not come from the Senate, to hinder his proceedings. Of this jealousie, both hee, and the Senate that gaue him cause, are likely to

All the Territorie of Cortona, as farre as to the Lake of Thrafymene, was on a light fire; which whilest the Consul thought to quench with his enemies bloud, he purfued Hannibal fo vnaduifedly, that he fell, with his whole Armic, into an ambufft cunningly laid for him, betweene the Mountaines of Cortona, and the Lake. There was he charged vnawares, on all fides, (faue only where that great Lake of Perufia, permitted neither his enemies to come at him, nor him to flie from them) knowing 40 not which way to turne, or make refiltance. So was hee flaine in the place, accompanied with fifteene thousand dead carkasses of his Countrimen. About fixe thoufand of his men, that had the Vantguard, tooke courage, as for the most part happens, out of desperation; and breaking through the enemies, that stood in their way, recouered the tops of the Mountaines. If these had returned, and given charge vpon the Carthaginians backs, it was thought that they might have greatly amended, if not wholly altered, the fortune of the day. But that violence of their feare, which, kindled by necessitie, had wrought the effects of hardinesse; was well asswaged, when they cealed to despaire, of fauing their liues by flight. They flood still, in a cold fweat, vpon the Hill-top; hearing under them a terrible noise, but not discoso usering how things went, because of the great fogge that held all the morning. When it grew toward noone, the aire was cleared, and they might plainly differne the lamentable flaughter of their fellowes. But they flaid not to lament it : for it was high time, they thought, to be gone, ere they were descried, and attached by the enemies horse. This they should have thought your somer; since they had no minde to returne vnto the fight. For descried they were, and Maharbal sent after them; who ouer-tooke them by night in a village, which hee furrounded with his horse: and so they yeelded the next day, rendring their armes, ypon his promise of their lives and liberties. This accord Hannibal refused to confirme; faying, that it was made by Msharbal, without sufficient warrant, as wanting his authoritie to make it good. Herein he taught them (yet little to his owne honour) what it was to keepe no faith : and fitted them with a trick of their owne. For if it were lawfull vnto the Romans, to alter couenants, or adde vnto them what they lifted; if the Carthaginians must be faine to pay certaine hundreds, and yet more hundreds of talents. To besides their first bargaine; as also to renounce their interest in Sardinia, and beelimited in their Spanish Conquests, according to the good pleasure of the Romans. whose present advantage is more ample, than the conditions of the late concluded peace; then can Hannibal bee as Roman, as themselves; and make them know, that perfidiousnesse gaineth no more in prosperitie, than it looseth in the change of fortune. Fifteene thousand Italian prisoners, or thereabout, hee had in his handes : of which all that were not Romans, he fet free without ranfome; protesting, as he had done before, that it was for their fakes, and to free them and others from the Roman tyrannic, that he had vndertaken this warre. But the Romans he kept in fireight prifon, and in fetters; making them learne to cate hard meat. This was a good way, to an breede in the people of Italie, if not aloue of Carthage, yet a contempt of Rome : as if this warre had not concerned the generall safetie, but only the preserving of her owne neck from the yoke of flauerie, which her ouer-flrong enemies would thruft vpon her, in reuenge of her oppressions. But an ancient reputation, confirmed by fuccesse of many ages, is not lost in one or two battailes. Wherefore more is to be done, ere the Carthaginian can get any Italian Partifans.

Presently after the battaile of Thrasymene, C. Centronius, with foure thousand Roman horse, drew neare vnto the Campe of Hannibal. Hee was sent from Ariminum. by Seruilius the other Conful, to increase the strength of Flaminius: but comming too late, he increased only, the misaduenture. Maharbal was imployed by Hannibal, 30 to intercept this companie; who finding them amazed with report which they had newly heard of the great overthrow, charged them, and brake them; and killing almost halfe of them, draue the rest vnto an high peece of ground, whence they came downe, and fimply yeelded to mercie, the next day. Servilius him felfe was in the meane while skirmishing with the Gaules; against whom hee had wrought no matter of importance, when the newes were brought him, of his Colleagues ouerthrow and death in Hetruria; that made him haften back to the defence of Rome.

In these passages, it is easie to discerne the fruits of popular jealousie, which perfwaded the Romans to the yearelie change of their Commanders in the wars: which greatly endangered, and retarded the growth of that Empire. Certaine it is, that all 40 men are farre better taught by their owne errours, than by the examples of their fore-goers. Flaminius had heard, in what a trap Sempronius had beene taken but the yeare before, by this fubtile Carthaginian; yet fuffered he himselfe to be caught soon after in the same manner. He had also belike forgotten, how Sempronius, fearing to be prevented by a new Conful, and ambitious of the fole honour of beating Hannibal in battaile, without helpe of his companion Scipio, had been rewarded with thame and loffe: elfe would be not, contrarie to all good aduice, have been fo haftie to fight, before the arrivall of Servilius. If Sempronius had beene continued in his charge, it is probable that he would have taken his companion with him the fecond time, and have searched all suspected places, proper to have shadowed an ambush: 50 both which this new Conful Flaminius neglected. We may boldly avow it, that by being continued in his Gouernement of France ten yeares, Cafar brought that mightie Nation, together with the Helvetians and many of the Germans, under the Roman yoke; into which parts had there beene every yeare a new Lieutenant sent, they would hardly, if cuer, have beene subdued. For it is more than the best wir in the World can doe, to informe it felfe, within one yeares compaffe, of the nature of a great Nation, of the Factions, of the Places, Rivers, and of all good helpes, whereby to profecute a warre to the best effect. Our Princes have commonly left their Deputies in Ireland three yeares; whence, by reason of the shortnesse of that their time, many of them have returned as wife, as they went out; others have profited more, and yet when they beganne but to know the first rudiments of Warre, and Government, fitting the Countrie, they have been called home, and new Apprentices fent in their places, to the great prejudice both of this and that Estate. But 10 it hath euer beene the course of the World, rather to follow old errours, than to examine them: and of Princes and Gouernours, to vp-hold their flothful ignorance, by the old examples and policie of other ages and people; shough neither likeneffe of time, of occasion, or of any other circumstance, have persuaded the imitation.

ð. V I.

How O. FABIVS the Roman Dictator, Sought to consume the force of HANNIBAL, by lingring warre, MINVIIVS, the Master of the Horse, honoured and aduanced by the People, for bold and successefull attempting, adventures rashly upon HANNIBAL; and is like to perish with his Armie, but relcued by FABIVS.

Reatly were the Romans amazed, at this their ill successe, and at the danger apparent; which threatned them in more terrible manner. than euer did warre, since Rome it selfe was taken. They were good Souldiers; and so little accustomed to receive an overthrow; that when Pyrrhus had beaten them, once and againe, in open field, all

Italie was strangely affected with his successe, and held him in admiration, as one that 20 could worke wonders. But Pyrrhus his quarrell was not grounded upon hate: hee only fought honour, and fought (asit were) vpon a brauerie: demeaning himfelfe like a courteous enemie. This Carthaginian detested the whole Roman name; against which he burned with desire of reuenge. Ticinum, Trebia, and Thrasymene, witnessed his purpose, and his abilitie. Which to withstand, they sed vnto a remedie that had long beene out of vie, and created a Dictator. The Dictators power was greater than the Confuls, and scarcely subject vnto comptroll of the whole Citie. Wherefore this Officer was feldome chosen, but upon some extremitie, and for no longer time than fixe moneths. He was to be named by one of the Confuls, at the appointment of the Senate; though it were forthat the Conful (if he stood vpon his 40 prerogatiue) might name whom he pleafed. At this time, the one Conful being dead, and the other too farre off; the People tooke your them, as having supreme authoritie, to give the Dignitic by their election, to Q. Fabius Maximus, the best reputed man of warrein the Citie. Novum factum, novum consilium expetit; Contrarie windes, contrarie courses. Q. Fabius chose M. Minutius Rufus Master of the horse: which Officer was customarily, as the Dictators Lieutenant; though this Minutius grew afterwards famous, by taking more vpon him.

The first act of Fabius, was the reformation of somewhat amisse in matter of religion : a good beginning, and commendable; had the Religion beene also good. Butifit were true (as Limereports it) that the bookes of Sybil were consulted, and 1.14.1.22, 50 gaue direction in this businesse of denotion; then must we believe, that those books of Sybil, preferued in Rome, were dictated by an euill spirit. For it was ordayned, that some Vow, made in the beginning of this warre to Mars, should be made anew, and amplified; as having not been rightly made before: also that great Plaies should be vowed vnto tupiter, and a Temple to Venus; with other such trumperic. This vehemencie of superstition, proceedes alwaies from vehemencie of feare. And furely this was a time, when Rome was exceedingly diffempered with paffion : whereof that memorable accident, of two women that suddenly died, when they faw their fonnes returne aliue from Thrasymene, may serue to beare witnesse; though it bee more properly an example of motherly loue. The walls and towers of the Citie, were now repaired and fortified; the bridges vpon Riuers were broken downe; and all care taken, for defence of Rome it Ielfe. In this tumult, when the Dictator was newly fet forth against Hannibal; word was brought, that the Carthaginian fleet had intercepted all the supply, that was going to Cn. Scipio in Spaine. Against these Carthaginians, Fabius commanded Servilius the Conful to put to Sea; and taking vp 10 all the ships about Rome, and Ostia, to pursue them : whilest he, with the Legions, attended upon Hannibal. Foure Legions he had levied in hafte : and from Ariminum he received the Armie, which Seruilius the Conful had conducted thither.

With these forth-with he followed apace after Hannibal; not to fight, but to affront him. And knowing well, what advantage the Numidian horse had over the Romans, he alwaies lodged himselfe on high grounds, and of hard accesse. Hannihal in the meane while, pursuing his victorie, had ranged ouer all the Countrie, and vfed all manner of crueltie towards the inhabitants; especially to those of the Roman Nation, of whom he did put to the fword, all that were able to beare armes. Paffing by Spoletum and Incona, he incamped upon the Adriatick shores ; refreshed his dif- 20 eased, and ouer-transiled Companies; armed his Africans after the manner of the Romans; and made his dispatches for Carthage, presenting his friends, which were in effect all the Citizens, with part of the spoiles that hee had gotten. Hauing refreshed his Armie; fed his horses; cured his wounded Souldiers; and (as Polybius hathit) healed his horse heeles of the scratches, by washing their pasternes in old wine : he followed the coast of the Adriatick Sea towards Apulia, a Northerne Prouince of the Kingdome of Naples; spoiling the Marrucini, and all other Nationslying in his way. In all this ground that he ouer-ranne, he had not taken any one Citie : only he had affaied Spoletum , a Colonic of the Romans ; and finding it well defended, prefently gaue it ouer.

The malice of agreat Armie is broken, and the force of it spent, in a great siege. 30 This the Protestant Armic found true at Poictiers, a little before the battaile of Moncounter; and their victorious enemies, anonafter, at St. Iean d'Angeley. But Hannibal was more wife. He would not engage himselfe in any such enterprize, as should detayne him, and give the Romans leave to take breath. All his care was to weaken them in force and reputation: knowing, that when once hee was absolute Master of the field, it would not be long ere the walled Cities would open their gates without expecting any engine of batterie. To this end he presented Fabius with battaile, as foone as he saw him; and prouoked him with all manner of brauado's. But Fabins would not bite. Hee well knew the differences, betweene Souldiers bred vp, euer 40 fince they were Boics, in warre and in bloud, trayned and hardened in Spaine, made proud and aduenturous by many victories there, and of late by fome notable acts against the Romans; and such, as had no oftner seene the enemie, than been vanquished by him. Therefore hee attended the Carthaginian fo neare, as hee kept him from stragling too farre; and preserved the countrie from vtter spoile. He invred his men by little and little, and made them acquainted with dangers by degrees; and hee brought them first to looke on the Lyon a farre off, that in the end they might fit on his taile.

Now Minutius had a contrarie disposition, and was as fierie as Flaminius; taxing Fabius with cowardife and feare. But all stirred not this well-adussed Commander. 50 For wife men are no more moued with fuch noise, than with winde bruised out of a bladder. There is nothing of more indifcretion, and danger, than to purfue miffortune : It wasteth it selfe sooner by sufferance, than by opposition. It is the invading Armie that defires battaile: and this of Hannibal, was both the invading, and the victorious. Fabius therefore suffered Hannibal to crosse the Apenines, and to fall voon the most rich and pleasant Territorie of Campania; neither could he by any arguments be perswaded, to adventure the Roman Armie in battaile : but being farre too weake in horse, he alwayes kept the Hills and fast grounds. When Hannibal saw he could by no meanes draw this warie Dictator to fight; that the Winter came on; and that the towns flood firme for the Romans, whose Legions were in fight, though a-farre off; he resolued to rest his Armie, that was loaden with spoile, in some plentifull and affured place, till the following Spring. But ere this can be done, he must paffe along by the Dictators campe, that hung ouer his head you the Hills of Calli-

10 cala, and Cassimum: for other way there was none, by which hee might iffue out of that goodly Garden-countrie, which hee had alreadie walted, into places more aboundant of prouition for his wintering. It was by meere error of his guide, that he first entred within these streights. For he would have beene directed vnto Cassinum. whence he might both affay the faire Citie of Capua, which had made him friendly promifes vnder hand, and hinder the Romans from coming neare it to pregent him. But his guide mif-vnderstood the Carthaginian pronunciation, and conducted him awry an other way, from Cassinum to Cassinum, whence Fabius hoped that he should not eatily escape. Now beganne the wisdome of Fabius to grow into credit; as if he had taken the Carthaginians in a trap; and wonne the victorie, without blowes, But 20 Hamibal reformed this opinion, and freed himselfe; by a slight invention, yet ser-uing the turne as well as a better. In driving the countrie, he had gotten about two thousand Kine; whose hornes he dressed with drie faggots, and setting fire to them in the darke night, caused them to be driven up the hills. The spectacle was strange. and therefore terrible; especially to those, that knew it to be the worke of a terrible enemie. What it should meane, Fabius could not tell: but thought it a deuice to circumuent him; and therefore kept within his Trenches. They that kept the hilltops, were horribly afraid, when some of these fierie Monsters were gotten beyond them : and ranne therefore hastily away, thinking that the enemies were behinde their backs, and fell among the light-armed Carthaginians, that were no leffe afraid 30 of them. So Hamibal, with his whole Armie, recoursed fure ground, without molestation : where he stayed till the next morning; and then brought off his light footmen, with some flaughter of the Romans, that began to hold them in skirmish: After this, Hannibal made femblance of taking his journie towards Rome: and the Dictator coasted him in the wonted manner; keeping still on high grounds, between him and the Citie, whilest the Carthaginian wasted all the Plaines. The Carthaginian tooke Geryon, an old ruinous Towne in Apulia, for faken by the Inhabitants; which he turned into Barnes and Store houses for winter, and incamped under the broken walls. Other matter of importance he did none: but the time passed idlely, till the Dictator was called away to Rame, about some businesse of Religion, and left the 40 Armie in charge with Minutius, the Master of the horse.

Minutius was glad of this good occasion to shew his owne sufficiencie. Hee was fully perswaded, that his Romans, in plaine field, would be too hard for the Africans and Spaniards: by whom if they had beene foiled already twice or thrice, it was not by open force, but by fubtiltie and ambulh, which he thought himfelfe wife enough to preuent. All the Armie was of his opinion; and that so earnestly, as he was preferred by judgement of the Souldiers, in worthinesse to command, before the cold and warie Fabius. In this jollitic of conceit, hee determined to fight. Yet had hee beene peremptorily forbidden so to doe, by the Dictator; the breach of whose command was extreme perill of death. But the honour of the victorie, which hee

50 held vindoubtedly his owne; the love of the Armie; and the friends that he had at home bearing Office in Rome, were enough to faue him from the Dictators rods and axes, tooke he the matter neuer fo hainoufly. Hannibal on the other fide was no leffe glad, that he should play with a more adventurous gamester. Therefore heedrew neare : and to prouoke the Romans, fent forth a third part of his Armie to waste the Countrie. This was boldly done, seeing that Minutius incamped hard by him: but it seemes, that he now despited those whom hee had so often vanquished. There was a pecce of high ground betweene the two camps; which because it would be commodious to him that could occupie it, the Carthagainan seized youn by night with two thousand of their light-armed. But Assimatus, by plaine force, wanne it from them the next day; and entrenching himselfe thereupon, became their nearer neighbour.

The maine businesse of Hannibal at this time was, to prouide abundantly, not only for his men, but for his horses, which hee knew to bee the chiefe of his strength; that he might keepe them in good heart against the next Sommer; if besides this he 10 could give the Romans another blow, it would increase his reputation, encourage his owne men, terrifie his enemics, and give him leave to forrage the Countrie at will. Since therefore Minutius did not in many dayes iffue forth of his campe, the Carthaginian fent out (as before) a great number of his men, to fetch in haruest. This aduantage Minutius wifely espied, and tooke. For he led forth his Armic, and fetting it in order presented battaile to Hannibal, that was not in case to accept it, enen at his owne Trenches. His horse, and all his light Armature, divided into many companies, hee fent abroad against the forragers; who being dispersed ouer all the fields, and loaden with bootic, could make no relistance. This angred Hannibal, that was not able to helpe them; but worfe did it anger him, when the Romans 20 tooke heart to affaile his Trenches. They perceived that it was meere weakeneffe, which held him within his campe, and therfore were bold to despise his great name, that could not relift their present strength. But in the heat of the businesse, Aldrubal came from Gerron with foure thousand men, being informed of the danger, by those that had escaped the Roman horse. This emboldened Hannibal to issue forth against the Romans: to whom neverthelesse hee did not such hurt, as hee had received.

For this peece of service Minutius was highly esteemed by the Armie, and more highly by the People at Rome, to whom he lent the newes, with fomewhat greater boast than truth. It seemed no small matter, that the Roman Armie had recovered 20 fpirit, so farre forth that it dared to set youn Hannibal in his owne campe; and that in so doing, it came off with the better. Euery man therefore praifed the Master of the horse, that had wrought this great alteration; and consequently, they grew as farre out of liking with Fabius, and his timorous proceedings, thinking that hee had not done any thing wifely, in all his Dictatorship: saving that he chose such a worthy Lieutenant; whereas indeede in no other thing hee had so greatly erred. But the Dictator was not so joyfull of a little good luck, as angric with the breach of discipline; and searcfull of greater danger, thereon likely to ensue. Hee said that hee knew his owne place, and what was to be done; that he would teach the Master of the horse to doe so likewise; and make him give account of what he had done, if he 40 were Dictator: speaking it openly, That good successe, issuing from bad counsaile, was more to be feared, than calamitie; for as much as the one bred a foolish confidence; the other, taught men to be warie. Against these Sermons every one cryed out; especially Metellus, a Tribune of the people; which Office warranted him to speake, and doe what he lift, without feare of the Dictator. Is it not enough (faid he) that this our only Man, chosen to be Generall, and Lord of the Towne, in our greatelt necessitie, hath done no manner of good, but suffered all Italie to bee wasted before his eyes, to the vtter shame of our State; vnlesse he also hinder others, from doing better than himfelfe can, or dares? It were good to confider what he meanes by this. Into the place of C. Flaminius hee hath not chosen any new Consul all this 50 while; Servilius is fent away to Sea, I know not why; Hannibal and Hee, have as it were taken Truce; Hannibal sparing the Dictators grounds: (for Hannibal had indecde forborne to spoile some grounds of Fabius, that so he might bring him into enuic and fuspition) and the Dictator giving him leave to spoile all others, without impeachment.

peachment. Surely his drift is even this: He would have the warre to last long, that he himselfe might be long in Office, and have the sole Gouernement both of our Citie, and Armies. But this muthor the So. It were better, that the Commonaties of Rome, which gave him this authoritie, should againe take it from him, and conferre it vpon one more worthie. But lest, in mouing the people hereto, I should seeme to doe him injurie; thus farre forth I, will regard his honour: I will only propound, That the Master of the Horse may be joyned in equall authoritie, with the Dictator; a thing not more now, nor less encessaries, than was the electing of this Dictator; by the People.

Though all men, cuen the Senators, were ill perfwaded of the course which Fabius had taken against Hamslad, as being neither plausible, nor seeming beneficiall at the present; yet was there none so injurious, as to think that his general linent, and care of the Weale publike, was lesse than yery honourable. Whereas therefore it was the manner, in passing of any Act, that some man of percedit and authoritic besides the Propounder, should stand up, and formally deliuter his approbation; not one of the principall Citizens was found so impudent, as to offer that open disprace, both write a worship Personage, and (therewishall) vinto that Dignitic, whose great power had freed the State at squerall times, from the greatest dangers. Only c. Terentus Varre, who the yeare before had beene Prætor, was glad of such an opportution tice, to winner the fauour of the Multitude. This fellow was the sonie of a Buern of the Multitude. This fellow was the sonie of a Buern of the Multitude. This fellow was the sonie of a Buern of the Multitude. This fellow was the sonie of a Buern of the Multitude. 20 ntice, to winne the fauour of the Multitude. In his tellow was the lonne, or a Butcher; a firerwards became a floop-keeper; and being of a contentious fight, grew, by often brablings, to take vpon him as a Pleader, dealing in poore mens causes. Thus by lixtle and little he goe into Office; and role by degrees, being addianced by those, who in harted of the Nobilitie fauoured his very baseness. And now hee thought the time was come, for him to giue an hard push as the Confussibility by deing that, which none of the great men searing or fauouring one another, either durft or would. So he made an hot innectiue, not only against fabine, but against all the Nobilitie; saying, that it grieved them, to see the people dog well, and take vpon them what belonged vnto them, in matter, of Governemen; that they sought to 30 humble the Commons by powerie, and to impour that them by warre; especially by warre at their owne dores, which would some conjunge every poore mans significant of the control of the confusion of t

ning, and finde him other workero thinke yoon, than matter of Stake. Therefore he bad them to be wife: and fince they had found one; (this worthic Malker of the horfe) that was better affected wito them and his Goupiec, to reward him according to his good deferts; and give him authoritie, accordingly as was propounded by the Tribune, that folk might be encouraged and enabled, so proceede as he had begunne. So the Ast passed.

Before this bulie day of contention, Fabius had dispatched the election of a new Conful, which was M. Atthis Regulus, in the roome of C. Flaminius: and having 40 sinificed all requisite bulinesses, was a compared to the confusion of Towne, peopering well, that he should not bee able to withstand the Multitude, in hindering the Decree. The newes of Attinuius his aduancement, was at the campe as soone as Fabius: for that his old Lieutenant, and new Colleague, beganne to treat with him as Companion; af king him at the strik, in what sort be thought the strong thing as Companion; af king him at the strik, in what sort be thought; the strong the string the content of the conten

50 fed; for that with halfe of the Armie he could not worke fuch wonders, as otherwise he hoped to accomplish. Neuerthelesse he meant to doe his best; and so taking his part of the Armie, incamped about a mile and an halfe from the Distator. Needfull it was (though Linie seeme to taxe him for it) that he should so doe. For where two seuerall Commanders are not subordinate one vnto the other, nor iovned in Commission, but have each entire and absolute charge of his owne followers, there are the forces (though belonging vnto one Prince or State) not one, but two diffinct Armies in which regard, one campe shall not hold them both, without great inconvenience. Polybius neither findes fault with this disunction, nor yet reports, that Fabius was vnwilling to command in chiefe fuccessively (as the two Confuls yled) with Minutius, by turnes. Hee faith that Minutius was very refractarie; and formoud of his advancement, that continually hee opposed the Dictator: who thereupon referred it to his choice, either to divide the forces betweene them, as is faid before, or else to haue command ouer all by course. This is likely to bee true. For natures impatient of subjection, when once they have broken loofe from the 10 rigour of authoritie, loue nothing more, than to contest with it: as if herein confilted

It behoued the Master of the horse, to make good the opinion which had thus advanced him. Therefore he was no leffe carefull, of getting occasion to fight, than was Fabius of avoiding the necessitie. That which Minutius and Hannibal equally defired, could not long be wanting. The Countrielying betweene them was open and bare, yet as fit for ambush, as could be wished: for that the sides of a naked valley adjoyning, had many, and spatious caues; able, some one of them, to hide two orthree hundred men. In these lurking places, Hannibal bestowed fine hundred horse, and flue thousand foot; thrusting them so close together, that they could not 20 be discouered. But lest by any misaduenture they should be found out, and buried in their holes; he made offer betimes in the morning, to seize vpon a peece of ground, that lay on the other hand : whereby he drew the eies and thoughts of the Komans, from their more needfull care, to businesse little concerning them. Like vnto this was the occasion, which, not long before, had prouoked Minutius, to aduenture voon the Carthaginians. Hoping therefore to increase his honour, in like fort as he got it; he fent first his light armature, then his horse, and at length (feeing that Hannibal feconded his owne troupes with fresh companies) hee followed in person with the Legions. He was foone caught; and so hotly charged on all sides, that he knew neither how to make refiftance, nor any saferetrait. In this dangerous case, whilest 30 the Romans defended themselves, looking many, and those of their best men: Fabius drew neare, invery good order, to relieue them. For this old Captaine, perceiuing a farre off,into what extremitie his new Colleague had rashly throwne himselfe, and his followers; did the office of a good Citizen; and regarding more the benefit of his Countrie, than the difgrace which he had wrongfully sustained, sought rather to approue himselfe, by hasting to doe good, than by suffering his enemie to feele the reward of doing ill. Vpon Fabius his approch, Hannibal retyred: fearing to be well wetted with a showre, from the cloud (as he termed the Dictator) that had hung fo long on the Hill-tops. Minutius forthwith submitted himselfe to Fabius; by whose benefit hee confessed his life to have beene faued. So from this time forwards, the 40 Warre proceeded coldly, as the Dictator would haue it; both whileft his Office lasted, which was not long, and likewise afterwards, when hee delinered vp his charge vnto the Confuls, that followed his instructions.

Servilius the Conful had purfued in vaine a Carthaginian fleet, to which hee came neuer within kenning. He ranne along all the coast of Italie; tooke hostages of the Sardinians and Corficants; paffed ouer into Africk; and there negligently falling to spoile the Countrie, was mamefully beaten abourd his ships, with the losse of a thouland men. Weighing anchor therefore in all hafte, hee returned home by sicit; and (being fo required by the Dictators letters) repaired to the campe, with his fellow-Conful, where they tooke charge of the Armie.

è. VII.,

The Roman people, desirous to finish the warre quickly, choose a rash and unworthing Conful. Great forces levied against HANNIBAL. HANNIBAL taketh the Ramans prouisions in the Caftle of Canna, The new Confuls fet forth against HANNIBAL.

Ith little pleafure did they of the poorer fort in Rome . heare the great commendations, that were given to Fabrus by the principall Citizens. He had indeed preserved them from receiving a great overthrow; but hee had neither finished the warre, nor done any thing in apparance thereto tending. Rather it might feeme, that the reputation of this his one worthic act, was likely to countenance the flow proceedings, or perhaps the cowardize (if it were no worse) of those that followed him, in protracting the worke to a great length. Elfe, what means the Confuls to fit idle the whole winter, contrarie to all former custome; fince it was neuer heard before, that any Roman Generall. had willingly fuffered the time of his command to runne away without any performance: as if it were honorable to doe just nothing? Thus they suspected they knew not what; and were readie euery man, to discharge the griefe and anger of his owne

20 private loffe, vpon the ill administration of the publique.

This affection of the people, was very helpfull to C. Terentius Varro, in his fuit for the Confulfhip. It behoued him to firike, whilft the Iron was hot : his owne worth being little or none, and his credit ouer-weake, to make way into that high Dignitic. But the Comonaltie were then in fuch a moode, as abundantly supplied all his defects. Wherein to help, he had a kinfman, Bibius Herennius, then Tribune of the Pcople; who spared not to vse the libertie of his place, in saying what he listed, without all regard of truth, or modeftie. This bold Orator fluck not to affirme. That Hannibal was drawne into Italie, and suffered therein to range at his pleasure, by the Noblemen; That Minutius indeed with his two Legions, was likely to have been over-20 throwne, and was rescued by Fabius with the other two: but had all been joyned together, what they might have done, it was apparent, by the victorie of Aunutius, when he comanded ouer all, as Master of the horse; That without a Plebeian Conful, the warre would never be brought to an end; That fuch of the Plebeians, as had long since been advanced to honor by the people, were growne as proud as the old Nobilitie, and contemned the meaner fort, euer fince themselves were freed from contempt of the more mightie; That therefore it was needfull to choose a Conful, who should bee altogether a Plebeian, a meere new man, one that could boast of nothing but the People's loue, nor could wish more, than to keep it, by well descruing of them. By fuch perswasions, the Multitude was wonne, to be wholly for Terentius: to 40 the great vexation of the Nobles, who could not endure to see a man raised for none other vertue, than his detracting from their honor; and therefore opposed him with all their might. To hinder the defire of the People, it fell out, or at least was alleaged, that neither of the two present Consuls could well be spared, from attending upon Hannibal, to hold the Election. Wherefore a Dictator was named for that purpose: and he againe deposed; either (as was pretended) for some religious impediment. or because the Fathers desired an Inter-regnum, wherein they might better hope to prevaile in choice of the new Confuls. This Inter-regnum tooke name and being in Rome, at the death of Romulus; and was in vie at the death of other Kings. The order of it was this. All the Fathers, or Senators, who at the first were an hundred, parted 50 themselues into Tens, or Decuries; and governed successively, by the space of five daies, one Decurie after another in order: yet fo, that the Lietors, or Virgers, carrying the Fasces, or bundles of rods and axes, waited only vpon the chiefe of them with these Ensignes of power. This custome was retained, in times of the Consuls; and put in vie, when by death, or any casualtie, there wanted ordinary Magistrates of the old yeare, to substitute new for the yeare following. The advantage of the Fathers herein was, that if the Election were not like to goe as they would have it, there needed no more, than to let flip fine daies, and then was all to begin anew: by which interruption, the heat of the Multitude was commonly well affwaged. Vpon fuch change of those, that were Presidents of the Election; it was also lawfull vnto new Petitioners, to fue for the Magistracies that lay void: which otherwise was not allowed; but a time limited, wherein they should publiquely declare themselues to fecke those Offices. But no denice would serve, against the generall fauour borne vnto Terentius. One Inter regnum passed ouer; and the malice of the Fathers, against the vertue (as it was believed) of this meane, but worthie man, seemed so manifest, ro that when the People had viged the bufineffe to dispatch, only Terentius was chofen Conful: in whose hand it was left; to hold the election of his Colleague. Herevpon all the former Petitioners gaue ouer. For whereas men of ordinarie marke had flood for the place before; it was now thought meet, that, both to supply the defeet, and to bridle the violence of this vnexpert, and bot-headed man, one of great fufficiencie, and reputation, should be joyned with him, as both Companion and Opposite. So L. Amilius Paulus, he who few yeares since had over-come the Illyrians, and chaced Demetrius Pharius out of his Kingdome, was vrged by the Nobilitie to fland for the place: which he cafily obtained, having no Competitor. It was not the defire of this honorable man, to trouble himselfe any more in such great busi- 20 nesse of the Common-wealth. For, notwithstanding his late good service; He, and M. Linius that had been his companion in Office, were afterwards injuriously vexed by the People, and called vnto judgement: wherin Livius was condemned, and Amilius hardly escaped. But of this injustice they shall put the Romans well in minde, each of them in his fecond Confulthip, wherein they shall honorably approve their worth; the one of them nobly dying, in the most grieuous losse; the other brauely winning, in the most happic victorie, that ever befell that Common-wealth.

These new Confuls, Varre and Paulus, omitted no part of their diligence, in preparing for the warre: wherein though Varro made the greater noise, by telling what wonders hee would worke, and that hee would aske no more, than once to haue a 20 fight of Hannibal, whom he promifed to vanquish the very first day; yet the prouidence and care of Paulus, travailed more earnestly toward the accomplishment of that, whereof his fellow vainely boasted. He wrote vnto the two old Consuls seruilius and Atilius; desiring them to abstaine from hazard of the maine chance; but neuertheleffe, to ply the Carthaginians with daily skirmish, and weaken them by degrees: that when hee and his Colleague should take the field, with the great Armie which they were now leuying, they might finde the foure old Legions well accustomed to the Enemie, and the Enemie well weakened to their hands. He was also very strict in his Musters; wherein the whole Senate affisted him so carefully, as if in this Action they meant to refute the flanders, with which Terentius and his Adhe- 49 rents had burdened them. What number of men they raifed it is vncertaine. Fourefcore thousand foot, at the least, and fixe thousand horse, they were strong in the field, when the day came, which Varre had fo greatly defired, of looking vpon Hannibal.

Hiero, the old King of Syracuse, as he had relieved the Carthaginians, when they were diffressed by their owne Mercinaries; so did he now send helpe to Rome, 2 thousand Archers, and Slingers, with great quantitic of Wheat, Barlie, and other prouisions : fearing nothing more, than that one of the fetwo mightie Cities should destroy the other, whereby his owne estate would fall to ruine; that stood vpright, by bauing them fomewhat evenly ballanced. He gave them also counsaile, to fend to forces into Africa; if (perhaps) by that meanes they might divert the warre from home. His gifts, and good aduice were louingly accepted; and instructions were given to Titus Octacilius the Prætor, which was to goe into Sicil, that hee should accordingly paffe ouer into Africk, if he found it expedient.

The great Leuies, which the Romans made at this time, doe much more ferue to declare their puissance, than any, though larger, accompt by Poll, of such as were not easily drawne into the field, and fitted for service. For besides these Armies of the Confuls, and that which went into Sical; twentie five thousand, with L. Posthumius Albinus another of the Prætors, went against the Gaules, to reclaime that Prouince, which the passage of Hannibal through it, had taken from them. The contemplation of this their present strength, might well embolden them to doe as they did. They fent Embaffadors to Philip the fonne of Demetrius, King of Macedon; requiring him to deliuer into their hands Demetrius Pharius: who having beene their 10 Subject, and rebell, was fled into his Kingdome. They also sent to the Illyrians, to demand their tribute; whereof the day of paiment was alreadic past. What answere they received, it is not knowne; only this is knowne, that Demetrius Pharius was not fent vnto them; and that Philip henceforth beganne to have an eye vpon them. little to their good. As for the Illyrian monie; by the shifts that they were driven foone after to make, it will appeare, that the one halfe of it (how little foeuer) would haue beene welcome to Rome, and accepted, without any cauill about forfeiture for non paiment of the whole.

Whilest the Citie was busied in these cares, the old Consuls lay as near vnto Hannibal, as possibly they could, without incurring the necessitie of a battaile. Many 20 skirmishes they had with him; wherein their successe, for the most part, was rather good than great. Yet one mischance not only blemished the honour of their other feruices, but was indeede the occasion, to draw on the m ferie following. Hannibal, for the most part of that time, made his abode at Gerron, where lay all his store for the Winter. The Romans, to be neare him, lodged about Cannufium; and, that they might not be driven to turne afide for all necessaries, to the losse of good opportunities, they bestowed much of their provisions in the Castle of Canne: for the towne was razed the yeare before. This place Hannibal wanne; and thereby not only furnished himselfe, but compelled his enemies to want many needfull thinges, vnlesse they would bee troubled with farre carriage. Besides this, and more to his aduan-30 tage, hee enabled himselfe to abide in that open Countrie, fit for the service of his horse: longer than the Romans, having so many mouthes to feede, could well endure to tarrie; without offering battaile; which he most desired. Of this mishap when Seruilius had informed the Senate, letting them understand, how this Peece, taken by Hannibal, would ferue him to command no fmall part of the Countrie adjacent: it then feemed needfull, euen vnto the Fathers themselues, to adventure a battaile with the Carthaginian, rather than fuffer him thus to take roote in the ground of Italie. Neuerthelesse, answere was returned vnto Seruilius, that hee should have patience yet awhile: for that the Confuls would shortly be there, with a power sufficient to doc as neede required.

When all things were readie in the Citie, and the feafon of the yeare comodious to take the field, the two Confuls, with their armic, fet forth against Hannibal. This was alwaies done with great folemnitie: especially, when socuer they went forth to warre against any noble or redoubted Enemie. For Sacrifices, and folemne Vowes. were made vnto Inpiter, and the rest of their Gods, for good successe and victorie: which being performed; the Generals, in warlike attire, with an honorable traine of the principall men, not only fuch as were of their kindred and alliance, or followed them to the warre, as Voluntaries, for love, but a great number of others that meant to abide at home, were accompanied on their way, and dismissed with friendly leavetaking, and good wishes. At this time, all the Fathers, and the whole Nobilitie, wai-50 ted vpon Amilius Paulus, as the only Man, whom they thought either worthie of this honor, or likely to doe his countrie remarkable service. Terentius his Attendants were the whole multitude of the poorer Citizens; a troupe no leffe in greatnes, than the other was in dignitic. At the parting; Fabius the late Dictator, is faid to have exhorted the Conful Paulus, with many grave wordes, to shew his magnanimitie, not only in dealing with the Carthaginians, but (which be thought harder) in bridling the outragious follie of his fellow-Conful. The answere of Paulus was, That hee meant not again to runne into danger of condemnation, by offending the Multitude; that he would doe his best for his Countrie: but if he saw his best were likely to be ill taken, Hee would thinke it less rashnesses to adventure vpon the Enemies flowers, than you her hailes of his owne Citizens.

Diffension between the two Roman Consult. Whether it be likely, that HANNIBAL 10

Hele new Generals, arriving at the Camp, dismisted M. Atilius one of the last yeares Consuls, requesting it because of his age and weakenes:

Servilius they retained with them, as their Affiliant. The first thing that Emilius thought necessarie, was, to hearten his Souldiers with that Amitus thought necessarie, was successful thinterto, had gathered good wordes; who out of their bad fuccesss hitherto, had gathered more cause of feare, than of courage. He willed them to consider, not only now, their victories in times past against the Carthaginians, and other more warlike Nations than were the Carthaginians, but even their owne great numbers: which were no 20 leffe than all that Rome at the prefent was able to fet forth. Hee told them in what danger their Countrie stood; how the state and safetie thereof, rested upon their hands, vling some such other common matter of perswasion. But the most effectuall part of his Oration was, That Hannibal with this his terrible Armie, had not yet obtained one victorie by plaine force and valour : but that only by deceit and ambush he had from the honor, which he had gotten at Trebia and Thraffmene. Herewithall he taxed the inconfiderate raffineffe of Sempronius and Flaminius; of whom the one faw not his enemies, vntill hee was furrounded by them; the other fearce faw them, when they firuck off his head, by reason of the thick mist, through the darkenoffe whereof he went groping (as it were blinde-fold) into their fnares. Finally de- 20 claring what advantages they had against the Enemie; and how destitute the Enemie was of those helps, by which he had hitherto preuailed against them; he exhorted them to play the men, and doe their best. They were easily perswaded: for the contemplation of their owne multitude, and confidence of the Roman vertue in matter of armes, gaue them cause to thinke, that under a Captaine so well experienced, and every way fufficient, as Emilius vvas knowne to bee, they should easily premaile against the Carthaginians : that came farre short of them in all things else, faue craft; which yould not alwaies thrine. But in one thing they millooke the meaning of their Generall. It was his defire, that they should have heart to fight; not that they should loofe the patience of awaiting a convenient season. But they, 40 having preconceived a victorie, thought all delaies to be impediments: and thereby fought to robbe themselues of their best helpe; which was, good conduct. They remembred what talke they had heard at Rome: and were themselves affected with the Vulgar defire, of ending the year quickly; wherein fince Amilius had acknowledged, that the advantage was theirs, why did he make them for bear to vicit? Thus thought the common Souldier: and thus also thought the Conful Terentius; who was no leffe popular in the Campe, than he had been in the Citie, Expectation is alwaies tedious; and neuer more, than when the Euent is of most importance. All menlonged, both at Rome, and in the Armie, to bee freed from the

to effect, was likely to winne more thankes, than should his Colleague, though greater in the performance.

Thus while the Romann thinke themselves to have the better of their Enemies, they fall into an inconvenience, than which sew are more dangerous; Dissension

doubtfull Passions of Hope and Feare: therefore Terentius, who hastned their defire 50 of their chiefe Commanders. Varro would fight: Emilius would fo too, but faid that it was not yet time; why? because the enemie must shortly dislodge, and remoue hence, into places leffe fit for his horfe. But shall the Romans wait, till Hannibal, having eaten vp his last yeares provisions, returne into Campania to gather a second Haruest? This would (faid Varre) favour too much of O. Fabius: And your haste (faid Paulus) doth fauour no lesse of C. Flaminius. Their deedes were like their wordes: for they commanded by turnes interchangeably every day. Amilius lodged fixe miles from Hannibal, where the ground was fomewhat vneuen. Thither if the Carthaginians would take paines to come; hee doubted not to fend them away 10 in such haste, as they should not leave running till they were out of Italie. But they came not. Terentins therefore the next day descended into the Plaines; his Colleague holding him, and befeeching him to flay. Neuertheleffe he fate downe close by Hannibal: who as an unbidden guest gaue him but a rude well-come and intertairiement. The Carthaginian Horse, and light Armature, sell vpon the Roman Vantcourrers; and put the whole Armie in tumult, whileft it was yet in march: but they were beaten off, not without loffe, for that the Romans had, among their Velites, some troupes weightily armed, whereas the Carthaginians had none. The day following, Amilius, who could not handfomly withdraw the Armie out of that levell ground. incamped upon the River Aufidus; fending a third part of his forces over the wa-20 ter, to lie vpon the Easterne banke, where they entrenched themselues. Hee neuer was more vinwilling to fight, than at this prefent; because the ground served wholly for the aduantage of his enemie; with whom hee meant to deale, when occasion should draw him to more equal termes. Therefore he stirred not out of his Trenches, but fortified himfelfe; expecting when Hannibal should dislodge, and remoue towards Geryon, Canna, or some other place, where his store lay, for want of necesfaries: whereof an Armie forraging the countrie, was not likely to carrie about with

is sufficient quantitie, for any long time.

Here it would not bee passed ouer with silence, That Linie differeth much in his Relation from Palybius: telling many strangetales, of the miscrie into which Hangonia had beene driuen; and of base courses that he deussed to take, if the Romans could have retained their patience a little longer. He had (sait Linie) but trea diage proussion of meat. He had not monie to pay his Souldiers. They were an varuly Rabble, gathered out of several Nations, so that He knew not how to keepethem in order; but that from murmuring, they fell to flat exclamations, first, about their Pay, and Prouant, and afterwards for very famine. Especially the Spaniards were readiet to forske him, and runne ouer to the Roman side. Yea thimshal himselfe was once you the point, to have sloshed away into Gaule with all his horse, and left his foot vnto their miserable destinies. At length, for lack of all other counsails, Heerefolued to get him as sarreas he could from the Romans; into the Southermost parts

40 of Apulia; to the end, that both his vnfaithfull Souldiers might finde the more difficultie in running from bim; and that his bunger might be relicued with the more early harutel. But while the was about to put this deuice in execution, the Romans prefled him fo hard, that they even forced him vnto that, which hee most defired; even to fight a battaile vpon open champaine ground: wherein hee was victorious. It was not vncommendable in Livie, to speake the best of his owne Crizens; and, where they did ill, to say, That, without their owne great folly, they had done passing well. Further also he may be executed; as writing only by report. For thus he faith; HANIBAL de figa in Gallam (dictur) agitās to NNIBAL [is staid] to have bethought himself e of sping into Gaule: where he makes it no more than a matter of heare-say; as perhaps was all therest or this Relation. As for the processe it felic, it is very incredible. For if Hannibal, comming out of Gaule, through the Marishes and Bogs of Herruria, could finde victuailes enough; and all things needfull vnto his Armie, the Sommer foregoing: what should hinder him to doe the like this yeare; especially seeing he had plaid the carefull husband in making a great harvest; since

Now let vs returne back to the two Armics, where they lie incamped on the Riuer Auficlus. Varro was perfuaded, that it concerned him in honour, to make good 20 his word vnto the people of Rome: and fince he had thus long waited in vaine, to get the confent of Paulus, now at length to vie his owneauthoritie; and, without any more disputing of the matter, to fight when his owneday came. When therefore it was his turne to command; at the first breake of day he beganne to passe the River, without flaving to bid his Colleague good morrow. But Paulus came to him; and fought, as in former times, to have diffwaded him, from putting the estate of his Countrie to a needleffe hazard. Against whose wordes and substantial larguments, Terentius could alleage none other, than point of honour. Hannibal had presented them battaile at their Trenches: should they endure this Brauado? He had sent his Numidians over the River but even the day before, who fell vpon the Romans that 40 were fetching water to the leffer Campe; and draue them shamefully to runne within their defences, which also they made offer to affaile: must this also be suffered? Hee would not endure it: for it could not but weaken the spirit of the Roman Souldier; which as yet was lively, and full of fuch courage, as promifed affured victorie. When Amilius perceived, that he could not hinder the obstinate resolution of his Companion; he tooke all care, that what he faw must be done, might be done well. Ten thousand Roman foot he caused to be left behinde, in the greater campe, opposite vnto the Carthaginian; to the intent, that either Hannibal might bee compelled, to leave behinde him some answerable number, for defence of his Trenches: (which out of his paucitie he was leffe able to spare from the battaile, than were the to Romans) or that these ten thousand, falling vponthe Carthaginian Campe, when the fight beganne, and taking it with all the wealth therein, might thereby (as commonly doe fuch accidents) terrifie and distract the Enemics in the heat of fight. This done; the two Confuls went ouer the water with their Armie to the leffer Campe, whence whence also they drew forth their men, and ranged them in order of battaile; the ground on the East part of the River, seeming perhaps more fit for marshalling of their Armie. Hannibal was glad of this, as he had great cause; and, without any delay, paffed likewise ouer, somewhat higher vp.the streame, which ranne from the South; leaving in his owne campe fo many, as he thought would ferue to defend it, and no more. To encourage his men; He bad them looke about them, and view the ground well, your which they were to fight. They did fo. And could you (faid he) pray for any greater fortune, than to joyne battaile with the Romans upon fuch alenell ground, where the stronger in horse are sure to prevaile? They all assented to him; and shewed by their countenances, that they were very glad of it. Well then (faid he further) yeare first of all to thanke the Gods, that have brought them hither; and then Vs, that have trained them along, and drawne them into necessistie of playing for their lines, where they are fure to loofe them. As for these Romans. I was faine to encourage you against them, when yee met them first ; but now vee may euen encourage your felues, by calling to minde that they are the men, whom yee haue as often beaten as scene. Of one thing only I will put you in minde: That whereas hitherto you fought for other respects; as, to drine them before you out of Gaule; and to winne the open Countrie, and fields of Italie; both of which vechauc obtained : now are vecto fight for the Townesthemselves, and all the 20 riches within them; which this victorie shall make yours. Therefore play the fout Souldiers: and ere many houres passe, yee shall bee Lords of all that the Ro-

When he had faid this; his brother Mago came to him, whom hee had fent to view the countenance of the Enemie. Hamibal asked him, what newes; and what worke they were likely to have with these Romans? Worke enough (answered Mago) for they are an horrible many. As horrible a many as they are (thus Hannibal replied) I tell thee brother, that among them all, fearch them neuer fo diligently, thou shalt not finde one man, whose name is Mago. With that bee fell a laughing, and so did all that stood about him: which gladded the souldiers, who thought their 20 Generall would not be fo merrie, without great affurance. Whether it were fo that Hannibal, in the pride of his victories alreadie gotten, valued one Mago aboue many thousand Romans; or whether he intimated, that the Romans were no leffe troubled with thinking upon Mago and his Companions, than was Mago with beholding their huge multitude; or whether hee meant only to correct the sad moode of his brother with a jeft, and thew himfelfe merrie vnto the Souldiers: this his answere was more manly, than was the relation of his discouerer. But if Hannibal himselfe had beene fent forth by Mago, to view the Romans; he could not have returned with a more gallant report in his mouth, than that which Captaine Gam, before the battaile of Agincourt, made vnto our King Henrie the fift : faying, that of the Frenchmen, 40 there were enough to be killed; enough to be taken prisoners; and enough to runne away. Euen such wordes as these, or such pleasant jests as this of Hannibal, are not without their moment; but ferue many times, when battaile is at hand, to worke needfull care is not wanting; without which they are but vaine boafts. In this great day, the Carthaginian excelled himselfe; expressing no lesse perfe-Aion of his militarie skill, than was greatnesse in his spirit and undertakings. For to omit the commodiousnesse of the place, into which hee had long before conceived the meanes to draw his enemies to battaile; Hee marshalled his Armie in such conuenient order, that all hands were brought to fight, where every one might doc 50 best service. His Darters, and Slingers of the Baleares, he sent off before him, to encounter with the Roman Velites. These were loose troupes, answerable in a manner to those, which we call now by a French name Enfans perdues; but when we vied our owne termes, the forlarne hope. The groffe of his Armie following them he ordered thus. His Africans, armed after the Roman manner, with the spoiles which they had gotten at Trebia, Thrasymene, or elsewhere; and well trained in the vie of those weapons, that were of more aduantage, than those wherewith they had formerly ferued: made the two wings, very deepe in File. Betweene these hee ranged his Gaules and Spaniards, armed, each after their owne Countrie manner; their thields alike: but the Gaules vling long broad fwordes, that were forcible in a downe-right ftroke; the Spaniards, short and well-pointed blades, either to strike or thrust: the Gaules, naked from their nauell vpwards, as confident in their owne fierceneffe; the Spaniards, wearing white cassocks embroidered with purple. This medley of two Nations, differing as well in habit and furniture, as in qualitic, made a gallant shew : and terrible, because strange. The Gaules were strong of body, and surious in giuing 10 charge; but soone wearied, as accustomed to spend their violence at the first brunt. which disposition all that come of them have inherited to this day. The Spaniards were leffe eager, but more warie; neither asnamed to giue ground, when they were ouer-pressed; nor afraid to returne, and renew the fight, vpon any small encouragement. As the roughnesse of the one, and patience of the other, serued mutually to reduce each of them to a good and firme temper; so the place which they held in this battaile, added confidence joyntly unto them both. For they saw themselves well and strongly flanked with Carthaginians and other Africans; whose name was growne terrible in Spaine, by their Conquests; and in Gaule, by this their present warre. Since therefore it could not bee feared, that any great calamitie should fall 20 youn them, whileft the wings on either fide flood fast: these Barbarians had no cause to thrinke, or forbeare to imploy the vtmost of their hardinesse, as knowing that the Enemie could not preffe farre vpon them, without further engaging himfelfe than differetion would allow. Hercunto may be added that great aduantage, which the Carthaginian had in horse; by which he was able, if the worst had happened, to make a good retrait. The effect of contraries is many times alike. Desperation begetteth courage; but not greater, nor so lively, as doth affored Confidence. Hannibal therefore caused these Ganles and Spaniards to advance; leaving void the place wherein they had flood, and into which they might fall back, when they flould becourhardly preffed. So, casting them into the forme of a Crescent, Hee made them as it 20 were his Vantguard: the two points of this great halfe Moone, that looked toward the emptie space from which he had drawne it, being narrow and thinne, as seruing only to guide it orderly back, when neede should require; the foremost part of the Ring, fwelling out toward the enemies, being well ftrengthned and thickned against all impression. The circle hereof seemeth to have beene so great, that it shadowed the Africans, who flood behinde it : though fuch figures, cut in braffe, as I have feene of this Battaile, prefent it more narrow; with little reason, as shall anon appeare: as also in the same figures it is omitted, That any Companies of Africans, or others, were left in the Reare, to second the Gaules and Spaniards, when they were driven to retrait; though it be manifest, that Hannibal in person stood betweene the 40 last rancks of his long batalions, and in the head of his reare, doubtlesse well accompanied with the choice of his owne Nation. Betweene the left battalion and the Riuer Aufidus, were the Gaules and Spanish horse, under the command of Asarabal: On the right wing, toward the wide Plaines, was Hanno (Linie faith Maharbal) with the Numidian light horse. Hannibal himselfe, with his brother Mago, had the leading of the Reare. The whole fumme of Hannibals Armie in the field this day, was ten thousand horse, and fourtie thousand foot; his enemies having two to one against him in foot; and Hee, five to three against them in horse.

The Roman Armie was marshalled in the vsuall forme : but somewhat more narrow, and deepe, than was accustomed; perhaps, because this had beene found conuenient against the Carthaginians, in the former warre. It was indeede no bad way of refistance against Elephants, to make the Rankes thick and short, but the Files long; as also to strengthen well the Rearc, that it might stand fast compacted as a wall, vnder shelter whereof the disordered troupes might re-allie themselues. Thus much it seemes, that Terentius had learned of some old Souldiers; and therefore he now ordered his Battailes accordingly, as meaning to shew more skill, than was in his vnderstanding. But the Carthaginians had here no Elephants with them in the field: their aduantage was in Horse; against which, this manner of embattailing was very vnprofitable, for a fmuch as their charge is better fultained in front, than you a long flanke. As for Amilius; it was not his day of command: He was but an Affiftant; and in such cases it happens often, that wife men yeeld for very wearinesse vnto the more contentious. Vpon the right hand, and toward the River, were the Roman horse-men, vnder the Conful Paulis : On the left wing, was C. Terentius Varrothe 10 other Conful, with the rest of the horse, which were of the Latines, and other Associates: Cn. Servilius the former yeares Conful, had the leading of the battaile. The Sunne was newly rifen, and offended neither part; the Carthaginians having their faces Northward; the Romans toward the South.

After some light skirmish, betweene the Roman Velites and Hannibal his Darters and flingers of the Baleares: Afdrubal brake upon the Conful Paulus, and was rough-Iv encountred; not after the manner of feruice on horse back, yfed in those times. wheeling about Alman-like; but each giving on in a right line. Pouldron to Pouldron, as having the River on the one hand, and the shoulder of the foot on the other hand; fo that there was no way left, but to pierce and breake through. Where-20 fore they not only vsed their Lances and Swordes; but rushing violently amongst the Enemies, grasped one another; and so, their horses running from under them. fell many to the ground; where flarting vp againe, they beganne to deale blowes like foot-men. In conclusion, the Roman horse were ouer-borne, and driven by plaine force to a fraggering recoile. This the Conful Paulus could not remedie. For Afdrubal, with his boilterous Gaules and Spaniards, was not to bee relifted by these Roman Gentlemen, vnequali both in number, and in horsemanship. When the battailes came to joyning, the Roman Legionaries found worke enough, and fomewhat more than enough, to breake that great Crescent, youn which they first fell : fo strongly, for the while, did the Gaules and Spanish foot make resistance. Wherefore 20 the two points of their battaile drew towards the midft; by whose aide, these Oppolites were forced to difband, and flie back to their first place. This they did in great hafte and feare; and were with no leffe hafte, and follie, purfued. Vpon the Africans, that stood behinde them, they needed not to fall foule; both for that there was void roome enough; and for a fmuch as the Reare, or Hornes of this Moone, pointed into the fafe retrait, where Hannibal with his Carthaginians was readie to reenforce them, when time should require. In this hastic retrait, or slight, of the Gaules and Spaniards; it hapned, as was necessarie, that they who had stood in the limbe or vtter compaffe of the halfe Moone, made the innermost or concaue surface thereof (disordered and broken though it were) when it was forced to turne the inside out-40 ward: the hornes or points thereof, as yet, vntouched, only turning round, and recoiling very little. So the Romans, in pursuing them, were inclosed in an halfe-circle; which they should not have needed greatly to regard, ( for that the sides of it were exceeding thinne and broken; and the bottome of it, none other than a throng of men rowted, and feeming vnable to make relistance) had all the enemies foot been cast into this one great bodie, that was in a manner dissoluted. But whilest the Legions, following their supposed victoric, rushed on vpon those that stood before them, and thereby vnwittingly engaged themselves deepely within the principall ftrength of the Enemies, hedging them in on both hands; the two African Battalions on either fide advanced fo farre, that getting beyond the Reare of them, they inclosed them, in a manner, behinde; and forward they could not passe farre, without remouing Hannibal and Mago; which made that way the least easie. Hereby it is apparent, That the great Crescent, before spoken of, was of such extent, as coue-

red the Africans; who lay behinde it vndiscerned, vntill now. For it is agreed, that Plut in vit. the Romans were thus empaled unawares; and that they behaued themselues, as Hannib.

men that thought you no other worke, than what was found them by the Gaules. Neither is it credible, that they would have beene so mad, as to runne head-long. with the whole bulke of their Armie, into the throat of flaughter; had they feene those weapons bent against them at the first, which when they did see, they had little hope to escape. Much might be imputed to their heat of fight, and rashnesse of inferiour Captaines : but fince the Conful Paulus, a man fo expert in warre, being vanquished in horse, had put himselfe among the Legions; it cannot bee supposed. that hee and they did wilfully thus engage themselues. Astrubal, having broken the troupes of Roman horse, that were led by the Consul Paulus, followed vpon them along the River fide, beating downe, and killing, as many as he could, (which to were almost all of them) without regard of taking priloners. The Conful himselfe was either driuen vpon his owne Legions, or willingly did cast himselfe among them; as hoping by them to make good the day, notwithstanding the defeat of his horse. But he failed of this his expectation. Neuerthelesse hee cheared up his men as well as hee could, both with comfortable wordes, and with the example of his owne front behauiour: beating downe, and killing many of the enemies with his owne hand. The like did Hannibal among his Carthaginians, in the same part of the battaile; and with better successe. For the Conful received a blow from a sling, that did him great hurt; and though a troupe of Roman Gentlemen, riding about him. did their best to saue him from further harme; yet was he so hardly laid at, that he 20 was compelled, by wounds and weakenesse, to forfake his horse. Hereupon all his companie alighted, thinking that the Conful had given order to doe: as in many battailes, the Roman men at armes had left their horfes, to helpe their foot in diffreffe. When Hannibal (for he was neare at hand) perceived this, and understood that the Conful had willed his horse-men to dismount; He was very glad of it, and pleasantly faid, I had rather be would have delinered them unto me, bound hand and foot : meaning, that he had them now almost as safe, as if they were so bound. All this while C. Terentius Varro, with the horse of the Affociates, in the left wing, was meruailously troubled by Hanno (or Maharbal) and the Numidians: who beating up and downe about that great fandie Plaine, raised a foule dust; which a strong South-winde, 20 blowing there accustomarily, draue into the cies and mouthes of the Romans. These, vling their advantage both of number and of lightnesse, we aried the Consul and his followers exceedingly: neither gining, nor fultayning any charge, but continually making offers, and wheeling about. Yet at the first they seemed to promise him an happie day of it. For when the battailes were euen readie to joyne; fiue hundred of these Numidians came pricking away from their fellowes, with their shields cast behinde their backs, (as was the manner of those which yeelded) and, throwing downe their armes, rendred themselues. This was good luck to beginne withall, if there had beene good meaning. Varre had not leafure to examine them; but caufed them, vnweaponed as they were, to get them behinde the Armie, where he bad 40 them rest quietly till all was done. These crastic adventurers did as hee bade them. for a while; till they found opportunitie to put in execution the purpose, for which they had thus yeelded. Under their lackets they had short swordes and ponyards: belides which, they found other scattered weapons about the field, of such as were flaine, and therewithail flew upon the hindmost of the Romans, whilest all eyes and thoughts were bent another way: fo that they did great mischiefe, and raised yet a greater terrour. Thus Hannibal, in a plaine levell ground, found meanes to lay an ambush at the back of his enemies. The last blow, that ended all fight and resistance, was given by the same hand which gaue the first. Astrubal, having in short space broken the Roman troupes of horse, and cut in peeces all, saue the Companie of 4-50 milius that rushed into the groffe of his foot, and a very few besides, that recovered fome narrow passage, betweene the River and their owne Battalions; did not flav to charge vpon the face of the Legions, but fell back behinde the Reare of his owne. and fetching about, came vp to the Numidians: with whom hee joyned, and gaue vpon Terentius. This fearefull cloude, as it shewed at the first appearance what weather it had left behinde it, on the other lide : fo did it prognosticate a difmall florme vnto those, vpon whom it was readie now to fall. Wherefore Terentius his followers, having wearied themselves much in doing little, and seeing more worke toward, than they could hope to fustaine; thought it the best way, to avoide the danger by prefent flight. The Conful was no leffe wife than they, in apprehending the great neffe of his owne perill, nor more desperate, in striuing to worke impossibilities: it being impossible, when so many arguke from him, to sustaine the impreffion alone, which he could not have endured with their affiftance. Now hee an found, that it was one thing to talke of Hannibal at Rome; and another, to incounter him. But of this, or of ought elfe, excepting hastie slight, his present leisure would not ferne him to confider. Close at the heeles of him and his flying troupes, followed the light Numidians : appointed by Aldrubal vnto the pursuit, as fittelt for that service. As drubal himselfe, with the Gaules and Spanish horse, compassing about, fell vpon the backs of the Romans; that were ere this hardly diffreffed, and in a manner furrounded on all parts elfe. He brake them eafily; who before made ill refiftance, being inclosed, and laid at on every fide, not knowing which way to turne. Here beganne a pittifull flaughter: the vanquished multitude thronging vp and downe, they knew not whither or which way, whilest enery one sought to avoide 20 those enemies, whom hee saw nearest. Some of the Roman Gentlemen that were about £milius, got vp to horse, and saucd themselves : which though it is hardly vnderstood how they could doe; yet I will rather beleeve it, than suppose that Linie so reporteth to grace thereby his Historic with this following tale. CN. CORNELIVS LENTVLVS, galloping along by a place, where he faw the Conful sitting all blondied upon a stone, entreated him to rife and faue himselfe; offering him his assistance and horse. But PAVLVS refused it; willing LENTVLVS to shift for himselfe, and not to loof time: faring. That it was not his purpose to be brought againe into judgement by the People, either as an acculer of his Colleague, or as guiltie bimfelfe of that dayes loffe. Further hee willed LENTVLVS to commend him to the Senate, and in particular to FABIVS: wil-20 live them to fortifie Rome, as fast and well as they could; and telling FABIVS, that Hee lived and died mindfull of his wholesome counsaile. These wordes (peraduenture) or some to like purpose, the Conful vttered to Lentulus, either when against his will he was drawne to that Battaile, or when hee beheld the first defeat of his Horse, at what time he put him selfe in the head of his Legions. For I doubt not, but Hannibal knew what he faid a good while before this; when he thought the Conful and his troupe, in little better case than if they had beene bound. The whole Grosse of the Romans, vvas inclosed indeede as within a lack, vvhereof the African Battalions made the fides; the Spaniards, Gasles, and Hannibal with his Carthaginians, the bottome; and Afdrubal with his horse, closed up the mouth; in which part, they first 40 of all were shuffled together, and beganne the Rout, vyherein all the rest followed-**Emilius therefore, who could not fit his horse, whilest the battaile yet lasted, and vyhileft the spaces yvere somewhat open, by which hee might haue vvithdrawne himselfe; vvas now (had he neuer so vvell beene mounted) vnable to slie, having in his year to close a throng of his owne miterable followers, and to many heapes of bodies, as fell apace in that great Carnage. It sufficeth vnto his honour, That in the Battaile hee fought no leffe valiantly, than hee had yvarily before, both abstained himselfe, and diffwaded his fellow-Consul, from fighting at all. If, when the day yvas ytterly loft, it had laine in his power to faue his owne life, vnto the good of his Countrie, neuer more needing it; I should thinke, that he either too much disestee-50 med himfelfe; or being too faintly minded, was vecarie of the World, and his vnthankefull Citizens. But if fuch a resolution overe praise overthic in Amilius, as proceeding out of Roman valour; then was the English vertue of the Lord Iohn Talbot, Vicount Life, fonne to that famous Earle of Shrewesburie, who died in the Battaile of Chastillen, more highly to be honoured. For Amilius was old, gricuously, Liu. l. 19.

if not mortally, wounded, and accomptable for the ouerthrow received: Talkot was in the floure of his youth, vahurt, eafily able to have escaped, and not answerable for that dayes misfortune, when he refused to forsake his father; who foreseeing the loffe of the bartaile, and not meaning to flaine his actions past by flying in his old age, exhorted this his noble sonne to be gone, and leave him.

In this terrible ouerthrow died all the Roman foot, faue two or three thousand. who (as Linie faith) escaped into the leffer campe; whence, the same night, about fixe hundred of them brake forth, and joyning with such of those in the greater campe, as were willing to trie their fortune, conveyed themselves away ere morning, about foure thousand foot, and two hundred horse, partly in whole troups, 10. partly dispersed, into Cannusium : the next day, the Roman Camps, both leffe and greater, were yeelded vnto Hannibal by those that remained in them. Polybius hath no mention of this escape : only he reports, that the ten thousand, whom Emilius had left on the West side of Aufidus (as was shewed before) to set vpon the campe of Hannibal, did as they were appointed; but ere they could effect their defire, which they had well-neare done, the battaile was loft and Hannibal, comming over the water to them, draue them into their owne campe; which they quickly yeelded, having loft two thousand of their number. Like enough it is, that at the first fight of Hannibal, comming upon them with his victorious Armie, a great number of these did flie; and thereby escaped, whilest their fellowes, making defence in vaine, 20 retired into their campe, and held the Enemie busied. For about two Legions they were (perhaps not halfe full, but made up by addition of others, whose fault or fortune was like ) that having ferued at Canna, were afterwards extremely difgraced by the State of Rome, for that they had abandoned their Companions fighting. Of the Roman horse what numbers escaped, it is uncertaine: but very few they were that faued themselves in the first charge, by getting behinde the River; and Terentius the Conful recovered Venusia, with threescore and ten at the most in his companie. That he was so ill attended, it is no meruaile: for Fenusia lay many miles off to the Southward; fo that his nearest way thither, had been through the midst of Hannibals Armie, if the passage had beene open. Therefore it must needes be, that 30 when once he got out of fight, he turned vp some by-way; so disappointing the Numidians that hunted contre. Of such as could not hold pace with the Conful, but tooke other waies, and were scattered ouer the fields; two thousand, or thereabouts, were gathered up by the Numidians, and made prisoners: the rest were slaine, all sauce three hundred; who dispersed themselves in flight, as chance led them, and got into fundric Townes. There died in this great Battaile of Canna, besides L. Amilius Paulus the Conful; two of the Roman Quastors or Treasurers, and one and twentie Colonells or Tribunes of the Souldiers, fourfcore Senators, or fuch as had borne Office, out of which they were to be chosen into the Senate. Many of these were of especiall marke, as having beene £diles, Prators, or Consuls: among whom was Cn. 40 Seruilus the last yeares Consul, and Minutius, late Master of the horse. The number of prisoners, taken in this battaile, Linie makes no greater than three thousand foot, and three hundred horse : too few to have defended, for the space of one halfe houre, both the Roman camps; which yet the same Linie faith, to have beene onercowardly yeelded vp. We may therefore doe better, to give credit vnto one of the prisoners, whom the same Historian shortly after introduceth speaking in the Senate, and laying, That they were no leffe than eight thousand. It may therefore be, that these three thousand were only such as the Enemic spared, when the furie of Execution was past: but to these must be added about fine thousand more, who yeelded in the greater campe, when their companie were either flaine or fled. So 50 the reckoning falls out right: which the Romans, especially the Consul Varre, had before cast vp (as we say) without their Host; nothing so chargeable, as now they finde it. On the fide of Hannibal there died some foure thousand Gaules, fisteene hundred Spaniards and Africans, and two hundred horse, or thereabouts; a losse not sensible, in the joy of so great a victorie; which if he had pursued, as Maharbal aduifed him, and forthwith marched away towards Rome; it is little doubted but that the Warre had presently beene at an end. But hee believed not so farre in his owne prosperitie; and was therefore told, That he knew how to get, not how to vec, a victorie.

ð. I X.

Of things following the battaile at Canna.

Ot without good cause doth Polybius reprehend those two Historians, Fabius the Roman, and Philinus the Carthaginian: who regarding more the pleasure of them, vnto whose honour they consecrated their tra-uailes, than the truth of things, and information of posteritie, magnified indifferently, whether good or bad, all actions and proceedings, the one of his Carthaginians, the other of his Roman Quirites and Fathers conferint. No man of found judgement will condemne this libertic of centure, which Polyhins hath yfed. For, to recompence his junioritie, (fuch as it was) hee produceth fub-20 stantiall arguments, to justifie his owne Relation; and confuteth the vanitie of those former Authors, out of their owne writings, by conference of places ill cohering: which paines it is to bee suspected, that hee would not have taken, had hee beene borne in either of these two Cities, but have spared some part of his diligence, and beene contented, to have all men thinke better and more honourably than it descrued, of his owne Countrie. The like disease it is to be feared, that we shall hereafter finde in others; and shall have cause to wish, that either they were fomewhat leffe Roman, or elfe, that fome Workes of their opposite Writers were extant, that so we might at least heare both sides speake : being henceforth destitute of Polybius his helpe, that was a man indifferent. But fince this cannot be, we must be 30 sometimes bold, to observe the coherence of things; and believe so much only to be true, as dependeth upon good reason, or (at least) faire probabilitie. This attentiue circumspection is needfull cuen at the present: such is the repugnancie, or forgetfulnesse, which we finde in the best Narration, of things following the Battaile of Canne. For it is faid, that foure thousand foot and horse gathered together about the Conful Terentius at Venulia; that others, to the number of ten thousand, got into Cannufum, choosing for their Captaines yong P. Scipio, and Ap. Claudius; yet that the Conful Terentius Varre, joyning his companie vnto those of Scipio at Cannusium, wrote vnto the Senate, that hee had now well-neare ten thousand men about him; that these letters of the Consul were brought to Rome, when the Senate was newly 40 rifen, that had beene taking order for pacifying those tumults in the Citie, which grew vpon the first bruit of the ouerthrow; and yet, that Embassadours from Capua (after some consultation, whether it were meet to send any, or, without further circumstance, to side with Hannibal) were sent vnto Terentius, and found him at Venusia, a pretie while before he wrote those letters, which ouer-tooke (in a manner) at Rome the first newes of the ouerthrow. Among such incoherences, I hold it the best way, to omit so much as hath not some particular connexion with matter enfuing: mutuall dependencie in things of this nature, being no small argument of

When Hannibal had facked the Roman campe, and truffed up the spoiles, forth-50 with he diflodged, and marched away into Samnium; finding a disposition in the Hirpines, and many other people thereabout, to for lake the Roman partie, and make alliance with Carthage. The first Towne that opened the gates vnto him, was Coffa, where he laid up his baggage : and leaving his brother Mago to take in other places, He hasted into Campania. The generall affection of the Multitude, in all the Cities of Italie, was inclinable vnto him; not only in regard of their grieuous losses, suttained abroad in the fields, which the Romans themselues, who could not hinder him from spoiling the Countrie, especially the poorer sort of them, did hardly endure; but in a louing respect vnto that great courtesse (as it seemed) which he vsed, vnto fuch of them as became his prisoners. For as at other times, so now also after his great victorie at Cann.s., He had louingly dismissed as many of the Italian Confederates of Rome, as fell into his hands: rebuking them gently for being so obstinate, against him that had fought to deliuer them from bondage. Neither spared hee to winne their loue with gifts; pretending, to admire their valour; but seeking indeede, by all waies and meanes, to make them his, whileft all other motiues were concurrent. At this time also hee beganne to deale kindly (though against his nature) with his Roman prisoners: telling them, that he bore no mortall hatred vnto their Estate; but being prouoked by injuries, sought to right himselfe and his countrie; and fought with them, to trie which of the two Cities, Rome or Carthage, should beare sourraigne Rule, not, which of them should be destroicd. So he gaue them leave to choose ten of their number, that should bee sent home to treat with the Fathers about their ransome; and together with these, he sent Carthalo a Nobleman of Carthage, and Generall of his Horse, to feelethe disposition of the Senate; whether it were bowed as yet by so much aduersitie, and could stoope vnto desire of peace. But with the Romans these artes prevailed not, as shall bee shewed in due an place. The people of Italie, all or most of them, saue the Roman Colonies, or the Latines, were not only wearie of their losses past, but entertained a deceineable hope, of changing their old Societic for a better. Wherefore not only the Sammites, Lucans, Bruttans, and Apulians, ancient enemies of Rome, and not vntill the former generation vtterly subdued, beganne to re-assume their wonted spirits: but the Campans, a Nation of all other in Halie most bound vnto the State of Rome, and by many mutuall affinities therewith as streightly conjoyned, as were any saue the Latines, changed on a sudden their loue into hatred; without any other cause found, than

Campania, is the most goodly and fruitfull Province of Italie, if not (as somethen 20 thought) of all the Earth : and the Citie of Capua, answerable vnto the Countrie. whereof it was Head, fogreat, faire, and wealthie, that it feemed no leffe convenient a feat of the Empire, than wascither Rame or Carthage. But of all qualities, brauerie is the leaft requilite vnto foucraigne command. The Campan were luxurious, idle, and proud : and valuing themselues, like layes by their feathers, despited the vnfortunate vertue of the Romans their Patrons, and Benefactors. Yet were there some of the principal among them, as in other Cities, that bore especiall regard vnto the majestic of Rome, and could not endure to heare of Innovation. But the Plebeian faction had lately so prevailed within Capua, that all was governed by the pleasure of the Multitude; which wholly followed the direction of Pacavius Calanius an 40 ambitious Noble-man, whose credit grew, and was vp-held, by furthering all popular defires : whereof, the conjunction with Hannibal was not the leaft. Some of the Capuans had offered their Citie to the Carthaginian, shortly after the battaile of Thra-Symene: wherupon chiefly it was, that Hannibal made his journic into Campania; the Distator Fabius waiting upon him. At that time, either the nearnes of the Roman Armie, or some other searc of the Capuans, hindred them from breaking into actuall rebellion. They had indeed no leifure, to treat about any articles of new Confederacie: or had leisure served, yet were the Multitude ( whose inconstant love Hannibal had wonne from the Romans, by gentle vsage, and free dismissing, of some prisoners in good account among them) vnable to hold any fuch negotiation, without aduice of the Senate; which mainly impugned it. So they that had promifed to yeeld vp their towne to Hannibal & to meet him on the way, with some of their nobilitie, that should affure him of all faithfull meaning; were driven to fit still, in a great perplexitie: as having failed to let in this their new friend, yet sufficiently discovered them-

Clues, to draw upon them the hatred of the Romans. In this case were no small number of the Citizens: who thereupon grew the more incensed against their Senate; on whom they cast all the blame, easily pardoning their owne cowardize. The People, holding so tender a regard of libertie, that even the lawfull Governement of Magistrates grieued them, with an imaginarie oppression; had now good cause to searc, lest the Senators would become their Lords indeede, and, by helpe of the Romans, bring them under a more fireight subjection, than euer they had endured. This feare, being readie to breake into some outrage, Pacuvius made vse of, to ferue his owne ambition. He discoursed vnto the Senate, as they sate in Councell, to about these motions troubling the Citie: and said, That he himselfe had both married a Roman Ladie, and given his Daughter in marriage to a Roman; but, that the danger of forfaking the Roman partie was not now the greatest: for that the People were violently bent euen to murder all the Senate, and afterward to joyne themfelues with Hannibal; who should countenance the fact, and faue them harmelesse. This he spake, as a man well knowne to be beloued himselfe by the People and prinie ynto their designes. Hauing throughly terrified the Senate, by laying open the danger hanging ouer them: He promised neuerthelesse to deliuer them all, and to fetthings in quiet, if they would freely put themselues into his hands; offering his oath, or any other affurance that they should demand, for his faithfull meaning. They all agreed. Then shutting up the Court, and placing a Guard of his owne followers about it, that none might enter, nor iffue forth, without his leaue: Hee called the People to affembly; and speaking as much ill of the Senate, as he knew they would be glad to heare, hee told them, that these wicked Gouernours were furprised by his pollicie, and all fast, readie to abide what sentence they would lay woon them. Only thus much he adulfed them, as a thing which necessitie required. That they should choose a new Senate, before they satisfied their anger vpon the old. So rehearling vnto them the names of one or two Senators, hee asked what their judgement was of those. Allcried out, that they were worthic of death. Choose then (faid he) first of all some new ones into their places. Hereat the Mul-30 titude, vnprouided for such an election, was silent; vntill at last, some one or other aduentured to name whom he thought fit. The men fo nominated, were vtterly difliked by the whole Assembly; either for some knowne fault, basenesse, and infufficiencie; or else euen because they were vnknowne, and therefore held vnworthie, This difficultie in the new Election appearing more and more, whileft more were to be chosen; (the fittest men to be substituted, having been named among the first, and not thought fit enough) Pacinim entreated, and easily prenailed with the people, that the present Senate might for this time be spared, in hope of amends hereafter; which (doubtleffe) they would make, having thus obtained pardon of all offences past. Henceforth, not only the People, as in former times, honoured Ao Pacuvius, and esteemed him their Patron; but the Senators also, were gouerned by him: to whom they acknowledged themselues indebted, for sauing all their lines. Neither did the Senate faile after this, by all obsequiousnesse, to court the People. giuing the reines unto their lawlesse Will, who else were likely to cast them downe: All the Citie being thus of one minde; only feare of the Romans, kept them from opening their gates to Hannibal. But after the Battaile at Canne, this impediment was removed: and few there were, that would open their mouthes to speake against the Rebellion. Yet forasmuch as three hundred principall Gentlemen of the Campans, did then serue the Romans in the Isle of Sicil: the Parents and Kinsmen of these prevailed fo farre, that Embaffadors were fent vnto Terentius the Conful; to fee 50 his present case, and what it could minister of Hopeor Feare. These, wheresoever they found him, found him weakely attended, and as weakein spirit, as in followers.

Yet they offered him formally the feruice of their State; and defired to know what he would command them. But he most basely lamented vnto them, the greatnesse of the Roman misfortune: faying, that all was loft; and that the Campans must now.

not helpe the Romans, who had nothing left wherewith to helpe themselves, but, make warre in their defence against the Carthaginians; as the Romans had somtimes done for the Campans against the Samnites. Hereunto hee is said to have added a foolish Inuective against Hannibaland his Carthaginians: telling, How he had taught them to make bridges of flaughtered carkafes, and to feede upon mans flesh; with fuch other stuffe, as only bewraied his owne feare. As for the Campans themselues. He put them in minde of their present strength : they having thirtie thousand foot. and foure thousand horse; with monie, and all provisions, in abundance. Thus he dismissed them, prouder than they came : and filled them with conceit of getting a great Lordship; whereas before, they were somewhat timorous, in aduenturing 10 to secke their owne libertie. Having reported this at Capua: the same Embassadors were dispatched away to Hannibal, with whom they easily made Alliance, you these conditions; That the Campans should be absolutely free, and ruled by their owne Lawes; That no Citizen of theirs should bee subject vnto any Carthaginian Magistrate, in what case socuer, whether in Warre, or Peace; and, That Hannibal should deliuer vnto the Campans three hundred Roman prisoners, such as they themfelues would choose, whom they might exchange for their Gentlemen which were Against all this Negotiation, Decius Magius an honorable Citizen opposed himfelfe carneftly : vling, in vaine, many perswalions, to the wilfull and head-strong 20 Multitude; whom he put in minde of Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, withing them not to change old friends for new acquaintance. This did he, when they were fending Embaffadors to Hannibal: and this also did he, when the new Alliance was concluded; but most earnestly, when a Carthaginian Garrison was entring the Towne : at which time be gaue aduice, either to keepe it out, or to fall vpon it, and cut it in peeces, that, by such a notable peece of service, they might make amends vnto the

Aduertisement hereof was given to Hannibal: who lying about Naples not farre off, lent for Magius to come speake with him in the campe. This Magius refused: alleaging, that he was, by the late concluded Articles, free from subjection vnto any 30 Carthaginian; and therefore would not come. Hannibal thereupon hasted himselfe towards Capua: forbearing to attempt any further vpon Naples; which he thought to haue taken in his way by Scalado, but found the walls too high, and was not well prouided, to lay fiege vnto it. At Capua hee was entertained with great folemnitie and pompe : all the people issuing forth of the Towne, to behold that great Commander, which had wonne so many noble victories. Hauing taken his pleasure in the light of that goodly Citic, and passed ouer his first Entertainements: He came into their Senate: where he commended their resolution, in shaking off the Roman yoke; promifing, that ere long all Italie, and Rome it felfe, should bee driven to acknowledge Capua as chiefe, and receive Law from thence. As for Decius Magius, who 40 openly tooke part with the Romans their enemies; Hee prayed them, that they would not thinke him a Campan, but a Traitor to the State; and vie him accordingly, giuing sentence out of hand vpon him, as he deserved. This was granted: and Magins, deliuered vnto Hannibal; who vnwilling to offend the Capuans, at his first comming, by putting fo great a man to death, yet fearing that they might fue for his libertie, if hee kept him aline, thought it best to send him away to Carthage. Thus Hamibal feeled his friend ship with the Campans: among whom, only this Deeius Magius had openly dared to speake against him; being affisted by Perolla the fonne of Paeuvius. This Perolla would have murdered Hannibal, whilest hee was at supper, the first night of his comming; had not his Fathers authoritie kept him 50 from making any fuch attempt. All the Towne (belides) were so earnest in the loue of their new Societie, that they are faid to have murdered all the Romans, vpon whom at the present they could lay hand; or, (which is all one) to have smothered them to death in an hot Bathe.

The same course of forcune, with those of Capua, ranne some other Townes thereabouts, which depended on this, as their Mother-Citie. Nola, Nuceria, Naples, Caliline, and Acerra, were the Cities next adjoyning, that flood out for the Romans. Against these Hannibal went, thinking to finde them weakely manned; as they were indeede, though stoutly defended.

The Romans at this time were not in case, to put Garrisons into all their walled Townes; but were faine to leave all places, except a few of the most suspected, vnto the faith and courage of the Inhabitants. Rome it selfe was in extreme feare of Hannibals comming at the first report of the overthrow at Canne: and the griefe of that to loffe was fo generall, and immoderate, that it much diffurbed the provision against apparent danger. It was hard to judge, whether the loffe alreadie received, or the feare of destruction presently threatning, were the more terrible. All the Senators found worke enough, to funt the noise and lamentable bewailings, whereof the fireets were full. Courriers were fent forth, to bring affured tidings how all went: whereof when letters from the Conful Varro had throughly informed them, they were fo amazed, that they ranne into barbarous superstition; and taking direction (as was faid) from their fatall bookes, buried aline two men and women Gaules and Greekes, in their Oxe-market. If the bookes of Sibyl gaue them such instructions; we may justly thinke, that Sibyl herselfe was instructed by the Denill. Yet is it not 20 improbable, that extremitie of feare caused them to hearken to wicked Soothfavers; whosedetestable counsailes they afterwards, for their owne honour, (as alhamed of fuch Authors) imputed to the bookes of Sibyl. An Embaffadour was fent to Delphi, to confult the Oracle of apollo; and enquire, with what prayers and fundications they might pacific the Gods, and obtains an end of these calamities. This is enough to discouer the greatnesse of their feare; though not serving to give remedie. At the same time came letters out of Sicil, from the Prætor Octacilius; whom the Senate had appointed, if he found it meet, to passe ouer into Africk. In these were contained newes, of one Carthaginian fleet, that wasted the Kingdome of Hieron their good friend and confederate; and of another fleet, riding among the 20 Iles Agateis, which was in readineffe to fet upon Lilybeum, and the rest of the Roman Prouince, if the Prætor stirred aside, to the rescue of Hieron.

In the middest of these extremities, it was thought needfull to call home Terentius the Conful, that he might name a Dictator, to take four raigne charge of the Weale publique, with absolute power, as necessitie required. It must needes seeme strange, that all forts of people went forth to meet the Conful, and bid him welcome home, gining him thankes for that he had not despaired of the Weale publique. But this was done (as may feeme) by order from the Senate: which therein (doubtleffe) prouided wifely, for vp-holding the generall reputation. If his comming into the Citie, had renewed the lamentations and out-cries of the people: what elfe would have 40 followed, than a contempt of their wretchednesse, among those that were subject vnto their Dominion? Now in finding this occasion (though indeede he gaue it not) of bestowing upon him their welcome, and thankes; they noised abroad a fame. which came perhaps vnto the cares of Hannibal, of their Magnanimitie and Confidence: that might feeme grounded on their remayning strength. This therefore was wifely done: But whereas Liuie would have vs thinke, that it was done generoully, and out of great spirit; let me be pardoned, if I beleeue him not. It was done fearefully, and to cover their griefe: had they dared to shew their indignation, they would have ftruck off his head; as in few yeares after Cn. Faluius had his life brought Lin Lab. into question, and was banished by them, being lesse blame-worthic, for a smaller 50 offence. M. Junius, by appointment of the Senate, was nominated Dictator; and

T. Sempronius, Mafter of the horse. These fell presently to mustering of Souldiers, of whom they raifed foure new Legions and a thousand horse; though with much 1:01,122, difficultie; as being faine to take vp fome, that were very Boics. These foure Le-Rions, are elsewhere forgotten, in accompt of the forces leuied by this Dictator; and two Legions only fet downe, that had beene enrolled in the beginning of the yeare for cultodie of the Citie. Wherefore it may be, that these two Legions being drawne into the field; foure new ones of Pratextati, or Striplings, were left in their places. In fuch raw Souldiers, and so few, little confidence was to bee reposed; for which reason they increased their number, by adding vnto them eight thousand sturdie flaues, that were put in hope of libertie, if they should descrue it by manfull service. This not sufficing; the Dictator proclaimed, that who focuer ought monie and could not pay it, or had committed any capitall offence, should forthwith beedifcharged of his debt, or punishment, if he would ferue in the Warre. To armethefe Companies, they were faine to take downe, out of their Temples and Porches, the 10 spoiles of their enemies that had beene there set vp; among which, were fixe thoufand Armours of the Gaules, that had been carried in the Triumph of C. Flaminius. a little before the beginning of this Warre. To fuch mockerie had God brought the pride of the Romans, as a due reward of their infolent oppressions, that they were faine to iffue forth of their ownegates, in the habit of strangers, when Hannibal was readie to encounter them with his Africans, armed Roman-lake.

About the same time it was, that Carthalo, with the Agents of the prisoners taken at Canna, came to Rome. Carthalo was not admitted into the Citic, but commanded. whileft he was on the way, to be gone ere night out of the Roman Territorie. To the Messengers of the captines, audience was given by the Senate. They made ear- 20 neft Petition, to be ranformed at the publike charge; not only the teares and lamentation of their poore kins-folke, but the great neede, wherein the Citie then stood, of able Souldiers, commending their fuit; which yet they obtayned not: Besides the generall custome of the Romans (held by long Tradition, and strengthned by a notable Precedent, when Regulus was overthrowne, and taken prisoner in the former warre) not to be too tender of fuch as had veelded to the Enemie: much was a leaged against these who now craued ransome; but the special point was, that they were wilfully loft, fince they might have faued them felues, as others did. It fufficed not vnto these poore men, to say, that their offence was no greater than the Confuls they were told, that this was great prefumption. The truth was, the 30 State wanted monie : and therefore could not want excuses, whereby to avoid the difbursement: whether it were so, or not, that any such Plea was held about this matter of redemption, as we finde recorded. Neither must wee regard it, that the flaues which were armed for the warre, are faid to have coft more, than the fumme did amount vnto, that would have ranfomed these prisoners. For this is but a tale. denifed to countenance the Roman proceedings, as if they had beene feuere; when as indeede they were futeable to the present fortune, poore, and somewhat beggarly. Hercofit is no little proofe, That Hannibal valued those Roman flaues, whom he had taken in the campe among their Mafters, at no more, than every one the third part of a common Souldiers ranfome: and likely it is, that hee offered them at the 40 price, whereat he thought them current. But if wee should suppose, that by trading with Hannibal, a better bargaine for flaues might have beene made, than was by the State at home, in dealing with private men; yet must we withall consider, that these private mendid only lend these slaves for a while vnto the Common-wealth. and were afterwards contented to forbeare the price of them (when by order from the Senate they were enfranchifed) untill the warre should be ended. If Hannibal would have given fuch long day of paiment; it is likely that the Romans would have beene his chapmen: but feeing he dealt only for readic monic, they chofe rather to fay, We will not give, than, We cannot. The like aufteritie, vpon the fame reason. but contrarie pretence, was vied toward the Souldiers that escaped from that great 50 Battaile. These were charged, for having fled: as the prisoners were, for not flying, when they might have done fo. True it is, that in such cases (if ever ) that which they call raggione del Stato may ferue for an excuse : when the Common-wealth being driven to a miserable Exigent, is faine to helpe it selfe, by doing injuriesto private men. And so dealt the Romans now : condemning all those that had served at Canna, to be transported into Suil; and there to serve, not as others did vntill they had fulfilled twentie yeares in the warres, or elfe were fiftie yeares of age ; but untill this warre should bee ended, how long soener it lasted, and that without reward. The same thriftie censure, was afterwards laid upon others, for their missehaulour: but never vpon any man of qualitie, fauc only (agood while after this, at better leifure) vpon Cacilius Metellus, and a few other hare-braind fooles his companions; who being frighted out of their wits with the terrour of fo great a loffe, were deuiling, after the battaile, which way to runne out of Italie, when Hannibal as yet to had scarce one Towne within it. The inequalitie of this rigour grew shortly distast-full to the Commonaltic; and was openly blamed by a Tribune of the People; neuer- Links theleffe it was quietly digefted, the excuse being no leffe apparent than the fault.

M. Iunius the Dictator, having dispatched all needfull businesse within the Citie. tooke the field with five and twentie thousand men. What he did with this Armie, I cannot finde : nor more of him, than this, That he spent the time about Campania; where (as may be prefumed) he was not idle. To him therefore perhaps it may be afcribed, that Hannibal did no greater cuill; for of any cuill done to Hannibal, by the Romans in this their weake chate, only Marcellus had the honour. Marcellus, being then one of the Prætors, lay at Offia with a fleet, readie to fet faile for Si-20 cil, having one Legion aboord his ships, and fifteene hundred other Souldiers newly taken vp: with which forces he was to defend that lland, and doe what harme hee could in Africk. But hearing of the ouerthrow at Canna, hee fent thefe of his new Leuie to Rome, for defence of the Citie; and marched hastily with his Legion toward Cannusium: delivering the fleet, emptic of Souldiers, to P. Furius his Colleague. Thence was he called by the Magistrates, and chiefe Citizens of Nola, to help them: who were like to be forced by the Multitude (affected, as were the rest of the Campans) to let in the Carthaginian; and knew not how to avoid this otherwise, than by feeming to deliberate about the Articles of this new Confederacie. Wherefore he made great journies thitherward; and arrived even time enough to prevent the E-20 nemie. Many idle walkes Hannibal made, betwixt Nola and Naples : affaying by faire wordes, and terrible threats, the one and the other Citie. Naples was firong, and not infected with any the least touch of dissolatie : it had also a fure Hauen; whereby it stood in the lesse feare, of sustayning much inconvenience, by spoile of the Lands and Villages abroad in the Countrie. But at Nolait was thought a valuable confideration, That Hannibal was Mafter of the field; which if he laid waste, all the poore people were vtterly vndone. So thought the Multitude: and fuch talke vled fome, that had little feare of their owne private want or povertie, but a great defire to gratifie the Carthaginian. Of these, one L. Bantius was chiefe; a stout yong Gentleman. and Souldier of especiall marke, well beloued in the Citic, and one that had done 40 good feruice to the Romans: but was found by Hannibal, halfe dead at Canna, and after much gentle vsage, good attendance, and cure of his wounds, friendly dismissed with liberall gifts. Hee therefore thought, that it concerned him in honour, to returne the greatest thankes he could vnto so courteous an Enemie. Marcellus perceiuing this, wrought vpon the same case nature of the Gentleman; and taking notice of him, as if it had beene by chance, seemed to wonder, why one that had so well deferued of the Roman state, had not repaired unto him the Prator, who desired no. thing more than such acquaintance. So with many commendations, gifts, and louing entertainement, being himfelfe also a man highly reputed for his personall valour, he made this Bantius fo farre in loue with him, that nothing could be attempted 50 within Wola, against the Romans, whereof he had not presently aducttifement. At the comming of Marcellus, Hannibal removed from about Nola; and affaird, as formerly he had done, the Neapolitans : but they had lately taken in a Roman Garrison; vpon confidence whereof they gave him a peremptoric answere, to his discontent.

Thence went he to Nuceria: which he tooke by composition; and so returned back

againe to Nola. Hee was not ignorant, what good affection the common people of Nota bore vnto him: who although they durft not firre in his quarrell, being ouerawed by the Roman Garrison ; yet if they saw Marcellus hardly bestead, and forced to turne his care from watching them within, to repelling the enemies affailing him without, like enough it feemed, that they would not bee wanting vnto the accomplilhment of their owne defires. Hee therefore brought his Armie close to the Towne, and skirmished often with Marcellus: not in hope thereby to doe much good, but only to make shew of a meaning to force the Towne; which hee soughe in the meane while to take by intelligence. In the night-time there paffed meffages betweene him and the Citizens his partakers: whereby it was concluded, That if 10 once Marcellus, with all his forces, could bee trained into the field, the Multitude within the Towne should presently rise; and seizing vpon the gates, exclude him as an Enemie. Of this Negotiation Marcellus was advertised; and fearing left the Conspirators would shortly aduenture, even to finde him busied within the Citie, whileft the Carthaginians should scale the walls; he thought it the furest way, to cut off the enemies hope, and fend him away betimes. Wherefore ordering his men in three Companies, within three feuerall gates looking towards the Enemie: He gaue a fireight command, that all the Citizens should keepe their houses. Thus hee lay close a good part of the day, to the enemies great wonder; against whom he had enstomarily issued forth before more early, every day, to skirmish. But when it was 20 further noted, that the walls were bare, and not a man appearing on them; then thought Hannibal, that furely all was discourred, and Marcellus now busied with the Citizens. Whereupon hee bad his men bring ladders, and make readie for the affault; which was done in all hafte. But when the Carthaginians were at the very walls, and thought nothing leffe, than that the Romans would meet them in the field: fuddenly the middle gate was opened, whereat Marcellus, with the best and oldest of his Souldiers, brake forth vpon them, with a great noise, to make his vnexpected fallie the more terrible. Whilest the Carthaginians, much out of order, were fome of them flying before Marcellus, the rest making head against him : the other two gates opened, whereat in like fort iffued they of the new-leuied Companies, 20 vponthe enemies backs. The fudden terrour was more availeable vnto the Romans, than their force: yet the Execution was fo great, that this was accounted as a victorie, and reputed one of the brauch Acts performed in all that warre; forafmuch as hereby it was first proued, that Hannibal might be ouer-come. After this, Marcellus, being freed from his enemies that were departed, tooke a strict accompt of the Citizens of Nola: condemning about threefcore and ten of high Treason, whose heads he struck off; and so leaving the Towne in quiet obedience vnto their Senate, went and incamped hard by about Sueffula. Hannibal in the meane feafon was gone to Acerra: where being excluded, he thought it no wildome to loofe time in perswasions, but laid siege vnto it, and beganne on all sides to close it vp. This ter- 40 rified the People, who knew themselves vnable to hold out. Therefore, before his Workes were finished, and they quite surrounded; they stole out by night, and left him the Towns emptie: which he facked and burnt. Then hearing newes of the Dictator, that he was about Casiline, thither went Hannibal: as being vnwilling that an Enemie so neare should disquiet him at Capua; where hee meant to Winter. It feemes, or rather indeede it is plaine, that the late victorie of Marcellus had nothing abated the spirit of the Carthaginian : who durst with a small part of his Armie seeke out the Dictator, that had with him the heart of the Roman ftrength. Wherefore the joy of his Enemies, vpon so slight an occasion as the death of some two thoufand of his men, at the most, and those not slaine in plaine battaile, but by a sudden 50 eruption; witneffeth chiefly, in what great feare they flood of Hannibal, and how Crest-fallen they were : that having three yeares since demanded at Carthage, the bodie of Hannibal, to be deliuered vnto their pleasure, by his owne Citizens; could now please themselves, as with good newes, to heare, That in a skirmish not farre from Rome he appeared to be a man, and not reliftlesse. At Casilinum the Dictator was not: but many Companies of Italians, Confederates of Rome, were gotten into the Towns, and held it. Five hundred of the Pranellines there were, and aboue foure hundred of Perulia, with some of the Latines. All these had the good hap, to come too late to the Battaile of Canna, being sent by their seuerall States to the campe: whither whilest they were marching, the tidings of that great misfortune encountred them, and fent them back forrowfull; for they loued well their Lords the Romans, vnder whose gouernement they lived happily. So came they all, one after another, to Casiline, where they met and staied. Neither had they staied there long, 10 cre they heard newes from Capua, How that great Citie became the Ring-leader of all the Campans into rebellion. The people of Casiline were affected as they of Capua: and therefore fought how to rid their hands of those Pranestines and their fellowes; but the Souldiers were too hard for them, and after many traines laid one for another, at last they slew all the Townssmen in a night, and fortified the Westerne part of the Towne (for it was divided by the River Vulturnus) against the Enemie. If they had runne away with the goods, and pretended, that these of Casiline were, as the rest of the Campans, all Traitors; they themselves might have been reputed, as no better than the Mamertines. But their constancie in defence of the place with effeth, vpon what honest reasons they surprised it. Hannibal came thither. 20 thinking to have encountred with greater forces : but these few found him more worke than he expected. Divers affaults hee gaue, but was still repelled with losse: and many fallies they made, with variable euent. The Enemie mined; and they countermined: oppoling so much industrie to his force, that he was driven to close them vp, and seeke to winnethem by famine. T. Sempronius Gracehus, that was Mafter of the horse, lay with the Roman Armie higher vp the Riuer: who faine would haue relieued Casiline, but that the Dictator, being gone to Rome about some matters of Religion, had given him expressecharge not to sight till his returne. Marcellus from Suessula could not come: his way being stopped by the ouer-slowingsof Vulturnus; the Nolans also beseeching him not to seaue them, who were in danger of 20 the Campans, if he departed. Thus it is reported : but if the water staied his journie, such entreaties were needlesse. Neither is it like, that the Dictator tarried at Rome folong, as till extreme famine had confumed the Garrison in Cassline. Wherefore it may be thought, that the Towne was loft, because the Romans durst not adventure to raise the siege. Barrells of corne were sent by night, floting downe the River; and when some of these, being carried awry by an Eddie of the water, stuck among the Willowes on the banke, whereby this manner of reliefe was discourred and prevented; Gracehus cast a great quantitie of Nuts into the streame, which faintly fultained the poore belieged men. At length, when all foode was spent, and whatfocuer grew greene under the walls was gathered for fallets; the Carthaginians 40 ploughed up the ground: whereon the besieged presently sowed Rape-seede. Hannibal feeing this, admired their patience; and faid, That he meant not to stay at Cafiline, vntill the Rapes were growne. Wherefore, though hitherto hee had refuled to hearken vnto any Composition, as intending to make them an example to all others, by punishing their obstinacie; yet now he was content, to grant them their liues at an indifferent ransome, which when they had paid, hee quietly dismissed them according to his promife. Seuen hundred Carthaginians hee placed in Casiline, as a Garrison for defence of the Campans; vnto whom he restored it. To the Prane. fine Souldiers great thankes were given, and louing rewards; among which, they had offer, in regard of their vertue, to be made Citizens of Rome. But their present so condition pleased them so well, that they chose rather to continue, as they were, in Prenefte: which is no weake proofe, of the good estate wherin the Cities flourished, that were subject to the Roman Gouernement. This siege of Cassline was not a little beneficiall to the Romans; as having long detained Hannibal, and confumed much of his time, that might otherwise haue beene better spent. For Winter ouer-tooke him, long before he could dispatch the businesse: which how to quit with his honor he knew not, when he was once engaged. Therefore he wintered at Capua: where he refreshed his Armic, or rather corrupted it, as all Historians report, and made it effeminate; though, effeminate as it was, He therewithall did often beate the Romans in following times, as shall appeare hereafter.

Of the great supply that was decreed at Carthage to be sent to HANNIBAL in Italie. 10 How by the malice of HANNO, and floath or parsimonie of the Carthaginians. the supply was too long deferred. That the riches of the Carthaginians grew faster, than of the Romans. Of FABIVS and other old Roman Historians, how partiall they were in their writings.

Hen Magathe fonne of Amilear, had spent some time about the taking in of fuch Italians, as fell from the Romans after the battaile at Canna; his brother Hannibal fent for him to Capua, and thence dispatched him away to Carthage, with the joyfull message of Victorie. 20 He told the Carthaginian Senate, with how many Roman Generalls his brother had fought; what Confuls he had chaced, wounded, or flaine; how the flout Romans, that in the former warre neuer shunned any occasion of fight, were now growne so calme, that they thought their Dictator Fabius the only good Captaine, because he neuer durst aduenture to come to battaile; that, not without reafon, their spirits were thus abated, since Hannibal had slaine of them about two hundred thousand, and taken aboue fiftie thousand prisoners. He further told them of the Brutians, Apulians, Samnites, Lucans, and other people of Italie, that following the fortune of those great victories, had revolted vnto the Carthaginians. Among the rest he magnified Capua, as a goodly Citie, and fit to be not only (as alreadie it was) 20 Head of all the Capuans, but the chiefe feat of their Dominion in Italie: and there he informed them, how louingly his brother had beene entertained, where he meant to rest that winter, attending their supply. As for the warre, He said it was euen at an end, if they would now purfue it closely, and not give the Romans any breathing time, wherein to recollect themselves, and repaire their broken forces. Hee willed them to confider, that the warre was farre from home, in the Enemies Countrie: that so many Battailes had much diminished his brothers Armie; that the Souldiers, who had so well deserved, ought to be considered with liberall rewards, and that it was not good to burden their new Italian friends, with exactions of monie, corne, and other necessaries; but that these things must bee sent from Carthage: 40 which the victoric would requite with large amends. Finally hee caused the golden rings, taken from the fingers of the Roman Knights that were flaine, to bee poured out openly in the Court : which being measured, filled (as some say) three bushels, or (as others would rather haueit) no more than one; adding, that by this might appeare the greatnesse of the Roman calamitie, for a much as none but the * principall of that Order, were accustomed to weare that ornament,

Who so considers the former Punick Warre, may easily finde, that the State of Carthate neuer did receive, in all the durance thereof, any such hopefull advertisements from their Captaines abroad. Wherefore it is no meruaile, if the Errand of Mago found extraordinarie welcome. In the vehemencie of this joy, Himileo, a Senator 10 adverse to the faction of Hanne, is said to have demanded of that great perswader vnto peace with Rome, Whether he were fill of opinion, that Hannibal should bee veelded vp vnto the Romans; or whether he would forbid them to give thanks vnto the Gods, for this their good fuccesse. Hereunto though it bee not likely that

Hanno made the same formall answere, which Liuie puts into his mouth, calling the Carthaginian Senators Patres conscripti, by a terme proper to the Romans, and putting them in minde of his owne shamefull ouerthrow received at the llands Agateis: yet the summe of his speech appeares to have beene no lesse malicious, than it is set downe, for a fmuch as Hannibal himfelfe, at his departure out of Italie, exclaimed apainst the wickednesse of this Hanno; saying, that his hatred against the Barchines, had oppressed their Familie, when otherwise it could not, with the ruine of Carthage. Therefore it may well be, that he made such a jest of these victories, as is reported; faying, It ill beseemed him, who had vanquished the Romans, to call for 10 more helpe, as if he had beene beaten; or him, that had taken their campe, filled for footh with spoile, to make request for meat and monie. To these cauills, if anfwere were needfull, it might be faid, That other bootie than of horfes and flaues, little was to be found in the Roman campe: the best of the Souldiers carrying no other wealth into the field, than a few a filuer fluds in the bridles and trappings of a Lin. 1.22. their horses. If Hannibal had taken any maine convoy of monie and providions, going to supply all wants of a great Armie in some other Province, (as the two Scipio's are afterwards faid to have done, when they wanne the campe of Aldrabal, that carried along with him all the wealth of Spaine, in his journie towards Hale) then might fuch an objection more juftly have beene made vnto his demand of a fupply. 20 But the most likely part of Hanno his Oration, and wherein hee best might hope to preuaile, contained a perswasion to vse their fortune with moderation; and now to feeke peace, whileft they had fo much the better in warre. What would have beene the iffue of this counfaile, if it had beene followed, it were not casie to say. For though it bee likely, that the Roman pride would have brooked much indignitie, in freeing Italie from the danger of warre, yet it is not likely, that the faith, so often broken to the Carthaginians in former times, would haue beene kept entire, when any opinion of good advantage had called for revenge of so many shamefull ouerthrowes; since after this warre ended, and a new league concluded, no submissione behauiour could preserve Carthage from ruine, longer 20 than vntill fuch time, as Rome was at leifure from all other warres. This counfaile therefore of Hanno, though it might feeme temperate, was indeede very pestilent;

and served only to hinder the performance of a noble resolution. For it was concluded by a maine consent of the Senate, that fortie thousand Numidians, fortie Elephants, and great abundance of filuer, should bee sent ouer to Hannibal: and that, belides these, twentie thousand foot, and soure thousand horse, should be levied in Spaine; not only to supply, as neede should require, the Armies in that Province. but to be transported into Itali.

This great aide, had it beene as carefully fent, as it was readily decreed, the Roman Historians would not have found cause; to taxe the rechlesse improvidence of 40 Hannibal, in forbearing to march directly from Canne to Rome, or in refreshing his Armicamong the delights of Capua: the next yeares worke would have finished the businesse, with lesse dangerous aduenture; and the pleasures, which his men enjoyed among the Campans, would have beene commended, as rewards by him well thought upon, wherewith to animate both them and others, that were to bee imploied in the following warre. But either the too much carelefnesse of those, that were loth to make hafte in laying out their monie, before extreme necessitie required it; or the craftic malice of Hanne, and his fellowes, working vpon the private humours of men, that had more feeling of their owne commoditie, than fenfe of the publike neede; vtterly peruerted, and made unprofitable in the performance, the to order that had beene so well set downed. The b Elephants were sent : and some b Luclas. monie peraduenture; vncertaine it is, how long after. But those great forces of threescore thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, came not into Italie, till much was lost of that which alreadic had beene gotten, and a great part of the old Carthaeinian Armie, was first consumed by time, and sundrie accidents of warre. Only fome small numbers, no way answering vnto the proportion decreed, were sent into Spaine; and the journic of Afdrubal thence through France into Italie much talked of, but he not enabled therevnto, till many yeares were past, and the Romans had recovered their firength.

Here wee may note, what great riches the Carthaginians drew into their Citie. both by the Tributes received from their subjects, and by their wealthie Tradeof merchandize. For it is not long, fince the warre of the Mercinaries; and the perfidious tyrannic of the Romans, extorting in time of greatest necessitie twelve hundred talents; had exceedingly impourished Carthage: which was before brought into great want, even by the expence of fo much monie, as was to bee difburfed for re- 10 deeming of peace, after the loffe at & gateis. Yet we fee, what great Armies of Numidians, and Spaniards, befides those alreadie on foot, are appointed to the service in Italie, and how little the Carthaginians feare the want of monie in these chargeable undertakings: whereas the Romans, on the other fide, having three or foure yeares together beene forced to some extraordinarie cost, are faine to goe vpon credit cuen for the price of those slaues, which they bought of their owne Citizens to arme for their defence. Such advantage, in meanes to enrich their Treasurie, had the wealthie merchants of Carthage, trading in all parts of the Mediterran Sea, even from Tyrus their Mother-Citie in the bottome of the streights vnto the great Ocean, aboue the Romans : who lived on the fruits of their ground; and received their Tributes 20 from people following the same course of life. When time therefore was come, that the hatred of Rome found leifure to flew it felfe, in the destruction of Carthage; the impudence of Roman fallhood, in feeking an honest colour wherewith to shadow the intended breach of faith, discourred plainely whence the jealousie was bred, that this mightie Citie would againe rebell. For the Carthaginians, having giuen vp hostages, euen before the Roman Armie did set forth, to performe whatsoeuer should bee enjoyned them, with condition that their Citic might not beedeftroied; and having accordingly, when they were so required, yeelded vp all their weapons, and engines of warre; the Romans told them plainly, That the Citie of Carthage, which was the Bodie of the Citizens, should be friendly dealt withall, but 20 the Towns must needes be demolished, and removed into some other place, that should be twelve miles distant from the Sea. For (faid the Romans) this Trade of merchandize, by which yee now line, is not fo fit for peaceable men, fuch as yee promise to become hereafter, as is the Trade of husbandrie; an wholsome kinde of life, and enduing men with many laudable qualities, which enable their bodies, and make them very apt for conversation. This villainous dealing of the Romans, though fugred with glofing wordes, plainly shewes, what good observation the elder Cato had made of the haftie growth of Carthage in riches. For when, being demanded his opinion in the Senate about any matter whatfocuer it were, added still this conclusion, Thus I thinke; and that Carthage should be destroied; He may seeme, 40 not only to have had regard vnto that present wealth, which at his being there hee had found in the Citie, but much more vnto these times, and the great height whervnto it rofe, euen fuddenly as wee fee, out of many calamities, whileft the Romans thought, that it had not beene in case to dare so terrible a warre.

But as the Carthaginians, in gathering wealth, were more industrious and skilfull than the Ramans; so came they farre short of them, in the honourable care of the publike good : having every one, or most of them, a more principall regard of his owne private benefit. This made them (belides the negligence commonly found in Victors) when the first heat of their affection, wherein they concluded to pursue the warre strongly, was ouer-past, goe more leifurely to worke, than had been erequifite in the execution. It was cafie for Hanne to perswade couctous men, that they should first of all defend their owne in Spaine. This might be done with little charges. Afterwards, when that Province was fecured, they might fend an Armie into Italie; so going to worke orderly by degrees. For it were no wisedome, to commit all the strength of the Common-wealth to one hazard of fortune, against the Encmies; or (which perhaps were worse) to the Gouernement of an ambitious man. and his brethren; who having once (if they could fo doe) finished the warre, might casily make * Hannibal a King, and subdue Carthage, with the forces that shee had " Officham. given them to the conquest of Rome.

By fuch malicious working of Hanno, and by their owne flacknesse, incredulitie, sed Hannibal, dulnesse, or niggardize, the Carthaginians were perswaded rather to make small difbur sements in Spaine, than to set up all their rest at once in Italie. Yet was it indeede woon warre, impossible, to hold a Countrie of so large extent, and so open a coast, as that of that is her 10 Spaine, free from all incursion of the Enemie : especially the affection of the Natu- might line ralls being (as in a new Conquest) ill chablished. A better way therefore it had been with Legions, to make a running warre, by which the Romans might have beene found occupied, as knowing no euen with the ordinarie Carthaginian Garrisons, or some little addition thereunto. otherway to For if it were thought meet, to deferre the profecution of their maine intendment a King, Lin. against Rome it selfe, vntill such time as every little thorne were pulled out of the lib,21. fides of fo great a Prouince, then must Emporia have been belieged and forced; which by reason of alliance with the Masslians, gave vnto the Romans, at all times when they pleased, a readie and secure Harbour. But the Towns of Emperie was too firong to be wonne in hafte; it had long defended it felfe against the Barbarians; haon uing not about foure hundred paces of wall to the maine Land, and exceedingly well fortified; a great Spanish Towne of the same name, lying without it, that was three miles in compasse, very strong likewise, and friend vnto the Grecians, though not ouer-much trufted. Wherefore to force this Towne of Emporie, that was, befides the proper strength, like to be so well affished by the Massilians, Romans, and some Spaniards; would have been a worke of little leffe difficultie, than was the Roman warre (in appearance) after the battaile at Canna: yea it had beene in effect none other, than to alter the feat of the warre; which Hannibal had alreadie fixed, with better judgement, neare vnto the gates of Rome. The difficultie of this attempt being fuch, as caused it altogether to be forborne; great follie it was, to bee much on troubled about expelling the Romans veterly out of Spaine : whom they might more easily have diverted thence, and drawne home to their owne doores, by making strong warre vpon their Citie. For even so the Romans afterwards removed Hannibal into Africk, by fending an Armic to Carthage; and by taking the like courfe. they now endeuoured to change the feat of the warre, transferring it out of Halie into Spaine. But the private affections of men, regarding the common good no otherwife, than as it is acceffarie to their owne purpofes, did make them eafily winke at opportunities, and hope, that somewhat would fall out well of it felfe, though they fet not to their helping hands. Hanno was a malicious wretch : yet they that thought him fo, were well enough contented to hearken vnto his discourses, as lone 40 as they were plaulible, and tended to keepe the purse full. In the meane while they fuffered Hannibal, and all the noble house of Amilear, to wearie themselves in trauaile for the Common-wealth: which all Carthage in generall highly commended, but weakely affifted; as if the industrie of these Barchines had beene some hat more than needfull. Surely the Carthaginians, in generall, were farre leffe honorable than the People of Rome: not only in gouernement of their fubject Provinces, but in administration of their owne Estate; few of them preferring the respect of the Weale publike about their private interest. But as they thrived little in the end, by their parlimonic vled toward their owne Mercinaries, when the former Roman warre was finished: so the conclusion of this warre present, will make them complaine, with 50 feeling lighes, of their negligence in supplying Hannibal, after the victoric at Can-na; when gladly they would giue all their Treasures, to redeeme the opportunitie, that now they let passe, as if it were cost enough to send a few handfulls into lowing will make manifelt. Particularly how matters were ordered in Spaine by the Carthaginian Gouernours, it is very hard, and almost impossible, to set downe. For though we must not reprehend, in that worthic Historian Liuie, the tender loue of his owne Countrie, which made him give credit vnto Fabius and others : vet must we not, for his fake, beleeve those lies, which the vnpartiall judgement of Polybius hath condemned, in the Writers that gaue them originall. It were needleffe to rehearfeall that may be found in Polybius, concerning the vntruth of that Roman Historian Fabius. One example may suffice. Hee faith of Amilear and his men at Eryx, in the former warre, That having cleane spent their strength, and being euen 10 broken with many miseries, they were glad to submit themselves vnto the Romans. Contrarie hercunto we finde in the Life of AMILCAR, fet downe by Emilius Probus, That Eryx was in such fort held by the Carthaginians, that it seemed to bee in as good condition, as if in those parts there had not been any warre. These wordes, being referred to the braue resolution of the Carthaginian Souldiers, and the singular vertue of their Generall infusing such spirit into them; may be taken as not ouer-liberall. For in the Treatic of peace betweene Amilear and Catulus, when the Roman first of all required, that this Garrison of Ergx should lay downetheir Armes, and for fake Siel, threatning, that otherwise he would not talke of any composition: Amilear boldly bad him choose, whether he would talke of it, or no; for that the 20 Armes, which his Countrie had put into his handes to vie against her Enemies, it was not his purpose to yeeld vp vnto them. Now since the Romans, contrarie to their custome vpon like aduantages, were content to let Amilear have his will, and not to fland with him vpon point of honour, whilest otherwise they might quietly rid their handes of him; plaine enough it is, that they were farre from thinking him a man confumed with miseries, as Fabius would have him seeme. Hereunto agrees the relation of Polybius: who flatly, and by name, chargeth Fabius with vntruth; faying, that how focuer Amilear, and his Souldiers, had endured all extremitie, yet they behaued themselues as men that had no sense thereof; and were as farre from being either vanquished, or tired, as were their Enemies. Such being the difference 20 betweene Fabius (as also perhaps betweene other old Writers of the Roman storie) and those that had more regard of truth, than of flattering the mightie Citie of Rome: we must take it in good part, that how soeuer Liuie introduceth Hanno, in one place, joyning very foolishly his owne shamefull ouerthrow at the Ilands * Egamagares in-fular, Ergeeng teis, with the great services of Amilear at Ergu, as if both of them had had a like event; yet a elsewhere he forbeareth not to put a more likely tale (though with as impudent a commemoration of his owne vnhappie conduct) into the same Hanno his mouth, making him fay, That the affaires of Carthage went neuer better, than a little before the loffe of their fleet in that battaile at Sea: wherein himselfe was Gethat this Fabius, with Val. Antias, and others of the like stampe, had either written

(if they could not write more temperately) nothing at all; or that the tender affection of Linie to his Rome, had not caused him to thinke too well of their relations:

Strangereports of the Roman victories in Spaine, before ASDRVBAL the Sonne of AMILCAR followed thence his brother HANNIBAL into Italie.

Thath beene shewed alreadie, how P. Cornelius Scipio the Conful, returning from Gaule into Italie, to encounter with Hannibal at his defcent from the Alpes, fent before him his brother Cneus, with part of his Fleet and Armie, into Spaine. Two Roman Legions, with foureteene thousand foot of the Confederates, and twelve hundred horse.

had beene alotted vnto this Gonful, therewith to make warre in Spaine against Hanno nibal; who fince he was marching into Italie with the strength of his Armie, P. Scipio beleeved, that a good part of these his owne forces might well bee spared from the Spanish Expedition; and therefore made bold to carrie some of the number back with him, fending on his brother with the rest, as his Lieutenant. Publius himselfe remayned in Italie all the time of his Confulfhip: which being expired, He was fent Proconful into Spaine by the Senate, with an Armie of eight thousand men, and a Acet of thirtie Gallics.

The Acts of these two Brethren in their Province, were very great; and, as they are reported, somewhat meruailous. For they continually preuailed in Spaine, against the Carthaginians: whom they vanquished in so many battailes, and with-drew from on their Alliance fo many of the Spaniards their Confederates; that wee have cause to wonder, how the Enemic could so often finde meanes to repaire his forces, and returne strong into the field. But as the Romans, by pretending to deliuer the Countrie from the tyrannic of Carthage, might casily winne vnto their Confederacie, as many as were galled with the African yoke, and durftadnenture to breake it : fo the ancient reputation of the first Conquerours, might serve to arme the Naturalls against these Invaders; and to reclaime those, that had revolted vnto the Romans, were it only by the memorie of fuch ill fuccesse, as the like rebellions in former times had found. Hereto may be added the Carthaginian treasure: which easily raifed fouldiers, among those valiant, but (in that Age) poore, and gold-thirstic Na-20 tions. Neither was it of small importance, that so many of the Spaniards had their children, kinfmen, and friends, abroad with Hannibal in his Italian warres; or ferning the Carthaginians in Africk. And peraduenture, if we durft be bold to fay it; the victorics of the Scipio's were neither fo many, nor fo great, as they are fet out by Linie. This we may be bold to fay, That the great Captaine Fabius, or Linie in his person, maketh an objection vnto Scipie, which neither Scipie, nor Liuie for him, doth answer, That if A SDRVBAL were vanquished, as SCIPIO would say, by him in Spaines strange it was, and as little to his honour, as it had beene extremely dangerous to Rome, that the same vanquished man should inuade Italie. And it is indeede an incredible narration, That Adrubal being closed in on all sides, and not knowing how to escape 40 out of a battaile, faue only by the fleepe descent of Rocks, ouer a great River that lay at his back, ranne away with all his monic, Elephants, and broken troups, ouer Tagus, directly toward the Pyrenees, and fo toward Italie; spon which hee fell with more than threefcore thousand armed fouldiers. Neither doe I see, how it hangs well together, That he chose a peece of ground very defencible, but most incommodious for his retrait, if he should happen to be vanquished; and yet, that he sent all his monie and Elephants away before him; as not intending to abide the Enemie: Or how it could be true, that thefe his Elephants, being fo fent before, could hinder the Romans (for fo are they faid to have done in the last battaile betweene him and Scipio) from breaking into his camp. Wherefore we can no more than be forrie, that 50 all Carthaginian records of this warre, and Spanish, (if there were any) being vtterly loft, we can know no more thereof, than what it hath pleased the Romans to tell vs: vnto whom it were no wisdome to give too much credit. In this regard, I will summarily runne ouer the doings of the Scipio's in Spaine; not greatly infifting on partiticulars, whereof there is no great certaintie.

retaining (till the fame name with little inflexion: That by the fame of his clemencie he allured many Nations to become subject vnto Rome, as the storie beginnes of him, I could easily beleeue, if I understood by what occasion they had neede to vse his elemencie, or he to give fuch famous example thereof, being a meere firanger. and having no jurisdiction in the Countrie, Yet is it certaine, that he was a man very courteous, and one that could well infinuate himfelfe into the loue of the Barbarians; among whom, his dexteritie in practife had the better fuccesse, for that hee feemed to have none other errand, than fetting them at libertie. This pretext availed with fome : others were to bee hired with monie : and fome hee compelled to 10 yeeld by force or feare; especially, when he had wonne a battaile against Hanno. In. to all Treaties of accord, made with these people, likely it is that hee remembred to infert this Article, which the Romans in their Alliances neuer forgate, vnleffe in long times past, and when they dealt with the Cartheginians, or their Superiours: Orat, pro com. Maieftatem Pop. Rom. comiter conferuent, which is, as Tullie interpretsit, That they (bould gently (or kindly) up-hold the Maiestie of the People of Rome. This was in appearance nothing troublesome: yet implied it indeede an obscure couenant of subjection. And in this respect it may be true, That the Spaniards became ditionis Romane; of the Roman iuri/diction; though hereafter they will fay, they had no fuch meaning. That part of the Countrie wherein Scipio landed, was newly subdued by 20 Hannibal in his passage toward Italie; and therefore the more casily shaken out of obedience. Particularly in the Bargutians, Hannibal had found, at his comming among them, fuch an apprehension of the Roman greatnesse, as made him suspect, that any light occasion would make them start from the Carthaginians. Wherefore he not only appointed Hanno Governour over them, as over the rest of the Province betweene Iberus and the Pyrenees, but made him also their Lord; that is, (as I conceiue it; for I doe not thinke he gaue the Principalitie of their Countrie vnto Hanno and his Heires,) He made him not only Lieutenant generall over them, in matters of warre, and things concerning the holding them in obedience to Carthage; but tooke from them all inferiour Officers of their owne, leaving them to be gouerned 30 by Hanno, at his diferetion. These therefore had good cause to rejoyce at the comming of Scipio swith whom, others also (no doubt) found reasons to joyne; it being the custome of all conquered Nations, in hatred of their present Lords, to throw themselves indiscreetly into the protection of others, that many times prove worse than the former. So were the Neapolitans, and Milanois, in the age of our Grand-fathers, wearie by turnes of the Spaniards and French; as more sensible still of the prefent euill which they felt, than regardfull of the greater mischiefe, whereinto they ranne by feeking to avoide it. This bad affection of his Province, would not fuffer Hanno to temporize. Tenthousand foot, and a thousand horse, Hannibal had left unto him : belides which it is like, that some forces hee was able to raise out of his 40 Prouince. Therefore hecaduentured a battaile with Sopio; wherein hee was ouerthrowne and taken. Following this victorie, Scipio befieged Stiffum, a Towne hard by, and wanne it. But Afarubal having passed therus, and comming too late to the reliefe of Hanno, with eight thousand foot and a thousand horse, sell vpon the Roman Sea-forces, that lay not farre about Tarracon, whom he found careleffe, as after a victorie, rouing abroad in the Countrie; and with great flaughter draue them abourd their ships. This done, he ranne vp into the Countrie, where he with drew the Illergetes from the Roman partie, though they had given hoftages to Scipio. Scipio in the meane scason was gone to visit and aide his fleet : where having set things in order, he returned back, and made toward Adnubal; who durst not abide his comming, but with drew himselfe againe operaberus. So the Illergetes were compelled by force, having lost Athanagia their chiefe Citie, to pay a fine to the Romans, and increase the number of their hostages. The Ausetani likewise, Consederates of the Carthaginians, were belieged in their chiefe Towne: which they defended thirtie daies: hoping in vaine, that the sharpe Winter, and great abundance of Snow that fell would have made the Romans to diflodge. But they were faine at length to weeld; and for this their obstinacie, they were amerced twentie talents of filter. During the fiege, the Lacetani came to helpe their distressed Neighbours; and were beaten home by Scipio, leaving twelve thousand of their companie dead behinde them. I cannot but wonder, how these Lacetani; that are said to bee the first which embraced the friendship of Scipie, should, without any cause remembred, become Carthaginian on the sudden, in the next newes that wee heare of them. As also it is strange, that all the Sea-coast Northward of Iberus, having lately become voluntari-to ly ditionis Romana; Subject unto Rome, should, in continuance of the storie, after a Linder few lines, hold warre against Scipio, without any affistance of the Carthaginians. Neither can I believe, that Aldrubal, as it were by a charme, firred up the Illergetes, making them lay aside all care of their Hostages, and take armes in his quarreil; whilest himselfe had not the daring to stand against Scipio, but ranne away, and saued himselse beyond Iberus. Philinus perhaps, or some Carthaginian Writer, would haue told it thus: That Scipio adventuring too farre into the Countrie, was beaten by Afdrubal back to his ships, whence heedurst not sirre, vntill Wintercame on : at what time this Carthaginian returned into the heart of his Province, Icaving some few Garrisons to defend those places, that after Scipio wanne, by returning upon them, vnlooked for, through a deepe fnow. As for the Lacetani, Illergetes, and the reft, we may reasonably thinks, that they sought their owne benefit : helping them-

selues one while by the Romans against the Carthaginians; and contrariwise, vpon fense of injuries received, or apprehension of more grieuous tyrannie, under which they feared to be brought by these new Masters, hearkening againe vnto the comfortable promises of those, that had ruled them before. For that it was their intent toliue vnder their owne Countrie Lawes, and not vnder Gouernours sent from Rome or Carthage, their demeanour in all Ages following may tellific : even from henceforth vnto the dayes of Augustus Cafaratill when they were neuer throughly conquered.

The yeare following this, Cn. Scipio had a vidorie against the Carthoginians, in fight at Sea; or rather came you them villochallor, while they rode at Anchor, most of their men being on shore. All their ships that ranne not too far on ground, he tooke: and thereby grew Master of the whole coast; landing at pleasure, and doing great hurt in all places that were not well defenced. After this victorie, aboue one hundred and twentie Nations, or pettie Estates, in Spaine, are said to have submitted themselves vnto the Romans, and given Hostages: whereby Adrubal was compelled to flie into the vtmost corners of the Land, and hide himselfe in Lusitania. Yet it followes; that the Illergetes did againe rebell; that Aldrubal hereupon came ouer Iberus; and that Scipso (though having cafily vanquished the Illergetes) went 40 not forth to meet him, but firred vp against him the Celtiberians, that lately were become his subjects and had given him Hostages. These tooks from the Carthaginian three Townes, and vanquilhed him in two battailes; wherein they flue fifteen thousand of his men, and tooke foure thousand prisoners. Then arrived P. Scipio, with the supply before mentioned : and henceforward the two brethren joyntly administred the businesse in Spaine. The Carthaginians being occupied in the Celtiberian Warre; the two Scipio's did, hand cunctanter; without feare or doubt, passeouer Iberus, and beliege Sagantum. Little cause of doubt had they, if Cn. had alreadie subdued many Nations beyond it, and, among many others, the same Celtiberians, that with their proper forces were able 50 to vanquish Afdrubal. Bostar, the Gouernour of Saguntum, a simple man, suffered himselfe to be perswaded by one Acedux a Spaniard, that the only way to get the fauour and heartie good will of the Countrie, was by freely restoring vnto them their Hostages; as resting, without any pledge, assured of their faith. But the crastie Spamiard, being trusted with this message and restitution of the Hostages, carried them all to the Roman Generalls: perfwading them, as hee had done Boltar, to make the Liberalitie their owne. Hereby the Romans purchased much loue : if the tale were true; and if it were not rather true, as afterward and ere this we finde, that all the Spanish Hostages were left in new Carthage. I am wearie of rehearling so many particularities, whereof I can beleeue fo few. But fince wee finde no better certainties. we must content our selves with these.

The yeare following was like vnto this: Adrubal must be beaten againe. The two Scipio's divide their forces: Cn. makes warre by Land; P. by Sea. Aldrubal, with much labour and entreatie, hath gotten foure thouland foot, and fine hundred horse, out of Africk : Hee repaires his fleet; and prouides every way to make refistance. But all his chiefe Sca-men, and Masters of his ships, revolt vnto the Romans: because they had beene chidden the last yeare for their negligence, which had betraied the Nauie. The revolt of these ship-masters animates to rebellion the Carpefians, or Carpetani, an In-land people about Toledo in the very Center of Spaine, Thefe doe much mischiefe, so that Astrabal is faine to make a journie to them. His sudden comming cuts off some of them, that were found scattered abroad in the fields. But they, making head, so valiantly affaile him, that they drive him, for very feare, to incampe himselfe strongly on an high peece of ground; whence hee dares not come forth to give them battaile. So they take a Towne by force, wherein hee had laid vp all his pronisions; and shortly make themselves Masters of the Countrie round 20 about. This good successe breedes negligence; for which they dearly pay. Aldrubal comes vpon them, takes them vnprepared, beates them, kills the most of them, and disperseth the rest; so that the whole Nation yeeldesh to him the next day, Thencome directions from Carthage, that Aldrubal should leade his Armie forthwith into Italie: which we may wonder, why the Carthaginians would appoint him to doe, if they had beene informed by his letters in what hard case he was, and had fo weakely supplied him, as is shewed before. But thus wee finde it reported: and that vpon the very rumour of this his journie, almost all Spaine was readie to fall to the Romans. Afarubal therefore fends word presently to Carthage, That this must not be fo : or, if they will needes i que it fo , that then they must fend him a Succession four, and well attended with a f g Armie, which to employ they should finde worke more than enough; fuch so table men were the Roman Generalls. But the Senate of Carthage is not much moved with this excuse: Astrubal must needes bee gone; and Himileo, with fuch forces as are thought expedient for that feruice, both by Land and Sea, is fent to take the charge of Spaine. Wherefore Aldrubal hath now no more to doe, than to furnish himselse with store of monie, that hee might have wherewithall to winne the friendship of the Gaules; through whose Countries hee must passe, as Hannibal had done before him. The Carthaginians were greatly too blame, for not remembring to ease him of this care. But since it can be no better, he laies great Impositions vpon all the Spaniards his subjects: and having gotten together as much treasure as he could, onward he marcheth toward therus. The Scipio's hearing these newes, are carefull how to arrest him on the way. They besiege ibera (so called of the Rivers name running by it) the richest towne in all those quarters, that was confederate with Afdrubal: who thereupon steps aside to relieue it. The Romans meet him, and fight a battaile with him : which they winne the more casily. for that the Spaniards, his followers, had rather bee vanquished at home; than get the victorie, and afterwards be haled into Italie. Great numbers are flaine : and few should have escaped, but that the Spaniards ranne away, ere the battailes were throughly joyned. Their campe the Romans take, and spoile: whereby (questionleffe) they are meruailoufly enriched; all the monie that could be raked together in spaine, being carried along in this Italian Expedition. This dayes euent joynes all Spaine to the Romans, if any part of the Countrie flood in doubt before; and puts Afdrubal fo farre from all thought of travailing into Italie, that it leaves him small hope of keeping himselse safe in Spaine. Of these exploits aduertisement is sent to Rome: and Letters to the Senate, from P. and Cn. Scipio, whereof the Contents are: That they have neither monie, apparrell, nor bread, wherewith to fustaine their Armie and Fleet; That all is wanting; so as vnlesse they may bee supplied from Rome, they can neither hold their forces together, nor tarrie any longer in the Prouince. These Letters come to Rome in an euill season; the State being scarcely able, after the loffe at Canna, to helpe it felfe at home. Yet reliefe is fent : how hardly, and how much to the commendations of that loue and care, which the private Citizens of Rome bare vnto the Common-wealth, shall be inserted elsewhere, into the Relation of things whereof the truth is leffe questionable. At the comming of this fupply, the two Scipie's purfue Aldrubal, and hunt him out of his lurking holes.

What elfe can we thinke; that remember the last newes of him, and how fearfully he mistrusted his owne safetie? They finde him, and Mago, and Amilear the sonne of Bomilear, with an Armie of threefcore thousand men, befreging ilitures: (which the learned Ortelius, and others, probably conjecture to haue flood, where Carnnena is now, in the Kingdome of Aragon; for there was Illiturgis, afterward called Forum Iulii, quite another way) a Towne of the Illergetes their nearest Neighbours, for hauing renolted vnto the Romans. The Towne is greatly distressed; but most of all, with want of victuailes. The Romans therefore breake through betweene the Enemies camps, with terrible flaughter of all that refift them; and having victualled the wealthie carriages, when his campe was taken after the battaile by Ibera. Howforuer it happens, the Carthagintans (according to their custome) are beaten againe at Incibili: where there are of them abone thirteene thousand flaine, and about three tin, last thousand taken; besides two and fortie Ensignes, and nine Elephants. After this, (in a manner) all the people of Spaine fell from them vnto the Romans. Thus could Fabius, Valerius Anties, or some other Historian, to whom Linie gaue credit, conquer all Spaine twice in one yeare, by winning famous victories; whereof these good Captaines, P. and Cn. Scipio, perhaps were not aware.

20 place, encourage the townsmen to defend their walls as stoutly, as they should anon behold them fighting manfully with the besiegers, in their behalfe. So they issue forth, about fixteen thousand against threescore thousand; and killing more of the Linds. enemies, than themselves were in number, drive all the three Carthaginian Commanders, every one, out of his quarter; and take that day, belides priloners and other bootie, fiftie and eight Ensignes. The Carthaginian Armie, being thus beaten from Illiturgi, fall vpon Incibili, that flood a little Southward from the mouth of Iberus. The Spaniards are blamed, as too greedie of earning monie by warre, for thus te-enforcing the broken Carthaginians. But it may be wondred, whence the Carthaginians had monie to pay them: fince Afdrubal was lately driven to poll the Coun-30 trie, wanting monie of his owne; and being beaten in this journie, had loft his

The Romans, notwithstanding this large accesse of Dominion, winter on their 40 ownefide of therus. In the beginning of the next yeare, great Armies of the Spaniards rife against Aldrubal; and are overthrowne by him. P. Scipio, to helpe these his friends, is forced to make great halte over the River. At Caftrum altum, a place in the mid-way betweenenew Carthage and Saguntum, famous by the death of the great Amilear, P. Scipio incampeth; and flores the place with victuailes, being flrong and defencible; as intending to make it his feat for a while. But the Countrie round about is too full of Enemies: the Carthaginian horse have charged the Romans in their march, and are gone off cleare; falling also vpon some stragiers, or such as lagged behinde their fellowes in march, they have cut off two thousand of them. Hereupon it is thought behouefull, to retire vnto some place more assured. So Pub. 50 withdrawes himselfe vnto Mons Victoria: that riling somewhat Eastward from Incibili, ouer-lookes the Southerne Out-let of Iberus. Thither the Carthaginians pursue him: His brother Cn. repaires vnto him; and Afdrubal the sonne of Gesco, with a full Armie, arrives to helpe his Companions. As they lie thus neare incamped together, P. Scipio, with some light-armed, going closely to view the places therabouts, is discovered by the enemics : who are like to take him, but that he withdrawes himfelfe to an high peece of ground; where they beliege him, vntill his brother Cn. fetch him off, After this (but I know not why) Castulo, a great citie of Spaine, whence Hannibal had taken him a wife, joyneth with the Romans; though being farre diflant from them, and feated on the head of the River Batis. Neuertheleffe the Carthaginians passe ouer Iberus, to besiege Illiturgi againe, wherein lodgeth a Roman garrison; hoping to winne it by famine. Wee may justly wonder, what should moue them to neglect the rebellion of Castule, yea and the Roman Armie lying so close by them, and to seeke adventures further off, in that very place, wherein they had beene so grieuously beaten the yeare before. But thither they goe : and thither fol- 10 lowes them Cn. Sapie with one Legion: who enters the Towne by force, breakes out you them the next day, and in two battailes kills aboue twelue thou fand, and takes more than a thousand of them prisoners, with fixe and thirtie Ensignes. This victorie (doubtleffe) is remarkeable : confidering that the greatest Roman Legion at this time, consisted of no more than five thousand men. The vanquished Carthaginians beliege Bigarra: but that fiege is also raised by Cn. Scipio. Thence the Cartha. ginians remove to Munda; where the Romans are soone at their heeles. There is a great battaile fought, that lasteth foure houres, wherein the Remans get a notable victorie; and a more notable would have gotten, had not Cn. Scipio beene wounded. Thirtie nine Elephants are killed; and twelve thousand men; three thou- 20 fand prisoners taken, and seuen and fiftie Ensignes. The Carthaginians flie to Auringes; and the Romans pursue them. Cn. Scipio in a Litter is carried into the field, and vanquisheth the Carthaginians againe : but kills not halfe so many of them, as before; good cause why, for there are fewer of them left to fight. Notwithstanding all these overthrowes, the Spaniards, a people framed even by nature to set warre on foot, quickly fill up the broken troupes of Afdrubal: who having also hired some of the Gaules, adventures once more to trie his fortune with the Romans. But he is beaten againe, and loofeth eight thousand of his men; besides Prisoners, Elephants. Ensignes, and other appurtenances. After so many victories, the Romans are cuen ashamed, to leave Saguntum enthralled vnto the Carthaginians; since, in behalfe of 20 that Citie, they had at first entred into this warre. And well may wee thinke it strange, that they had not recovered it long before, since wee may remember, that long before this they had wonne all the Countrie once and againe. But it must not be forgotten, that they had ere now befieged Saguntum; and were faine (as appears) to goetheir way without it: fo as they neede not to blush, for having so long forborne to doe that, which ere now they had attempted, but were vnable to performe. At the present they winne Sagantum: and restore the possession thereof vnto such of the poore dispersed Citizens, as they can finde out. They also waste and destroy the Countrie of the Turdetani, that had ministred vnto Hannibal matter of quarrell against the Saguntines. This last action (questionlesse) was much to their honour; 40 and wherein we may be affured, that the Carthaginians would have diffurbed them, if they had beene able.

But ouer-looking now this long continuance of great victories, which the Roman haue gotten in Spaine, other print or token of all their braue exploits, were can perceiue none, than this recourier of sagantame: excepting the flooping of Aforabals journie; which was indeede of greateft importance, but appertaining to their owne defence. For they haue landed at Emporta, an Hauen-towne, built and peopled by a Colonic of the Paecants, kinnet othe Chlaffilians, friends to the Romans; They haue cafily wonne to their partie, loft, recourted, and loft againe, fome pettic bordering Nations of the Spaniards, that are carried one while by perfundion, other 50 whiles by force, and fometimes by their owner vincted paffons; and now finally they haue wonne a Towne, whereof the Carthagnians held entire poffeffion; who had rooted out the old Inhabitants. Wherefore we may cafily belecue, that when they took & Seantim of they took it not by furprife; which is to be fulfoefted, fince in this Action wee finde no particulars remembred, as when the same place was taken by Hannibal) they had gotten the better of their Enemies in some notable fight. In like fort also must we thinke, that all those battailes lately remembred, after euery one of which Afdrubal fate downe before some place, that had rebelled or seemed readie to rebell, were prosperous vnto the Carthaginians. For it is not the custome of Armies vanquished, to carrie the warre from Towne to Towne, and beleaguer Cities of their Enemies; but to fortific themselves within their owne places of strength, and therein to attend the leuie and arrivall of new supplies. And surely, if the Romans had beene absolute Masters of the field, when they wanne Sagantum. 10 they would not have confumed a whole yeare following in practifing only with the Celtiberians the next adjoyning people. Yet made they this, little leffe than two yeares businesse. Of these Celiberians we heare before, That they have yeelded yo themselues vnto the Romans; for securitie of their faith, given Hostages to Scipio; and at his appointment, made warre against the Carthaginians, with their proper forces. Wherefore it is strange, that they are now thus hardly wrought; and, not without expresse condition of a great summe, hired to serve in the Roman Campe. How this may hold together I cannot perceive; vnleffe perhaps in those dayes it were the Roman custome, or rather the custome of some bad Author whom Linic followes, to call every Messenger, or stragler, that entred their campe, an Hostage of 20 that people from whom he came.

The Celtiberians at length, hired with great rewards, fend an Armic of thirtie thouland to helpe the Romans: out of which, three hundred the fitteft men are chofen, and carried into Italie, there to deale with their Countrimen that follow Hamibals in his warres: Butifany of thefe three hundred returne back into Spaine, it is to be feared, that he brings with him fuch newes of the riches and welfare of Hamibals men, that all his fellowes at home are the leffe vnwilling to follow Afarbala, when he shall next have a defire to leade them into Italie. Hereof wee finde more than probabilitie, when these Mercinarie Celtiberians meet the Carthaginian Armie in the field. The two Seipis's, presuming on this accesse of thrength, divide their forces, 20 and seeke out the Enemies who lie not fair off with three Armies. Assume to and fecke out the Enemies; who lie not farre off with three Armies. Aftendal, the fonne of Amilear, is neareft at hand; cuen among the Celiberians, at Amitorgis. With him Cn. Scipio doubts not to take good order: but the feare is, that this one part of the Carthaginian forces being defiroid; Astega, and Aftendal the fonne of Gifea, hearing the newes, will make who of their diffance, which is fue daies march, and, by running into the furtheft parts of the Countrie, faue them fellues from being outertaken. Publim therefore mult make the more hafte, and take with him the better Souldiers, that is, two parts of the old Roman Armie; leauning the third part, and all the Celiberians, to his brother. Hee that hath the longer journie to make, comes somewhat the sooner to his liues end. Maga, and Aftendal the Conne of 40 G/60, are not studying how to runne away: they finde no such necessitie. They joyne their forces together; meet with P. Seipio; and lay at him so hardly, that he is driven to keepe himselfic close within his Trenches; wherein he thinkes himselfe not well assured. Especially he is vexed by Ms/amis/a. Prince of the Ms/s/s/il, Numidians bordering youn Mauritania, in the Region called now. Tremizen: to whom the chiefe honour of this service is assured, for that he becomes afterward Confederate with the Romans. In this dangerous case P. Seipio gets intelligence, that Indivisio, a. Spanis Prince, is comming with seuen thousand and fine hundred of the Suesselfami, to joyne with his Enemies. Fearing therefore to be streight shut up;, and besinged, He issues of the sum of the 50 Lieutenant, with a fatall companie, to defend the campe. He meets with individual but is not able, according to his hope, to defeat him at the first encounter. The fight continues so long, that the Namidian horse appeare (whom he thought to have been ignorant of his departure) and fall vpon the Romans on all fides: neuther are the Civil Institution for the the Companies of the Companies.

taine which way to turne, yet fighting, and animating his men, where neede most requireth, is ftruck through with a lance, and flaine : very few of his Armie escaping the same destinie, through benefit of the darke night. The like end hath Cn. Scipio within nine and twentie dayes after. At his meeting with Afarubal, the Celtiberian Mercinaries all forfake him; pretending that they had warre in their owne Countrie. If Anitorgis, where Afdrubal then lay, were, as Ortelius following Beuterus takes it; a Celtiberian Towne; this was no vaine pretence, but an apparent truth. But we may justly beleeue, that they were wonne by Afdrubal, and casily perswaded to take as much monie for not fighting, as they should have had for hazarding their liues. Cn. Scipio therefore being vnable to stay them; and no lesse vnable, without 10 their helpe, either to relift the Enemie, or to joyne with his Brother, makes a very violent retrait; herein only differing from plaine flight, that hee keepes his men together. Afdrubal presseth hard vpon him : and Mago, with Afdrubal the sonne of Gefco, having made an end of Publiss, haften to dispatch his brother after him. Scipio steales from themall, by night; but is ouer-taken the next day by their horse, and arrested, in an open place of hard stonic ground, where growes not so much as a hrrub, vnfit for defence of his Legions against fuch enemies. Yet a little Hill hee findes, of eafic afcent on enery fide, which he takes for want of a more commodious place, and fortifies with pack-faddles, and other luggage, for default of a better Pallifado. These weake defences the Carthaginians soone teare in funder : and, breaking 20 in on all hands, leave very few of them alive; that faving themselves, I know not how, within some woods adjoyning, escape vnto T. Fonteius, whom Publius had left in his camp, as is before faid. It is a terrible ouerthrow, they fay, out of which no man escapes. Yet, how they that were thus hemmed in on every side, in so bare a ground as affoorded not a shrub to couer them, could breake out, and shrowd themfelues within woods adjoyning, I should much wonder; did not a greater miracle following call away mine attention. T. Fonteius is in P. Scipio's campe, on the North side of Iberus, fearefull (as may be supposed) of his owne life; since his Generall, with two parts of the Roman Armic, had little hope to remaine long fafe within it. Thither comes L. Martius, a yong Roman Gentleman of a notable spirit: who ha- 30 uing gathered together the scattered Souldiers, and drawne some Companies out of their Garrisons, makes a pretic Armie. The Souldiers, being to choose a Generall by most voices, preferre this L. Martius before Fonteius the Lieutenant; as well they may. For Afdrubal, the sonne of Gesco, comming vpon them; this L. Martius fo encourageth his men, (fondly weeping when hee led them forth, vpon remembrance of their more honourable Generalls lately flaine) and admonisheth them of their present necessitie, that he beates the Carthaginians into their Trenches. A notable victorie per haps he might haue gotten, but that hee wifely founds the retrait; referring the furic of his Souldiers to a greater occasion. The Carthaginians are at first amazed, and wonder whence this new boldnesse growes, in enemies lately van- 40 quished, and now againe little better than taken: but when they see, that the Roman dares not follow his advantage, they returne to their former securitie; and vtterly despising him, set neither Corps du gard, nor Sentinell, but rest secure, as if no enemie were neare. Martius therefore animates his fouldiers with lively wordes; and tells them, That there is no adventure more fafe, than that which is furthest from suspition of being under-taken. They are soone perswaded to follow him, in any desperate peece of service. So he leades them forth by night, and seales vpon the campe of Afdrabal: where finding no guard, but the enemies fast a-sleepe, or very drowzie, He enters without refiftance, fires their Cabbins, and giues a terrible alarme; fo that all afrighted, the Carthaginians runne head-long one vpon another, they know 10 not which way. All paffages out of their campe Martins hath prepoffeffed, fo that there is no way to escape, saue by leaping downe the Rampart: which as many doe, as can thinke vpon it, and runne away toward the campe of Afdrubal the sonne of Amilear, that lay fixe miles off. But Martius bath way-laid them. In a Valley be-rweene their two campes he hath bestowed a Roman cohort, and I know not what number of Horse; so that into this Ambush they fall every one, and are cut in pecces. But left perchance any should have escaped, and give the alarme before his comming ; Martin hastens to be there as soone as they. By which diligent speede, He comes early in the morning vpon this further campe : which with no great difficultie he enters; and partly by force, partly by apprehension of danger which the Enemies conceived, when they beheld the Roman shields, foule, and bloudied with their former execution, He drives head-long into flight, all that can fave themselves from the furie of the fword. Thirtie feuen thousand of the enemies perish in this nights worke; befides a thousand eight hundred and thirtie, that are taken prisoners. Hercunto Valerius Antias addes, that the campe of Maga was also taken, and scuen thousand flaine : and that in another battaile with Aldrubal, there were flaine ten thousand more; besides soure thousand three hundred and thirtie, taken prisoners. Such is the power of some Historians. Linie therefore hath elsewhere well obserned. That there is none fo intemperate, as Valerius Antius, in multiplying the numbers that have fallen in battailes. That, whilest Martius was making an Oration to his fouldiers, a flame of fire shone about his head, Liuie reporteth as a common tale. not giving thereto any credit : and temperately concludeth, That this Captaine Martius got a great name; which he might well doe, if with fo small forces, and in 20 fuch diftresse, He could clearely get off from the Enemies, and give them any parting blow, though it were farre leffe than that which is here fet downe.

Of these occurrents L. Martius sent word to Rome, not forgetting his owine good feruice, what source it was, but setting it out in such wise, as the Senate might judge him worthie to hold the place of their Vicegerent in Spine: which the better to intimate vinto them. Hestilied himselfe Propretor. The Fathers were no lesse mode with the ridings, than the case required: and therefore tooke such careful order, for supplying their sorces in Spaine, that although Hamibal came to the gates of Rome, crethe Companies, leuied to serve in that Province, could be sent away; yet would they not stay a tide for desence of the Cicie it selse, but shipped them in all haste for 30 Spaine. As for that title of Propretor, which Martius had assumed, they thought it toogreat for him, and were oftended at his presumption in surpring it: foreseing well, that it was a matter of ill confiquence, to have the souldiers abroad make choice, among themselves, of those that should command Armies and Provinces. Therefore C. Claudius Nero was dispatched away, with all conucnient haste, into Spaine: carrying with himsboat six ethouland of the Roman foot, and as many of the Latines, with three hundred. Roman Horfe, and of the Latines right hundred.

It happened well, that about thefe times, the affaires of Rome beganne to prosper in Italie, and affoorded meanes of fending abroad such a strong supply: otherwise, the victories of Martius would ill haue served, either to keepe stooting in Spaine, or to 40 stoop the Carthaginian Armies from marching towards the Aspes. For when Claudius, landing with his new forces, tooke charge of that remainder of the Armie, which was vnder Martius and Fonteius, the sound supertokens of the overthrower received, than of those miraculous victories, whereof Martius had made his vaunts vnto the Senate. The Roman partie was forsaken by most of the Spanish friends: whom how to reclaime, it could not easily bee devised. o doe not finde: and as little reation can I finder in that Which followed: For its law;

That Affachd, feeing hinfelfe thus lock vp, made offer to depart forth-with out of all Spaine, and quit the Province to the Romans, upon condition, that he and his Armie might be thence difmiffed; That he front many daies, in entertayning parlee with Claudius about this buffineffe, That night by night hec conneied his foot-men

(a few at a time) through very difficult passages, out of the danger; and that finally taking advantage of a mistieday. Hee stole away with all his Horse and Elephants. leaving his campe emptie. If we confider, that there were at the same time, besides this Aldrubal, two other Carthaginian Generalls in Spaine; wee shall finde no leffe cause to wonder at the simplicitie of Claudius, who hoped to conclude a bargaine for fo great a Countrie, with one of these three Chiestaines, than at the strange nature of those passages : through which the foot-men could hardly creepe out by night; the Horse and Elephants easily following them in a darke mittee day. Wherefore in giving beliefe to fuch a tale, it is needfull that we suppose, both the danger wherin the Carthaginians were, and the conditions offered for their fafe departure, to have beene of farre leffe value. How foeuer it was; neither this, nor ought elfe that the Romans could doe, ferued to purchase any new friends in Spaine, or to recouer the old which they had loft. Like enough it is, that the old Souldiers, which had chofen Martius their Propretor, tooke it not well, that the Senate, regardleffe of their good deferts, had repealed their Election, and fent a Propretor whom they fancied not fo well. Some fuch occasion may have moved them to defire a Proconful, and (perhaps) yong Scipie by name : as if a title of greater dignitie, were needfull to worke regard in the Barbarians; and the beloued memorie of Cn. and Publius, likely to doe good, were it reviued in one of the same Familie. Whether vpon these, or vpon other reasons; C. Claudius was recalled out of the Province; and Pablics the son of P. Scipio fent Proconful into Spaine.

This is that P. Scipio, who afterward transferred the warre into Africk : where he happily ended it, to the great honour and benefit of his Countrie. He was a man of goodly prefence, and fingularly well conditioned; especially he excelled in Temperance, Continencie, Bountie; and other Vertues that purchase love; of which qualities what great vie he made, shall appeare in the tenour of his Actions following. As for those things that are reported of him, savouring a little too much of the great Alexanders vanitie; How he vied to walke alone in the Capitoll, as one that had some fecret conference with Impiter; How a Dragon (which must have beene one of the Gods; and, in likelihood, Iupiter himselse) was thought to have conversed with his 20 Mother, entring her chamber often, and vanishing away at the comming in of any man; and how of these matters he nourished the rumour, by doubtfullansweres; I hold them no better than meere fables, deuised by Historians, who sought thereby to adde vnto the glorie of Rome: that this noble Citie might feeme, not only to have furpaffed other Nations in vertue of the generalitie, but also in great worth of one fingle man. To this end nothing is left out, that might ferue to adorne this Roman Champion. For it is confidently written, as a matter of vinquestionable truth, That when a Proconful was to be chosen for Spaine, there durst not any Captaine of the principall Citizens offer himselfe as Petitioner, for that honourable, but dangerous charge; That the People of Rome were much aftonished thereat; That 40 when the day of Election came, all the Princes of the Citie flood looking one another in the face, not one of them having the heart, to adventure himselfe in such a desperate service; and finally, that this P. Cornelius Scipio, being then about source and twentie yeares of age, getting vp on an high place where hee might be feene of all the Multitude, requested, and obtained, that the Office might be conferred vp. on him. If this were true, then were all the victories of L. Martins no better than dreames; and either very vnreasonable was the feare of all the Roman Captaines. who durst not follow Clandius N ero, that not long before was gone into Spaine Propretor; or very bad intelligence they had out of the Province, which Afdrubal the Carthaginian, as we heard even now, was readie to abandon. But vpon these incoherences, which I finde in the too partiall Roman Historians, I doe not willing-

P. Scipio was sent Proconful into Spaine; and with him was joyned M. Iunius Syllanus, as Propretor, and his Coadjutor. They carried with them tenthous and soot, and a thousand horse, in thirtie Quinquereme Gallies. With these they landed at Emperie; and marched from thence to Tarracon alongst the Sea-coast. At the fame of Scipio's arrivall, it is faid, that Embaffages came to him apace from all quarters of the Prouince: which he entertained with such a majestie, as bred a wonderfull opinion of him. As for the Enemies, they were greatly afraid of him: and fo much the greater was their feare, by how much the lesse they could give any reason of it. It wee must beleeue this, then must wee needes beleeue, that their teare was euen as great as could be: for very little cause there was, to be terrified with the same of so yong a man, which had as yet performed nothing. All the winter following (or, as some thinke, all the next yeare) hee did nothing: but spent the time perhaps, as his foregoers had done, in treating with the Spaniards. His first enterprise was against new Carthage: vpon which he came vnexpected, with fine and twentie thousand foot, and two thousand fine hundred horse; his Sea-forces coasting him, and moderating their course in such wise, that they arrived there together with him. Hee affailed the Towne by Land and Sea; and wanne it by affault the first day. The Carthaginians loft it, by their too much confidence vpon the ftrength of it : which caused them to manit more slenderly, than was requisite. Yet it might have beene well enough defended, if some Fisher-men of Tarracon had not discouered vnto Scipio, a secret pasfage vnto the walls; whereof the Townsmen themselues were either ignorant, or 20 thought (at least) that their enemies could have no notice. This Citie of new Carthage, resembled the old and great Carthage in situation; standing upon a demi-lland, betweene an Hauen and a great Lake. All the Westerne side of the walls, and somewhat of the North, was fenced with this Lake: which the Fisher men of Tarracon had founded; and finding in some part thereof a shelfe, whereon at low water men might passe knee-deepe, or (at most) wading up to the Nauill, Scipio thrust thereinto fome Companies of his men; who recouered the top of the wals without refistance: the place being left without guard, as able to defend it selfe by the naturall strength. These falling suddenly vpon the backs of the Carthaginians within the Citie; easily forced agate, and gaue free entrance to the Roman Armie. What bootie was found 30 within the Towne, Liuie himselse cannot certainely affirme; but is saine to say, That some Roman Historians told lies without measure, in way of amplification. By that small proportion of riches, which was afterward carried by Scipio into the Roman Treasurie, we may easily perceive, how great a vanitie it was to say, That all the wealth of Africk and Spaine, was heaped up in that one Towne. But therein were bestowed all the Spanish Hostages: (or at least of the adjoyning Provinces) whom Scipio entreated with fingular courtesie; restoring them vnto their kindred and friends, in such gracious manner, as doubled the thankes due to so great a benefit. Hereupon a Prince of the Celtiberians, and two pettie Kings of the Ilergeles and Lacetani, nearest Neighbours to Tarracon, and dwelling on the North side of Iberus; 40 for sooke the Carthaginian partie; and joyned with the Romans. The speech of Indibilis, King of the Hergetes, is much commended; for that he did not vant himselfe, as commonly fugitiues vie, of the pleasure which he did vnto the Romans, in revolting from their Enemies; but rather excused this his changing side, as being thereto compelled by injuries of the Carthaginians, and inuited by the honorable dealing of Scipio. This temperate estimation of his new professed friendship, was indeede no vnsure token, that it should be long-lasting. But if the llergetes had long ere this (as we have heard before) for saken the Carthaginian partie, and floutly held themselves as friends to Cn. Scipio; then could nothing have beene deuised more vaine, than this Oration of Indibilis their King; excusing, as new, his taking part with the same, 50 when he should have rather craved pardon for his breach of alliance, formerly contracted with the Father and the Vncle. Most likely therefore it is, that how soure the two elder scipies had gotten some few places among these their Neighbours, and held them by strength; yet were the Roman neuer Masters of the Countrie, till this worthie Commander, by recovering their Hostages from the Carthaginians, and by his great munificence in fending them home, wanne vnto himfelfe the affured lone and affiltance of these Princes. The Carthaginian Generalls, when they heard of this loffe, were very forrie; yet neuertheleffe they fet a good face on the matter; faying, That a yong man, having stolne a Towne by surprise, was too farretransported, and ouer-joyed, but that shortly they would meet with him, and put him in minde of his Father and Vincle; which would alter his moode, and bring him to a more convenient temper.

Now if I should here interpose mine owne conjecture; I should be bold to fav. That the Carthaginians were at this time bulie, in fetting forth towards Italie; and that Scipio, to direct them, vnder-tooke new Carthage, as his Father and Vncle, vn- to on the like occasion, sate downe before Ibera. And in this respect I would suppose, that it had not beene much amiffe, if the paffage ouer the Lake had beene undifcouered, and the Towne held out fome longer while. For how foeuer that particular Action was the more fortunate, in comming to fuch good iffue you the first day: yet in the generalitie of the businesse, betweene Rome and Carthage, it was more to be wished, that Aldrubal should bee staied from going into Italie, than that halfe of Spaine should be taken from him. Whereas therefore he had nothing left to doe, that should hinder his journie; Mago, and Afdrubal the sonne of Gifco, were thought sufficient to hold Scipio worke, in that lingring warre of taking and retaking Townes. whileft the maine of the Carthaginian forces, under Afdrabal the sonne of Amilear, 20 went to a greater enterprise: even to fight in triall of the Empire. But the Roman Hiflorians tell this after another fashion; and say, That Asdrubal was beaten into Italie: whither hee ranne for feare, as thinking himfelfe ill affured of the Spaniards, as long as they might but heare the name of Scipio. Scipio, fay they, comming your Afdrubal; his Vantcourrers charged fo luftily the Carthaginian horse, that they draue them into their Trenches : and made it apparent, euen by that small peece of seruice, how full of spirit the Roman Armie was, and how dejected the Enemie. Aldrubal therefore by night retired out of that even ground, and occupied an Hill, compassed on three sides with a River, very steepe of ascent, and not case of accesse on the forefide; by which himfelfe got vp, and was to be followed by the Romans, On 20 the top of it there was a Plaine, whereon he strongly incamped himselfe; and in the mid-way, between the top and root of the Hill, was also another Plaine; into which he descended, more your brauerie, that he might not seeme to hide himselfe within his Trenches, than for that he durft aduenture his Armie to the hazard of a battaile. for which this was no equall ground. But fuch advantage of place could not faue him from the Romans. They climbed up the Hill to him; they recovered even footing with him; droue him out of this lower Plaine, vp into his Campe on the Hilltop: whither although the afcent were very difficult, and his Elephants beflowed in the smoothest places to hinder their approch; yet compassing about, and seeking passage where it was hardest to be found; but much more strongly breaking their 40 way, where the Carthaginians had got up before them, they draue both Men and Elephants head-long, I know not whither : for it is faid, that there was no way to flie. Out of fuch a battaile, wherein he loft eight thousand men, As drubal is said to have cscaped; and gathering together his dispersed troups, to have marched towards the Pyrenees, having sent away his Elephants ere the fight beganne. Neuerthelesse Me. gs, and Afdrubal the fonne of Gifco, are reported after this, to have consulted with him about this warre; and finally to have concluded, that goe he needes must were it but to carrie all the Spaniards as farre as might be, from the name of Scipio, How likely this was to have been true, it shall appeare at his comming into Italia; whence these incoherent relations of the Spanish affaires, have too long detained vs.

The great troubles that HANNIBAL raifed in all quarters, to the Citie of Rome. POSTHVMIVS the Roman Generall, with his whole Armie, is flaine by the Gaules, PHILIP King of Macedon, enters into a League with HANNIBAL, against the Romans. The Romans, joyning with the . Etolians, make warre voon PHILIP in Greece: and afterwards conclude a peace with him; the better to intend their businesse against the Carthaginians.

E left Hannibal wintering at Capua: where hee and his new Confederates rejoyced (as may bee thought) not a little, to heare the good newes from Carthage of fuch mightie aide, as was decreed to bee fent thence vnto him. In former times hee had found worke enough, to carrie the Romans corne into his owne barnes, and to drive away their Cattaile to Geryon : his victories affoording him little other profit, than fustenance for his Armie; by making him Master of the open field. Hee might perhaps have forc'd some walled Townes, in like fort as he did Geryon, and the Castle of Canna: but had he spent much time, about the getting of any one place well defended: the 20 hunger, that his Armie must have endured the Winter and Spring following, vntill corne were ripe, would have grieuoully punished him for such imploiment of the Sommer. This may have been ethe reason, why hee forbore to adventure vpon Rome after his victorie at Canna. For had he failed (as it was a matter of no certainetie) to carrie the Citie at his first comming; want of victuailes would have compelled him to quit the enterprise. Yea many of the people that opened so hastily their gates vnto him, vpon the fresh bruit of his glorious successe, would have taken time of deliberation, and waited perhaps the euent of another battaile; if being, either for want of meanes to force the Citie, or of necessaries to continue a siege before it, repelled (as might feeme) from the walls of Rome, hee had prefented himfelfe unto 30 them with a leffened reputation, somewhat later in the yeare; when time to force their obedience was wanting, vnlesse they would freely yeeld it. But this great part of the care and trauaile was past, when so many States of Italie were become his; the yeare following, the Samnies, and other old enemies of Rome, were like to receive a notable pleasure of their new alliance with Carthage, by helping to lay siege vnto that proud Citie, which so long had held them in subjection. Thus the Winter was passed ouer joyfully, saving that there came not any tidings of the preparations, to fecond the welcome report of those mightic forces, that were decreed and expected. The Spring drew on: and of the promifed supply there arrived no more, than only the Elephants. How late it was ere these came, I finde not : only we finde, that af-40 ter this he had aboue thirtie of them; whereas all, faue one, that hee brought ouer the Alpes, had beene loft in his journie through the marifhes of Hetruria. Very bad excuse of this exceeding negligence, they that brought the Elephants could make vnto Hannibal. If they were his friends, they told him truly, what mischieses the perswasion of Hanno wrought among the too niggardly Carthaginians. Otherwise, they might perhaps informe him, that it was thought a fafer, though a farther way about, to paffe along through Spaine and Gaule, as hee himselfe had done; and increase the Armie, by hyring the Barbarians in the journie; than to commit the maine ftrength of their Citie, to the hazard of the Seas: especially wanting a commodious Hauen to receive the fleet that should carrie such a number of Men, Horses, and 50 Elephants, with all needfull provisions. With these allegations Hannibal must rest content; and seeke, as well as he can, to satisfie his Italian Confederates. Therefore when time of the yeare ferued, He tookethe field: and having finished what rested to be done at Casilinum, sought to make himselfe Master of some good Hauen-towne thereabout; that might serue to entertaine the Carthaginian fleet, or take from his SIIII

Enemies at home all excuse, which they might pretend by want thereof. To the fame purpose, and to doe what else was needfull. He sent Himsto vinto the Locaians, and Hanno to the Lucauss: not forgetting at once to assay all quarters of Italie, yeathe lise of Siela and Sardinie, tince the steep of Rome must needes bee deferred vinto another yeare. Hanno made an ill journie of it, being met, or oue-taken, by T. Sempronius Longus: who slue about two thousand of his men; with the losse of sewer, than three houndred Romans, But Himsto sped faire better. By helpe of the Brutians, his good friends, hee wanne Petellas or Petilus by sorce; after it had held out some moneths. Hee wanne skewise Consentia, and Croton, that was for saken by the Inhabitants. Also the Citie of Locai, which was of great importance, yeelded vinto to him: as did all other places thereabout; except only the Towne of Khegium, ouer

The great faith of the Petilians is worthie to be recorded, as a notable testimonie of the good government, under which the Roman subjects lived. As for the Samnites, Campans, and others, whose earnestnesse in rebellion may seeme to proue the contrarie; we are to confider, That they had lately contended with Rome for Soueraignetic, and were now transported with ambition: which Reason can hardly moderate, or Benefits allay. The Petilians, in the very beginning of their danger, did fend to Rome for helpe : where their Messengers received answere from the Senate. That the publike misfortunes had not left meanes, to relieue their Affociates 20 that were fo farre diffant. The Petilian Meffengers (Embailadours they are termed; as were all others, publikely fent from Cities of the Roman Subjection, that had a priuate jurisdiction within themselues) fell downe to the ground, and humbly befought the Fathers, not to give them away: promiting to doe and fuffer what focuer was possible, in desence of their Towne against the Cartheginians. Hereupon the Senare fell to confultation againe: and having throughly confidered all their forces remaining, plainely confessed, that it was not in their power to give any reliefe. Wherefore these Embassadours were willed to returne home, and to bid their Citizens prouide h reafter for their owne fafetie; as having alreadie discharged their faith to the vimoft. All this notwithstanding, the Petilians (as was said) held out 30 fome moneths; and having striven in vaine to defend themselves, when there was no apparant poffibilitie, gaue to the Carthaginians a bloudie victorie ouer them; being vanquished as much by famine, as by any violence of the Affailants.

The Romans at this time were indeede in fuch ill case, that Hannibal, with a little helpe from Carthage, might have reduced them into termes of great extremitie. For whereas, in a great braueric, before their loffe at Canne; they had shewed their high mindes, by entertaining the care of things farre off, notwithstanding the great warrethat lay upon them so neare at hand : it now fell out miserably all at once, that their fortune abroad was no whit better than at home. L. Polibumius Albinus their Pretor they had fent, with an Armie of fine and twentic thousand, into Gaule; 40 to the Illyrian King Pineus they had fent for their Tribute due, whereof the pay-day was past, willing him, if he defired forbearance, to deliuer hostages for his performance of what was due; and to Philip King of Macedon they had fent, to require, that he should deliver up vnto them Demetrius Pharius, their Subject and Rebell, whom he had received. But now from all quarters they heare tidings, little futeable to their former glorious conceits. Posthumius with all his Armie was cut in peaces by the Gaules, in fuch fort that scarce ten men escaped. The manner of his ouerthrow was very firange. There was a great Wood, called by the Gaules, Litana; through which he was to passe. Against his comming, the Enemies had sawed the Trees fo farre, that a little force would ferue to cast them downe. When therefore Post humius, with his whole Armie, was entred into this dangerous passage, the Gaules, that lay about the Wood, beganne to cast downethe Trees: which falling one against another, bore all downe so fast, that the Romans were ouer-whelmed, Men and Horses; in such wife, that no more escaped, than is said before.

How this tedious worke, of fawing fo many Trees, could take defired effect, and neither be perceived, nor made frustrate, either by some winde, that might have blowne all downe before the Romans entred, or by some other of those many accidents, whereto the deuice was subject; I doe not well conceiue. Yet some such thing may have beene done; and what failed in the stratageme, supplied with the Enemies sword. It is not perhaps worthie to be omitted, as a monument of the sanage condition, wherewith Lombardie, a Countrie now so civill, was infected in elder times. That of Pollhumius his skull, being cleanfed, and trimmed vp with gold, a drinking cup was made, and confecrated in their principall Temple, as an holy 10 vessell, for the vse of the Priest in their solemnities. Of this great ouerthrow when word was brought to Rome; the amazement was no leffe than the calamitie. But forrow could give no remedie to the mischiefe; and anger was vaine, where there wanted forces to reuenge. Tribute from the Illyrians there came none: neither doe I finde, that any was a second time demanded; this we finde, That with Pleuratus, and Scerdietus Illyrian Kings, as also with Gentius, who raigned within a few yeares following, the Romans dealt vpon even termes; entreating their affiltance against Philip and Perfeus; not commanding their dutie, as Vasfalls. The Macedonian troubled them yet a little further. For having affured his affaires in Greece, and enjoying leisure to looke into the doings abroad, Hee sent Embassadours to Hannibal: with 20 whom he made a league, vpon these conditions; That the King in person should come into Italie, and with all his forces, by Land and Sca, affift the Carthaginians in the Roman warre, untill it were finished; That Rome, and all Italie, together with all the spoile therein to be gotten, should be eleft entire vnto the State of Carthage; And that afterwards Hannibal with his Armie should passe into Greece, and there asfist Philip, vntill he had subdued all his Enemies: (which were the Atolians, Thracians, King Antiochus, and others) leaving semblably vnto him the full possession of that Countrie, and the Iles adjoyning. But fuch predisposition of Kingdomes and Provinces, is lightly comptrolled by the divine Providence, which therein shewes It selfs not (as therodotus fally termesit, and like an Atheif) enuous or malicious, 30 but very just and majesticall; in vp-holding that vnspeakable greatnesse of Soucraignetic, by which It rules the whole World, and all that therein is.

The first Embassadours that Philip sent, fell into the Romans hands, in their journic towards Hinnibal: and being examined what they were, adventured upon a bold lie, faying, That they were fent from the King of Macedon to Rome, there to make a League with the Senate and People, and offer his helpe in this time of great necessistie. These newes were so wellcome, that the joy thereof tooke away all care of making better inquirie. So they were louingly feafted; and friendly difmiffed, with guides that should leade them the way, and shew them how to avoide the Carthagia mians. But they being thus instructed concerning their journie, fell wiifully into the 40 Campe of Hannibal: who entertained them after a better fashion; and concluded the businesse, about which they came, vpon the points before remembred. In their returne homeward, they happened againe valuekily to bee descried by the Roman fleet; which, mistrusting them to bee of the Carthaginian partie, gaue them chace. They did their best to have escaped: but being ouer-taken, they suffered the Romans to come aboord; and trusting to the lie that once had served them, said it againe, That hauing beene sent from King Philip, to make a League with the People of Rome, they were not able, by reason of the Carthaginians lying betweene, to get any farther than to M. Valerius the Pretor, vnto whom they had fignified the good affection of the King their Master. The tale was now lesse credible than before: 50 and (which marred all) Gifco, Boftar, and Mago, with their followers, Carthaginians that were fent with them from Hannibal to ratific the agreement, being presently detected, made the matter apparant. Wherefore a little inquisition served to finde all out : fo that at length Hannibals owne letters to King Philip were delivered ve and the whole bulinesse confessed. The Embassadours and their followers were sent SIIII 3 close prisoners to Rome: where the chiefe of them were cast into prison; and the rest fold for bond-flaues. Yet one of their ships that escaped, carried word into Macedon of all that had happened. Whereupon a new Embassage was sent, that went and returned with better speede; concluding, as was agreed before; only with some losse of time.

The Romans were exceedingly perplexed: thinking with what heavie weight this Masedonian warre, in an euill houre, was likely to fall vpon them; when their shoulders were ouer burdened with the load of the Carthaginian. Yet they tooke a noble resolution; and sutcable vnto that, whereby they kept off the storme, that else would have beaten vpon them from Spaine. They judged it more easie, with small 10 forces to detaine Philip in Greece, than with all their strength to resist him in Italie. And herein they were in the right. For that the very reputation of a King of Macedon, joyning with Hannibal in fuch a time, would have sufficed to shake the allegeance not only of the Latines, and other their most faithfull Subjects, but even of the Roman Colonies that held all priviledges of the Citie, it will appeare by the following fuccesse of things. M. Valerius the Pretor, with twentic Quinquereme Gallics, was appointed to attend upon the Macedonian : and to fet on foot fome commotion in Greece; or to nourish the troubles alreadic therein begunne. Philip was busie about the Sea-townes, that looked towards Italie, fetting vpon Apollonia; and thence falling voon Oricum; Which he wanne, and foreturned to Apollonia againe. The E- 20 pirets craued helpe of M.Valerius: or rather accepted his kinde offers; who had none other businesse to doe. The Garrison that Philip had left in Oricem, was strong enough to hold the Townsmen in good order; but not to keepe out the Romans: of whose daring to attempt any thing against him, on that side the Sea, Philip as then had no suspition. Valerius therefore easily regained the Towne; and sent thence a thousand men, vnder Namu Crispus an vnder-taking and expert Captaine; which got by night into Apollonia. These made a notable fallic; and brake into Philips Trenches with fo great flaughter, that they forced him to for fake his camp, and raife the fiege. The King purposed (as it is said) to have departed thence by Sea: but Falerius, comming with his feet from Orisum, flopped up the mouth of the Rivers 30 fo that hee was faine to burne his ships, (which belike were no better than long botes) and depart ill furnished of carriages, by Land. After this, Valerius dealt with the Etolians, a Nation alwaies enemie to the Crowne of Macedon: and casily perfwaded them (being so affected, as hath escwhere beene shewed) to make strong warre on Philip; wherein he promifed them great affiliance from the Romans. That which most moued the troublesome spirits of the Atolians, was the hope of getting Acarnania: after which they had gaped long; and whereof the Roman was as liberall in making promise, asif alreadie it had beene his owne. So a league was made betweene them: and afterward folemnely published at Olympia, by the Ætolsans; and by the Romans, in their Capitoll. The conditions were, That from Atolia to Coreyra, 40 in which space Acarnania was contained, all the Countrie should bee subdued, and left vnto the Etolians; the pillage only to be given to the Romans. And that if the Ætolians made peace with Philip, it should be with Provision, to hold no longer, than whilest he abstained from doing injurie to the Romans, or their Associates. This was indeede the only point, whereat Valerius aimed: who promifed as much on the Romans behalfe, That they should not make peace with the Macedonian, volesseit were with like condition of including the Ltolians. Into this League was place referred for the Lacedamonians and Eleans, as to those that had made or fauoured the fide of Cleomenes against the Macedonian, to enter at their pleasure. The like regard was had of Attalue, Pleuratus, and Scerdiletus: the first of which raigned at Pergamus, in 50 Asia the lesse, a Prince hereaster much to bee spoken of; the other two held some part of Illyria, about which the Romans were fo farre from contending with them, that gladly they fought to get their friendly acquaintance. But the names of these Affociates, are thrust into the Treatie; rather to give it countenance, than for any readinesse which they disclose to enter thereinto. The Atolians alone, and chiefly Scopus their Pretor, with Dorymachus and others, are yet awhile the only men. of whom the Roman Generalls must make much; as the late French King, Henrie the fourth, when he had only the title of Wanarre, was faid to court the Majors of Rochel. Philip was notidle, when he heard whereunto the Ltolians tended. He repaired his Armie; made a countenance of warre vpon the Illyrians, and other his borderers. that were wont in times of danger to infelt the Kingdome of Macedon; wasted the Countrie about Oricum and Apollonia; and ouer-running the Pelagonians, Dardanians, and others, whom he held suspected, came downe into Thessalie, whence hee made to thew as if he would inuade Etolia. By the fame of this Expedition, He thought to ftirre vp all the Greekes adjoyning, against the Etolians; whom they generally detetted as a neft of Robbers, troublesome to all the Countrie. To which purpose, and to hinder the Atolians from breaking into Greece, He left Perfess his sonne and heire, with foure thousand men, vpon their borders: with the rest of his Armie, before greater businesse should ouer-take and entangle him, He made a long journie into Thrace, against a people called the Medes; that were wont to fall vpon Macedon, when focuer the King was absent. The Etolians, hearing of his departure, armed as many as they could against the Acarnanians ; in hope to subdue those their daily enemies, and winne their little Countrie, ere hee should bee able to returne. Hereto it on much availed, that the Romans had alreadic taken Oeniada and Naxos, Acarnanian Townes, conveniently fituated to let in an Armie; and configned them vnto the Atolians, according to the tenor of the contract lately made with them. But the flout resolution of the Acarnanians, to die (as we say) every Mothers sonne of them, in defence of their Countrie; together with the great hafte of the Macedonian (who laied aside all other businesse) to succour these his friends; caused the Atolians to for sake their enterprise. When this Expedition was given over, the Romans and Atolians fell upon Anticyra, which they tooke : the Romans affailing it by Sca : the Ætolians by Land. The Ætolians had the Towne; and the Romans the spoile. For these good services M. Valerius was chosen Consul at Rome; and P. Sulpicius 20 fent in his freed, to keepe the warre on foot in Greece. But besides the Roman helpe. Attalus out of Alacame ouer to affift the Etolians. Hee was chiefly moued, by his owne jealousie of Philips greatnesse: though somewhat also tickled with the vanitie, of being chosen by the Etolians their principall Magistrate; which honour, though no better than titularic, he tooke in very louing part. Against the forces which Attalus and the Romans had sent, being joyned with the maine power of Atolia. Philip tried the fortune of two battailes : and was victorious in each of them. Hereupon, these his troublesome Neighbours desired peace of him; and vsed their best meanes to get it. But when the day, appointed for the conclusion thereof, was come: their Embassadours, in stead of making submission, proposed vnto him such intollerable 40 conditions, as ill beseemed vanquished men to offer; and might therefore well testific, that their mindes were altered. It was not any love of peace, but seare of being besieged in their owne Townes, that had made them desirous of composition. This feare being taken away, by the encouragements of Attalus and the Romans, they were as fierce as euer: and thrust a Garrison of their owne, and some Roman friends, into Elis; which threatned Achaia, wherein Philip then lay. The Romans, making a cut ouer the streight from Naupactus, wasted the Countrie in a terrible braucrie: wherein Philip requited them; comming upon them in haste from the Nemean Games (which he was then celebrating) and fending them faster away, but nothing richer, than they came. In the heat of this contention, Prusias King of Bithynia, fearing the growth of Attalus, no lesse than Attalus held suspected the power of Philip; sent a Nauie into Greece, to affift the Macedonian partic. The like did the Carthaginians : and vpon greater reason; as being more interested in the successe of his affaires. Philip was too weake by Sea: and though he could man fome two hundred ships; yet the Vessells

The Lacedemonians, hearing certaine report of Cleomenes his death in Agypt, went about to choose two new Kings; and to conforme themselves to their old manner of Government. But their estate was so farre out of tune, that their hope of redressing things within the Citie, proued no lesse vnfortunate, than had beene to their attempts of recouring a large Dominion abroad. Lyeurgus a Tyrantrose vp. among them : vnto whom succeeded this Machanidas; and shortly after came Nabis, that was worse than both of them. They held on the Atolian and Roman side, for feare of the Achains; that were the chiefe Confederates of Philip, and hated extremely the name both of Tyrant, and of Lacedamonian. But of these wee shall focake more hereafter.

CHAP. 2. S.II. of the Historie of the World.

Philip entring into Achaia, and feeing his presence had brought the contentment of affurance to that Countrie; spake braue wordes to the Assembly of their States. faving. That he had to doe with an Enemie, that was very nimble, and made warre by running away. He told how he had followed them to Chalcis, to Oreum, to Opus, and now into Achaia: but could no where finde them; fuch hafte they made, for feare of being ouer-taken. But flight, He faid, was not alwaies prosperous: He should one day light upon them; as ere this hee fundric times had done, and still to their loffe. The Achaians were glad to heare these wordes; and much the more glad, in regard of his good deedes accompanying them. For he reftored vnto their Nation fome Townes, that were in his hand, belonging to them of old. Likewife to the Megalopolitans their Confederates, He rendred Aliphera. The Dymeans, that had beene taken by the Romans, and fold for flaues, He fought out, ranfomed, and put in quiet possession of their owne Citie. Further, passing over the Corinthian Guife, Hec fell vpon the Liolians: whom he draue into the mountaines and woods, or other their ftrongest holds; and wasted their Countrie. This done, Hee tooke leave of the Acheans and returning home by Sea, visited the people that were his subjects, or dependants; and animated them fo well, that they refted feareleffe of any threatning do danger. Then had heleifure to make warre vpon the Dardanians, ill Neighbours to Micedon: with whom nevertheleffe he was not fo farre occupied, but that he could goe in hand with preparing a fleet of an hundred Gallies, whereby to make himfelfe Mafter of the Sea; the Romans (fince the departure of Attalus) having not dared to meet or pursue him, when he lately ranne along the coast of Greece, fast by them

This good fucceffe added much reputation to the Macedonian; and emboldened him to make strong warre vpon the Etolians, at their owne doores. As for the Romans; either some displeasure, conceived against their Confederates; or some feare of danger at home, when Afdrubal was readie to fall vpon Italie; caused them to give ouer the care of things in Greece, and leave their friends there to their owne fortunes.

The Atolians therefore, being driven to great extremitie, were faine to fue for peace vnto Philip; and accept it, vpon what euer conditions it best pleased him. The agreement was no fooner made, than P. Sempronius with ten thousand foot, a thousand horse, and thirtie fine Gallies, came our ingreat haste (though somewhat too late) to trouble it. Hearing how things went in Etolia, hee turned aside to Dyrrachium, and Apollonia; making a great noise as if with these his owne forces he would worke wonders. But it was not long, ere Philip came to visit him; and found him tame gnough. The King presented him battaile; but he refused it; and suffering the Macedonians to waste the Countrie round about, before his eies, kept himselfe close with 40 in the walls of Apollonia; making some Ouertures of peace; which caused Philip to returne home quietly. The Romans had not so great cause to be displeased with the Ætolians, as had Philip, to take in cuill part the demeanour of the Carthaginians. For notwithstanding the Royall offer that he made them, to serve their turne in Italie. and affilt them in getting their hearts defire, before he would expect any requitall : they had not fent any fleet, as in reason they ought, and as (considering his want of fufficient abilitie by Sea) it is likely they were bound, either to fecure the transportation of his Armie, or to free his coast from the Roman and Ltolian Pyracies, Only once they came to his helpe, which was, at his last journicinto Achaia. But they were gone againe before his arrivall: having done nothing; and pretending feare of 50 being taken by the Romans, even at such time as Philip, with his owne Nauie, durst boldly paffe by Sea, and found none that durst oppose him. This rechleffe dealing of the Carthaginians, may therefore seeme to have been one of Hanno his tricks; whereof Hannibal fo bitterly complained. For it could not but grieue this malicious man exceedingly; to heare, that so great King made offer to serve in person vnder

Hannibal, and required the affiftance of the same Hannibal, as of a man likely to make Monarchs, and alter the affaires of the World at his pleasure. Therefore hee had reason, such as Enuie could suggest, to perswade the Carthagintans vnto a safe and thriftie course: which was, not to admit into the fellowship of their Italian warres so mightie a Prince; whom change of affection might make dangerous to their Empire; or his much affection vnto Hannibal, more dangerous to their libertie. Rather they should doe well to faue charges; and feede the Macedonian with hopes; by making many promifes of fending a fleet, and some other succours. This would cost nothing: yet would it serve to terrifie the Romans, and compell them to send part of their forces from home; that might finde this Enemie worke abroad. So should to the Roman Armies be leffened in Italie; and Philip, when once he was engaged in the warre, be viged vnto the profecution, by his owne necessitie: putting the Carthagimians to little or no charges; yea scarce to the labour of gining him thankes. Now if it might come to passe, as Hannibal cuery day did promise, that Rome, and all Italie, should within a while becat the deuotion of Carthage: better it were that the Citie should be free, so as the troublesome Greekes might addresse their complaints vnto the Carthaginians, as competent Judges betweene them and the Macedonian, than that Hannibal, with the power of Africk, should wait vpon Philip, as his Executioner, to fulfill his will and pleafure, in doing fuch injuries, as would both make the name of a Carthaginian hatefull in Greece, and oblige Philip to be no leffe impudent, in ful- 20 filling all requests of Hannibal. Whether the counsaile of Hanno and his fellowes. were fuch as this; or whether the Carthaginians, of their owne disposition without his aduice, were too sparing, and carelesse, the matter (as farre as concerned Philip) came to one reckoning. For they did him no manner of good : but rather dodged with him; even in that little courtese which they most pretended. And this perhaps was part of the reason, why hee begunne the building of an hundred Gallies, as if hee would let them and others know, whereto his proper strength would have reached, had he not vainely given credit to faithlesse promises. When therefore the Ætolians had submitted themselves alreadie : and when the Romans desired his friendthip, as might be thought, for very feare of him; with reputation enough, and 20 not as a forfaken Client of the Carthaginians, but a Prince able to have succoured them in their necessitie, He might give over the warre, and, without reprehension, leaue them to themselues. For hee had wilfully entred into trouble for their sakes: but they despised him, as if the quarrell were meerely his owne, and hee vnable to manage it. The vanitie of which their conceits would appeare vnto them : when they should see, that with his proper strength he had finished the warre, and concluded it highly to his honour. So the yeare following it was agreed, by mediation of the Epirots, Acarnanians, and others, That the Romans should retain three or source Townes of Illyria, which they had recourred in this warre, being part of their old Illyrian Conquest: Places no way belonging to the Macedonian; and therefore per- 40 haps inferted into the couenants, that fomewhat might feeme to have been gotten. On the other fide, the Atintanes were appointed to returne under the obedience of Philip: who, if they were (as Ortelius probably conjectures) the people of the Councepiced it, yon conditions somewhat to their sosse.

The Confederates and Dependants of the Macedonian, comprehended in this Peace, were Prussas King of Bithynia, the Abhans, Ravitans, Thessains, Acarmanian, and Epirots. On the Roman side were named, first, the People of Ilium, as an honorable remembrance of the Romans descent from Troy; then, Astalus King of Pergamus; Pleuratus, an Illyrian Prince; and Nabis, the Tyrant of Lacedonom; together with the Eleans, Messains, and Athenians. The Atolians were omitted, belike, as having agreed for themselves before. But the Eleans and Messains, solowers of the Atolians, (and by them, as is most likely, comprised in their League with Phila)

trie about Apollonia, then did the Romans abandon part of their gettings; whereby it appeares, that they did not give peace, as they would feeme to have done, but ac-were also inferted by the *Remans; that were neuer flow in offering their friendflip to fimall and feeble Nations. As for the *Athenians: they flood much wpon their old honour; and loued to beare a part, though they did nothing, in all great Actions. Yet the fetting downe of their name in this Treatie, served the *Remans* to good purpose: foratimuch as they were a busine people; and ministed occasion to renew the Warre, when meanes did better ferue to follow it.

ð. XIII.

How the Romans beganne to recover their strength by degrees. The noble affe-Etion of the Romans, in relicuing the publike necessities of their Common-weale...

T was a great fault in the Carthaginians, that embracing fo many Enterprises at once, they followed all by the halues: and wasted more men and monie to no purpose, than would have ferued (if good order had beene taken) to finish the whole warre, in farre shorter space, and make themselues Lords of all that the Roman held. This errour had beene the leffe harmefull, if their care of Italie had beene fuch as it ought. But they suffered Hannibal, to wearie himselfe with expectation of their promised supplies: which being still deferred from yeare to yeare, caused as great opportunities to be loft, as a Conquerour could have defired. The death of Posthumins, and defiruction of his whole Armie in Gaule; the begunne rebellion of the Sardinians; the death of Hiero their friend in Syracufe; with great alterations, much to their prejudice, in the whole He of Sicil; as also that Warre, of which we last spake, threatned from Macedon; happening all at one time; and that so nearely after their terrible ouerthrow at Canne, among fo many revolts of their Italian Confederates; would vtterly haue funke the Roman State, had the Carthaginians, if not the first yeare, yet 20 at least the second, sent ouer to Hannibal the forces that were decreed. It is not to be doubted, that even this diversitie of great hopes, appearing from all parts, administred matter vnto Hanno, or such as Hanno was, whereupon to worke. For though it were in the power of Carthage, to performe all that was decreed for Italie : yet could not that proportion hold, when fo many new occurrences brought each along with them their new care; and required their feuerall Armies. This had not been a very bad excuse, if any one of the many occasions offered had been throughly profequited though it flood with best reason, that the foundation of all other hopes and comforts, which was the prosperitie of Hannibal in his Italian warre, should have beene strengthred; whatsoever had become of the rest. But the slen-40 der troupes, wherewith the Carthaginians fed the warre in Spaine; the lingring aide which they fent, to vp-hold the Sardinian rebellion, when it was alreadie well-neare beaten downe; their triffling with Philip; and (amongst all these their attempts) their hastic catching at Sicil: little deserved to be thought good reasons of neglecting the maine point, whereto all the rest had reference. Rather every one of these Actions, confidered apart by it felfe, was no otherwife to be allowed as differently vnder-taken, or substantially followed, than by making supposition, That the care of Italie, made the Carthaginians more negligent in all things elfe. Yet if these allega-tions would not serve to content Hannibal; then must be patiently endure to know, that his owne Citizens were jealous of his Greatnesse, and durst not trust him with of fo much power, as should enable him to wrong the State at home.

What sourche heard or thought, Hannibal was glad to apply him selfe to Necessitie, to seede his Italian friends with hopes; and to trifle away the time about  $\mathcal{N}_{\mathcal{O}}$ —la, Naples, Cuma, and other places: being loth to spend his Armie in an hard slege, that was to be referred for a worke of more importance. Many offers hee made ypon Nola: but alwaies with bad fuccesse. Once Marcellus fought a battaile with him there : yet under the very walls of the Towne; having the affiltance of the Citizens, that were growne better affected to the Roman fide, fince the Heads, that inclined them to rebellion, were cut off. About a thouland men Hannibal in that fight loft: which was no great meruaile; his forces being then divided, and imploied in fundric parts of Italie at once. Naples was, euen in those daies, a strong Citie: and required a yeares worke to have taken it by force. Wherefore the earnest defire of Hannibal toget it, was alwaies frustrate. Vpon the Towne of Cuma they of Capua had their plot; and were in hope to take it by cunning. They fent to the chiefe Magistrates of the Cumans, desiring them (as being also Campans) to be present at a fo- 10 lemne facrifice of the Nation, where they would confult about their generall good: promifing to bring thither a sufficient guard, to assure the whole Assembly, from any danger that might come by the Romans. This motion the Cumans made shew to entertaine; but privily fent word of all to T. Sempronius Gracebus the Roman Gracehus was a very good man of warre; and happily chosen Conful in so dangerous a time. His Colleague should have beene Posthumius Albinus, that was lately flaine by the Gaules: after whose death Marcellus was chosen; as being judged the fittest man to encounter with Hannibal. But the Roman Augures either found some religious impediment, that nullified the election of Marcellus; or at least they fai- 20 ned fo to have done: because this was the first time, that ever two Plebeian Consuls were chosen together. Marcellus therefore gaue ouer the place: and Q. Fabius Maximus the late famous Dictator, was substituted in his roome. But Fabius was detained in the Citie, about matters of Religion, or Superstition : wherewith Rome was commonly, especially in times of danger, very much troubled. So Gracehus alone, with a Confular Armie, waited upon Hannibal among the Campans: not able to meet the Enemie in field; yet intentine to all occasions, that should be presented. The Volones, or Slaues, that lately had been earmed, were no small part of his followers. These, and the rest of his men. Hee continually trained : and had not a greater care, to make his Armie skilfull in the exercises of warre; than to keepe 20 it from quarrells, that might arise by vpbraiding one another with their base condition.

Whilest the Conful was thus busied at Linternum; the Senators of Cuma sent him word, of all that had passed between them and the Capuans. It was a good occasion to flesh his men, and make them confident against the Enemie; of whom hitherto they had bad experience. Gracehus therefore put himselfe into Cuma: whence he islued at fach time, as the Magistrates of that Citie were expected by the Campans. The Sacrifice was to be performed by night, at a place called Hama, three miles from Cume. There lay Marius Alfius the chiefe Magistrate of Capua, with fourteene thousand men; not wholly intent either to the Sacrifice, or to any dan- 40 ger that might interrupt it; but rather deuising how to surprise others, than fearing him (elfe to be affailed. The Conful therefore, fuffering none to goe forth of Cuma, that might beare word of him to the Enemies, iffued out of the Towne when it grew darke: his men being well refreshed with ment and sleepe, the day before, that they might hold out the better in this nights service. So he came you the Capuans vnawares: and flew more than two thousand of them, together with their Commander: loofing not about an hundred of his owne men. Their campe he tooke: but tarried not long to rifle it, for feare of Hannibal; who lay not farre off. By this his prouidence, He escaped agreater loffe, than he had brought vpon the Enemies. For when Hannibal was informed how things went at Hama; forthwith he marched so thither: hoping to finde those yong souldiers, and slaves, busied in making spoile, and loading themselves with the bootie. But they were all gotten safe within Cuma; which partly for anger, partly for defire of gaining it, and partly at the vigent entreatic of the Capuans, Hannibal affailed the next day. Much labour, and with ill successe, the Carthaginians and their fellowes spent, about this Towne. They raised a wooden Tower against it : which they brought close vnto the walls ; thinking thereby to force an Entrie. But the Defendants, on the infide of the wall, raifed against this an higher Tower: whence they made refistance; and found meanes at length, to confume with fire the worke of their Enemies. While the Carthaginians were buffe in quenching the fire; the Romans, fallying out of the Towne at two gates, charged them valiantly, and draue them to their Trenches, with the flaughter of about fourteene hundred. The Conful wifely founded the Retreat; ere his men were too farre engaged, and Hannibal in a readinesse to requite their service. Neither would He, in the pride of this good fuccesse, adventure forth against the Enemie; who presented him battaile the day following, neare vnto the walls. Hannibal therefore, seeing no likelihood to preuaile in that which he had taken in hand, brake up the fiege; and returned to his old Campe at Tifata. About these times, and shortly after, when Fabiss the other Conful had taken the field; fome fmall Townes were recovered by the Romans, and the people feuerely punished for their revolt.

The Carthaginian Armie was too small, to fill with Garrisons all places that had yeilded; and withall to abide (as it must doe) strong in the field. Wherefore Hannibal, attending the supplie from home, that should enable him to strike at Rome it felfe, was driven in the meanetime to alter his course of warre : and, in stead of ma-20 king (as formerly he had done) a generall invalion vpon the whole Country to paffe from place to place; and wait vpon occasions, that grew daily more commodious to the enemie, than to him. The Gountrey of the Hirpines and Samnites was grieuoufly walted by Marcellus, in the absence of Hannibal: as also was Campania, by Fabius the Conful; when Hannibal having followed Marcellus to Nola, and received there the loffe before mentioned, was gone to Winter in Julia. These people shewed not the like spirit in defending their lands, and fighting for the Carthaginian Empire. as in former times they had done; when they contended with the Romans, in their owne behalfe, to get the Sourreigntic. They held it reason, that they should be protected, by such as thought to have dominion over them: whereby at once they 30 ouerburdened their new Lords; and gaue vnto their old the more easie meanes, to take reuenge of their defection.

The people of Rome were very intentine, as necessitic constrained them, to the worke that they had in hand. They continued Fabius in his Confulfhip: and joyned with him M. Claudius Marcellus; whom they had appointed vnto that honour the yeare before. Of these two, Fabius was called the Sheild; and Marcellus, the Roman Sword. In Fabius it was highly, and vpon inftreason, commended. That being himselfe Consul, and holding the Election, he did not stand upon nice points of formalitie, or regard what men might thinke of his ambition, but caused himselfe to be chosen with Marcellus; knowing in what need the Citie stood of able Comman-40 ders. The great name of these Consuls, and the great preparations which the Ros mans made; ferued to put the Campans in feare, that Capua it felfe should be belieged. To prevent this, Hannibal at their earnest entreatie came from Arvi; (where he lay, hearkening after newes from Tarentum) and, having with his presence comforted these his friends, fellon the sudden vpon Puteoli, a Sea towne of Campania; about which he spent three dayes in vaine, hoping to have wonne it. The Garrison in Puteoli was fixe thou fand firong: and did their duetic fo well, that the Carthaginian, finding no hope of good fuccesse, could onely shew his anger voon the fields there, and about Naples; which having done, and once more (with as ill fucceffe as before) affaied Nola, he bent his course to Tarentum: wherin he had veriegreat intelligence. 50 Whilest he was in his progresse thither; Hanno made a journic against Beneuentum: and T. Graechus the last yeares Conful, hasting from Nuceria, met him there; and

which were Italians, all the rest, Numidians and Moores. He held the Roman worke foure houres; ere it could be perceived, to which fide the victorie would incline. But Gracehus his fouldiers, which were all (in a manner) the late-armed flaues, had received from their Generall a peremptorie denunciation; That this day, or neuer. they must purchase their libertic, bringing enery man, for price thereof, an Enemies head. The sweet reward of libertie was so greatly desired, that none of them feared any danger in earning it : howbeit that vaine labour, imposed by their Generall, of cutting off the flaine Enemies heads, troubled them exceedingly; and hindered the feruice, by imployment of so many hands, in a worke so little concerning the victorie. Gracehus therefore finding his owne errour, wifely corrected it: proclayming a- 10 loude, That they should cast away the heads, and spare the trouble of cutting of any more; for that all should have libertic immediatly after the batiaile, if they wanne the day. This encouragement made them run headlong vpon the Enemie; whom their desperate surie had soone ouerthrowne, if the Roman Horse could have made their part good against the Numidian. But though Hanno did what hee could, and pressed so hard you the Roman battaile, that foure thousand of the slaues, (for feare either of him, or of the punishment which Gracehus had threatned before the battaile, vnto those that should not valiantly behave themselves) retired vnto a ground of strength; yet was he glad at length to saue himselfe by slight, when the Grosse of his Armie was broken; being vnable to remedie the losse. Leauing the field, hee 20 was accompanied by no more than two thousand : most of which were Horse; all the rest were either slaine or taken. The Roman Generall gaue vnto all his fouldiers that reward of libertie, which hee had promifed : but vnto those foure thousand. which had recoiled vnto the Hill, he added this light punishment; That as long as they serued in the warres, they should neither eate nor drinke other wise than standing, valeffe fickeneffe forced them to breake his Order. So the victorious Armie returned to Beneuentum: where the newly enfranchifed fouldiers were feafted in publike by the townsmen; some sitting, some standing, & all of them having their heads couered (as was the custome of slaues manumised) with Caps, or white wooll. The picture of this Feast (as a thing worthie of remembrance) was afterward hung vp in 20 a Table by Gracehus, in the Temple of Libertie; which his father had built and dedicated. This was indeede the first Battaile, worthie of great note, which the Carthaginians had lost fince the comming of Hannibal into Italic: the victories of Marcellus at Nola, and of this Gracehus before at Hama, being things of small im-

Thus the Romans through industrie, by little and little, repaired that great Breach in their Estate, which Hannibal had made at Canna, But all this while, and long after this, their Treasurie was so poore, that no industrie nor art could serue to helpe it. The fruits of their grounds did onely (and perhaps hardly) serue, to feede their Townes and Armies; without any furplufage, that might be exchanged for other 40 needfull commodities. Few they were in Italie, that continued to pay them tribute: which also they could worse doe than before; as living vpon the same Trade, and fubiect to the same inconveniences, which enseebled Rome it selfe. Sicil and Sardinia, that were wont to yeild great profit, hardly now maintained the Roman Armies, that lay in those Prouinces, to hold them safe and in good order. As for the Citizens of Rome, every one of them fuffered his part of the detriment, which the Commonwealth fultained and could now doe least for his Countrie, when most need was : as also the number of them was much decreased; so as if money should be raised vpon them by the poll, yet must it be farre lesse, than in former times. The Senate therefore, diligently confidering the greatnes of the war within the bowels of Italie, that so could not be thence expelled without the exceeding charge of many good Armies; the perill, wherein sicil and Sardinia stood, both of the Carthaginians, and of many among the Naturals declining from the friendship or subjection of Rome; the threats of the Macedonian, readie to land in the Easterne parts of Italie, if they were not at the cost to finde him worke at home; the greater threats of Adrabal, to follow his brother over the Alpes, as foone as he could rid himselfe of the Scipio's in Spaine; and the pouertie of the Common-wealth, which had not monie for any one of these mortall dangers: were driven almost even to extreme want of counsaile. But being vrged by the violence of swift necessitie, signified in the letters of the two Scipie's from Spaine; they refolued upon the only course, without which the Citie could not have fublisted.

They called the people to Affembly: wherein Q. Fuluius the Pretor laide to open the publique wants; and plainely faid, That in this Exigent, there must be no taking of monie for victuaile, weapons, apparrell, or the like things needefull to the Souldiers: but that fuch as had stuffe, or were artificers, must trust the Common-wealth with the Loane of their commodities, and labours, vntill the Warre were ended. Hercunto hee so effectually exhorted all men, especially the Publicans or Customers, and those which in former times had lived upon their dealing in the common Reuennues, that the charge was under-taken by private men; and the Armie in Spaine as well supplied, as if the Treasure had beene full. Shortly after this, M. Atilius Regulus, and P. Furius Philus the Roman Cenfors, taking in hand the redresse of disorders within the Citie, were chiefly intentine to the cor-20 rection of those, that had mil behaued themselves in this present warre. They beganne with L. Cacilius Metellus : , who, after the battaile at Canna, had held difcourse with some of his companions, about flying beyond the Seas; as if Rome. and all Italie, had beene no better than loft. After him they tooke in hand those, that having brought to Rome the meffage of their fellowes made prisoners at Canna, returned not back to Hannibal, as they were bound by oath; but thought themselues thereof sufficiently discharged, in that they had stepped once back into his campe; with pretence of taking better notice of the Captines names. All these were now pronounced infamous by the Cenfors; as also were a great many more; euen wholoeuer had not ferued in the warres, after the terme which the Lawes 30 appointed. Neither was the note of the Cenfors at this time (as otherwife it had vied to bee) hurtfull only in reputation : but greater weight was added therevnto, by this Decree of the Senate following; That all futh as were noted with infamie by thefe Cenfors, should bee transported into Sicil, there to serve untill the end of the Warre, under the same hard conditions, that were imposed upon the Remainder of the Armie beaten at Canna. The Office of the Cenfors was to take the Lift and accompt of the Citizens; to choose or displace the Senatours; and to set notes of differace (without further punishment) vpon those, whose vnhonest or vnseemely behauiour fell not within compasse of the Law. They tooke also an accompt of the Roman Gentlemen: among whom they distributed the publike Horses of 40 feruice, vitto fuch as they thought meet; or tooke them away for their milbehaniour. Generally, they had the ouer-fight of mens lines and manners; and their censure was much reuerenced and feared; though it extended no further, than to putting men out of ranke; or making them change their Tribe; or (which was the most that they could doe) causing them to pay some Duties to the Treasurie. from which others were exempted. But besides the care of this general! Taxe. and matters of Moralitie, they had the charge of all publike Workes; as mending of high waies, bridges, and water-courses, the reparations of Temples. Porches, and fuch other buildings. If any man encroched upon the streets, highwaics, or other places that ought to bee common; the Cenfors compelled him to 50 make amends. They had also the letting out of Lands, Gustomes, and other publike Revenues, to farme : fo that most of the Cirizens of Rome were beholding vnto this Office; as maintayning themselues by some of the Trades thereto belonging. And this was no small helpe to conserve the dignitic of the Senate : the commonaltie being obnoxious vnto the Cenfors; which were alwaies of that Order, and carefull to vp-hold the reputation thereof. But the Common-weale being now impourrished by warre, and having small store of Lands to let, or of Cuttomes that were worth the farming; Regulus and Philus troubled not themsclues much with pervsing the Temples, or other decaied Places, that needed reparations: or if they tooke a view of what was requifite to be done in this kinde: yet for bore they to fet any thing in hand, because they had not wherewith to pay. Herein againe appeared a notable generofitie of the Romans. They that had beene accustomed, in more happie times, to vindertake such peeces of worke, offered now themselves as willingly to the Censors, as if there had beene no such to want : promiting liberally their coft and trauaile; without expectation of any paiment, before the end of the warre. In like fort, the Masters of those slaues, that lately had beene enfranchifed by Gracebus, were very well contented to forbeare the price of them, vntill the Citie were in better case to pay. In this generall inclination of the Multitude, to relieue, as farre forth as every one was able, the common necessitie; all the goods of Orphans, and of Widdowes lining under Patronage, were brought into the Treasurie; and there the Quastor kept a booke, of all that was laied out for the sustenance of these Widdowes and Orphans : whilest the whole flock was yfed by the Citie. This good example of those which remained in the Towne, preuailed with the Souldiers abroad: fo that (the poorer fort ex- 20 cepted) they refused to take pay; and called those Mercinaries, that did accept it. when their countrie was in fo great want.

The twelve hundred Talents, wrongfully extorted from the Carthaginians; nor any injuries following, done by the Romans in the height of their pride; yeelded halfe so much commoditie, as might bee laied in ballance against these miseries, whereinto their Estate was now reduced. Neuerthelesse if wee consider thinges aright; the calamities of this Warre did rather enable Rome to deale with those Enemies, whom shee forth-with vnder-tooke, than abate or slacken the growth of that large Dominion, whereto shee attained, ere the yongest of those men was dead, whose names wee haue alreadie mentioned. For by this 10 hammering, the Roman mettall grew more hard and folide : and by paring the branches of private fortunes, the Root and Heart of the Common-wealth was corroborated. So grew the Citie of Athens; when Xerxes had burnt the Towne to albes, and taken from enery particular Citizen all hope of other felicitie, than that which refled in the common happinesse of the visiuersalitie. Certaine it is, (as Sir Francis Bacon hath judiciously observed) That a State whose dimension or stemme is small, may aptly serve to be foundation of a great Monarchie : which chiefly comes to paffe, where all regard of domesticall prosperitie is laid aside; and euery mans care addressed to the benefit of his countrie. Hereof I might say, that our Age hath scene a great example, in the vnited Provinces in the Netherlands; 40 whose present riches and strength, grew chiefly from that ill assurance, which each of their Townes, or all most of their Families, perceived it selfe to hold, whilest the Generalitie was oppressed by the Duke of Ava; were it so, that the people had thereby growne as warlike, as by extreme industrie, and straining themselues to fill their publike Treasurie, they are all growne wealthie, strong at Sea, and able to wage great Armies for their feruices by Land. Wherefore if wee valew at fuch a rate as we ought, the patient Refolution, conformitie to good Order, obedience to Magistrates, with many other Vertues, and, about all other, the great love of the Common-weale, which was found in Rome in these dangerous times ; we may truly fay, That the Citie was neuer in greater likelihood to prosper. Nei- 50 ther can it be deemed otherwise, than that if the same affections of the people had lasted, when their Empire, being growne more large and beautifull, should in all reason have been more deare vnto them, if the riches and delicacies of Asia had not infected them with fenfualitie, and carried their appetites mainly to those pleasures. wherein they thought their well-being to confift; if all the Citizens, and Subjects of Rome, could have believed their owne interest to be as great, in those wars which these latter Emperours made for their desence, as in these which were managed by the Confuls: the Empire, founded vpon fo great vertue, could not have beene throwne downe by the hands of rude Barbarians, were they neuer fo many. But vnto all Dominions God hath set their periods: Who, though hee hath given vnto Man the knowledge of those waies, by which Kingdomes rise and fall; yet hath left him subject vnto the affections, which draw on these fatall changes, in their to times appointed.

The Romans winne Come Townes back from HANNIBAL. HANNIBAL winnes Tarentum. The siege of Capua. Two victories of HANNIBAL. The journie of HANNIBAL to the gates of Rome. Capua taken by the

S the People of Rome strained themselves to the vtmost, for maintayning the warre: fo their Generals abroad omitted no part of industric, in seeking to recover what had beene lost. The Towne of Casiline, Fabius belieged. It was well defended by the Carthaginian Garrison; and likely to have beene relieued by those of Capqa, if Marcellus from Wolshad not come to the affiftance of his Colleague. Neuerth leffe the place held out so obstinately, that Fabius was purposed to give it ouer: faying, that the enterprise was not great; yet as difficult, as athing of more importance. But Marcellus was of a contrarie opinion. He faid, That many fuch things, as were not at first to 20 have beene under-taken by great Commanders, ought yet, when once they were taken in hand, to bee prosequuted unto the best effect. So the siege held on and the Towne was pressed so hard, that the Campans dwelling therein grew searefull, and craued parlee; offering to give it vp, fo as all might have leave to depart in safetie, whither they pleased. Whilest they were thus treating of conditions : or whilest they were iffuing forth, according to the composition alreadic made; (for it is diuerfly reported) Marcellus, seizing vpon a Gate, entred with his Armie, and put all to fword that came in their way. Fiftie of those that were first gotten out, ranne to Fabius the Conful: wo faued them, and fent them to Capua in safetie; all the rest were either slaine, or made prisoners. If Fabius deserved commendations, by hol-40 ding his word good vnto these fiftie; I know not how the slaughter of the rest, or imprisonment afterward of such, as scaped the heat of execution, could be excused by Marcellus. It may be that he helped himselfe, after the Roman falhion, with some æquiuocation, but he shall pay for it hereafter. In like fort was Mount Mar am in Gascoigne taken by the Marshall Monlue, when I was a yong manin France. For whilest he entertained parlee about composition; the besieged ranne all from their feuerall guards, vpon haftie defire of being acquainted with the conditions propofed. The Marshall therefore discourring a part of the walls vnguarded, entred by Scalado; and put all faue the Gouernour vnto the fword. Herein that Gouernour of Mount Marsam committed two groffe errours; the one; in that hee gaue no or-50 der for the Captaines and Companies; to hold themselves in their places; the other, in that he was content to parlee, without pledges for affurance given and received. Some such ouer-sight, the Gouernour of Cassline seemeth to have committed; yet neither the aduantage taken by Marcellus, or by Monluc, was very honourable. When this worke was ended, many small Townes of the Sammites, and some of the Ttttt 2

Lucans and Apulians, were recoursed: wherein were taken, or flaine, about five and twentie thousand of the Enemies; and the Countrie gricuously wasted by Fabius. Marcellus lying fick at Wola.

Hannibal in the meane while was about Tarentum; waiting to heare from those, that had promifed to give vp the Towne. But M. Valerius, the Roman Propretor, had thrult fo many men into it, that the Traitors durft not flirre. Wherefore the Carthaginian was faine to depart; having wearied himfelfe in vaine with expectation. Yet he wasted not the Countrie; but contented himselfe with hope, that they would pleafe him better in time following. So he departed thence toward Salapia: which he chose for his wintring place; and beganne to victuaile it, when Sommer to was but halfe past. It is said, that he was in loue with a yong Wench in that towne: in which regard if he beganne his Winter more timely, than otherwise neede required, He did not like the Romans; whom necessitie enforced, to make their Sommer last as long, as they were able to traugile vp and downe the Countrie.

About this time beganne great troubles in Sicil; whither Marcellus the Conful was fent, to take fuch order for the Prouince, as neede should require. Of the doings there, which wore out more time than his Confulfhip, we will speake hereafter.

The new Confuls, chosen at Rome, were O. Fabius the sonne of the present Conful, and T. Sempronius Gracehus the second time. The Romans found it needfull for the publike feruice, to imploy often-times their bestable men: and therefore made 20 it lawfull, during the warre, to recontinue their Officers, and choose such as had lately held their places before; without regarding any distance of time, which was otherwife required. The old Fabrils became Lieutenant vnto his fonne: which was perhaps the respect, that most commended his sonne vnto the place. It is noted. That when the old man came into the campe, and his fonne rode forth to meet him : eleven of the twelve Lictors, which carried each an axe with a bundle of rods before the Conful, fuffered him, in regard of due reuerence, to passe by them on horse back; which was against the custome. But the sonne perceiuing this, commanded the last of his Lictors to note it: who thereupon bad the old Fabius alight. and come to the Conful on his feet. The father chearefully did fo; faying, It was 20 my minde, some, to make triall, whether thou diddest understand thy selfe to bee Consul. Cafins Atinius a wealthie Citizen of Arpi, who, after the battaile at Canna, had holpen the Carthaginian into that Towne, feeing now the fortune of the Romans to amend; came privily to this Conful Fabius, and offered to render it back vnto him. if he might bee therefore well rewarded. The Conful purposed to follow old examples : and to make this Altinius a patterne to all Traitors; vling him, as Camillus and Fabricus had done those, that offered their vnfaithfull service against the Falisci, and King Pyrrhus. But Q. Fabius the father, was of another opinion : and faid, it was a matter of dangerous confequence, That it should be thought more safe to reuolt from the Romans, than to turne vnto them. Wherefore it was concluded, that hee 40 should be sent to the Towne of Cales, and there kept as prisoner; vntill they could better resolue, what to doe with him, or what vse to make of him. Hannibal, vnderstanding that Altinius was gone, and among the Romans, tooke it not forrowfully; but thought this a good occasion, to seize vpon all the mans riches, which were great. Yet, that he might seeme rather seuere, than couctous, He sent for the wife and children of Altinius into his campe: where having examined them by torment, partly concerning the departure and intentions of this fugitive, partly, and more strictly, about hisriches, what they were, and where they lay, He condemned them, as partakers of the Treason, to be burnt aline; and tooke all their goods ynto himfelfe. Fabius the Conful shortly after came to Arpi: which he wanne by Scalado, in a 50 formie and rainie night. Five thousand of Hannibals Souldiers lay in the Towne; and of the Arpines themselves, there were about three thousand. These were thrust formost by the Carthaginian Garrison; when it was understood, that the Romans had gotten ouer the wall, and broken open a Gate. For the fouldiers held the town fmen fuspected;

CHAP.3. S.14. of the Historie of the World. suspected; and therefore thought it no wisedome, to trust them at their backs. But after some little relistance, the Arpines gaue ouer fight, and entertained parlee with the Romans: protesting, that they had beene betraied by their Princes, and were hecome subject to the Carthaginians, against their wills. In processe of this discourse, the Arpine Pretor went vnto the Roman Conful: and receiping his faith for fecuritie of the Towne, prefently made head against the Garrison. This not with landing; like it is, that Hannibals men continued to make good refiftance. For when almost a thousand of them, that were Spaniards, offered to leaue their companions, and serve on the Roman fide; it was yet couenanted, That the Carthaginians should be suffered to passe forth quietly, and returne to Hannibal. This was performed : and so Arps became Roman againe; with little other loffe, than of him that had betraied it. About the same time, Cliternum was taken by Sempronius Tuditanus, one of the Pretors : and vnto Cneius Faluius, another of the Pretors, an hundred and twelue Gentlemen of Capua offered their feruice; vpon no other condition, than to have their goods restored vnto them, when their Citie should bee recoursed by the Romans. This was a thing of small importance : but considering the generall hatred of the Cambans toward Rome, it served to discover the inclination of the Italians in those times; and how their affections recoiled from Hannibal, when there was no appearance of those mightie succours, that had beene promised from Carthage. The 20 Confentines also, and the Thurines, people of the Brutians, that had yeelded themfelues to Hannibal; returned againe to their old allegeance. Others would have followed their example, but that one L. Pomponius, who of a Publican had made himselfe a Captaine, and gotten reputation by some pettie exploits in forraging the countrie, was flaine by Hanno, with a great multitude of those that followed him. Hannibal in the meane while had all his care bent voon Tarentum; which if hee could take it feemed that it would fland him in good flead, for drawing ouer that helpe out of Macedon, which his Carthaginians failed to fend. Long he waited, ere he could bring his defire to paffe; and being loth to hazard his forces, where hee hoped to prenaile by intelligence: He contented himselfe, with taking in some poore Townes of the 30 Salentines. At length, his Agents within Tarentum found meanes to accomplish their purpose, and his wish. One Phileas, that was of their conspiracie, who lay at Rome as Embaffador, practifing with the Hoftages of the Tarentines, and fuch as had the keeping of them, conucighed them by night out of the Citic. But hee and his companie were the next day fo closely purfued, that all of them were taken, and brought back to Rome; where they suffered death, as Traitors. By reason of this crueltie, or feueritie, the people of Twentum grew to hate the Romans, more generally and earnestly than before. As for the Conspirators, they followed their businesse the more diligently; as knowing what reward they were to expect, if their intention should happen to be discovered. Wherefore they sent against to Hannibal: and ac-40 quainting him with the manner of their plot, made the fame composition with him for the Tarentines, which they of Capua had made before. Nice and Philomenes, two the chiefe among them, vied much to goe forth of the Towns on hunting by night, as if they durft not take their pleasure by day, for seare of the Carthaginians. Seldome or neuer they missed of their game: for the Carthaginians prepared it readie for their handes, that they might not seeme to have been abroad vpon other occasion. From the campe of Hannibal, it was about three daies journie to Tarentum, if hee should have marched thither with his whole Armie. This caused his long abode in one place the leffe to be suspected: as also to make his Enemies the more secure, He caufed it to be given out, that he was fick. But when the Romans within Tarentum, were 50 growne careleffe of fuch his neighbourhood, and the Conspirators had set their bufinesse in order: He tooke with him ten thousand, the most expedite of his horse and foot; and long before breake of day, made all speede thitherward. Fourescore light

conered. It had beene often the manner of some few Numidian horse, to doe the like in former times. Wherefore the Roman Gouernour, when he heard tell in the cuening, that fome Numidians were abroad in the fields, tooke it for a figne, that Hannibal was not as yet diflodged; and gaue order, that some companies should be fent out the next morning, to strip them of their bootie, and send them gone. But when it grew darke night; Hannibal, guided by Philomenes, came close to the towne: where, according to the tokens agreed vpon, making a light to shew his arrivall: Nico, that was within the Towne, answered him with another light, in signe that he was readic. Presently Nico beganne to set vpon one of the Gates, and to kill the watchmen. Philomenes went toward another gate; and whiftling (as was his man- 10 ner) called up the Porter; bidding him make hafte, for that hee had killed a great Bore, so heavie, that scarce two men could stand vnder it. So the Porter opened the wicket: and forthwith entred two yong men, loaden with the Bore; which Hannibal had prepared large enough, to bee worthie the looking on. While the Porter flood wondring at the largeneffe of the beaft, Philomenes ranne him through with his Bore-speare; and letting in some thirtie armed men, fell vpon all the watch; whom when he had flaine, he entred the great gate. So the Armie of Hannibal, entring Tarentum at two gates, went directly toward the Market-place; where both parts met. Thence they were distributed by their Generall, and sent into all quarters of the Citic, with Tarentines to be their guides. They were commanded to kill all the Ro- 20 mans; and not to burt the Citizens. For better performance hereof Hannibal willed the Conspirators, that when any of their friends appeared in fight, they should bid him be quiet, and of good cheare. All the Towne was in an vprore : but few could tell what the matter meant. A Roman trumpet was vnskilfully founded by a Greeke in the Theater: which helped the suspition, both of the Tarentines, that the Romans were about to fooile the Towne; and of the Romans, that the Citizens were in commotion. The Cournour fled into the Port : and taking boat , got into the Citadell, that flood in the mouth of the Hauen; whence hee might ealily perceive the next morning, how all had passed. Hannibal, assembling the Tarentines, gaue them to vinderstand, what good affection hee bore them; inueighed bitterly against 20 the Romans, as tyrannous oppreffors; and spake what else he thought fit for the prefent. This done; and having gotten fuch spoile as was to bee had of the Souldiers goods in the Towne, He addressed himselfe against the Citadell; hoping that if the Garrison would fallie out, he might give them such a blow, as should make them vnable to defend the Peece. According to his expectation it partly fell out. For when he beganne to make his approches, the Romans in a brauerie fallying forth, gaue charge you his men; who fell back of purpose according to direction, till they had drawne on as many as they could, and fo farre from their strength, as they durst aduenture. Then gaue Hannibal a signe to his Carthaginians, who lay prepared readie for the purpose : and fiercely setting vpon the Enemie, draue him back with great 40 flaughter, as fast as he could runne; so that afterwards he durst not iffue forth. The Citadell flood youn a Demi-Iland, that was plaine ground; and fortified only with a ditch and wall against the Towne, whereunto it was joyned by a cawsey. This cawfey Hannibal intended to fortifie in like fort against the Citadell; to the end that the Tarentines might be able, without his helpe, to keepe themselues from all danger thence. His worke in few daies went fo well forward, without impediment from the belieged, that he conceived hope of winning the Peece it felfe, by taking a little more paines. Wherefore he made readicall forts of engines, to force the place. But whilest he was busied in his workes, there came by Scaa strong supply from Metapontum: which tooke away all hope of prenailing; and made him returne to his 50 former counsaile. Now for a fmuch as the Tarentine fleet lay within the Hauen, and could not passe forth, whilest the Romans held the Citadell: it seemed likely, that the Towne would fuffer want, being debarred of accustomed trade and provisions by Sea; whileft the Roman Garrison, by helpe of their shipping, might easily be re-lieued, and enabled to hold out. Against this inconuenience, it was rather wished by the Tarentines, than any way hoped, that their sife eccouldge out of the Hauen; to guard the mouth offic, and cut off all supply from the Enemic. Hambal told then; that this might well be done: for that their Towne standing in plaine ground, and their streets being faire and broad, it would been ohard matter to draw the Galiles ouer Land, and lanch them into the Sea without. This he undertook and essentially with the Roman Garrison was reduced into great necessitie; though with much patience it held out, and found Hambal often-times otherwise busited, than his affiliers required.

Thus with mutuall loffe on both fides, the time passed : and the Roman forces, growing daily stronger, Q. Fulvius Flaceus, with Appius Claudius, lately chosen Confuls, prepared to beliege the great Citic of Capua. Three and twentie Legions the Romans had now armed. This was a great and haltie growth from that want of men, and of all necessaries, whereinto the losse at Canna had reduced them. But to fill vp these Legions, they were faine to take vp yong Boyes, that were vnder seuenteene yeares of age: and to fend Commissioners aboue fiftie miles round, for the feeking out of fuch Lads as might appeare serviceable, and pressing them to the warres; making vet a Law, That their yeares of feruice, whereunto they were bound by order of the Citie, should be reckoned, for their benefit, from this their beginning 20 fo yong, as if they had beene of lawfull age. Before the Roman Armie drew neare. the Campans felt great want of victuailes, as if they had alreadie beene belieged. This happened partly by floth of the Nation, partly by the great waste and spoile, which the Romans had in foregoing yeares made vpon their grounds. They fent therefore Embaffadours to Hannibal's desiring him to succourthem ere they were closed up, as they feared to bee shortly. Hee gaue them comfortable wordes; and fent Hanne with an Armie to supply their wants. Hanne appointed them a day: against which they should be readie with all manner of carriages, to store themselues with victuailes, that he would prouide. Neither did he promise more, than he performed. For heccaused great quantitie of graine, that had beene laied yo in Cities 20 round about, to be brought into his campe, three miles from Beneuentum. Thither at the time appointed came no more than fortie Carts or Wagons, with a few packhorses: as it this had beene enough to victuaile Capuir. Such was the rechlesnesse of the Campans. Hanno was exceeding angrie hereat : and told them they were worfe than very beafts; fince hunger could not teach them to have greater care. Wherefore hee gaue them a longer day; against which hee made provision to store them throughly. Of all these doings word was sent to the Roman Confuls, from the Citizens of Beneventum. Therefore Q. Fulvius the Conful, taking with him fuch strength as hee thought needfull for the service, came into Beneventum by night; where with diligence he made inquirie into the behaulour of the Enemie. He lear-40 ned, that Hanno with part of his Armie was gone abroad to make provisions; that fometwo thousand Wagons, with a great rabble of Carters and other Varlets, lay among the Carthaginians in their campe; fo that little good order was kept : all thought being set vpon a great Haruest. Hereupon the Consul bade his men prepare themselves, to assaile the Enemies campe: and leaving all his impediments within Beneventum, He marched thitherward fo early in the morning, that hee was there with the first breake of day. By comming so vnexpected, Hee had well-neare forced the campe on the fudden. But it was very firong, and very well defended: fo that the longer the fight continued, the leffe defire had Fulsius to loofe more of his men in the attempt; seeing many of them cast away, and yet little hope of doing

50 good. Therefore he faid, that it were better to goo more leftirely and dubfiantially to worke; to fend for his fellow-Gonful with the reft of their Armie; and to lie between Hanne and home; that neither the Cambaus: fhould depart thence, nor the Caribagain he balbe to relieue them. Being thus diffeouring; and shout to found the retrait; hee faw, that fome of his men had gotten ouer the Enemies Rampart.

There was great bootie; or (which was all one to the fouldier) an opinion of much that might be gotten in that campe. Wherefore some Ensigne-bearers threw their Enfignes ouer the Rampart, willing their men to fetch them out, valeffe they would endure the shame and dishonour following such a losse. Feare of such ignominie. than which none could bee greater, made the Souldiers aduenture fo desperately; that Fuluus, perceiving the heat of his men, changed purpose, and encouraged those that were (omewhat backward, to follow the example of them, that had alreadic porten over the Trenches. Thus the campe was wonne : in which were flaine aboue tixe thousand; and taken, aboue seven thousand; besides all the store of victuailes, and carriages, with abundance of bootie, that Hanno had lately gotten from the Ro- 10 man Confederates. This misadmenture, and the nearer approach of both the Confuls, made them of Capua fend a pittifull Embassage to Hannibal: putting him in minde of all the love, that he was wont to proteft vnto their Citie; and how he had made thewato affect it no leffe than Carthage. But now, they faid, it would be loft, as Arpi was lately, if he gaue not strong and speedie succour. Hannibal answered with comfortable wordes; and fent away two thousand horse, to keepe their grounds from spoile; whilest hee himselfe was detained about Tarensum, partly by hope of winning the citadell, partly by the disposition, which he saw in many townes adjoyning, to yeeld vnto him. Among the Hostages of the Tarentines, that lately had fled out of Rome, and, being ouer-taken, fuffered death for their attempt; were some of 20 the Metapontines, and other Cities of the Greekes, inhabiting that Eafterne part of Italie, which was called of old Magna Gracia. These people tooke to heart the death of their Hostages; and thought the punishment greater, than the offence. Wherefore the Metapontines, as foone as the Roman Garrison was taken from them, to defend the citadell of Tarentum, made no more adoe, but opened their gates to Hannibal. The Thurines would have done the like, vpon the like reason; had not some companies laine in their Towne; which they feared that they should not bee able to mafter. Neuertheleffe they helped themselves by cunning : inviting to their gates Hanno and Migo, that were peare at hand; against whom whilest they proffered their feruice to Atinius, the Roman captaine, they drew him forth to fight; and recovling from him, closed up their gates. A little formalitie they yled, in pretending feare, left the Enemie should breake in together with the Romans; in saving Atinius himselfe, and sending him away by Sea; as also in consulting a small while (because perhaps many of their chiefe men were vnacquainted with the practife) whether they should yeeld to the Carthaginian, or no. But this disputation lasted not long: for they that had removed the chiefe impediment, calily prevailed in the rest; and deliuered up the Towne to Hanno and Mago. This good successe, and hope of the like, detained Hannibal in those quarters; whilest the Confuls, fortifying Beneventum to secure their backs, addressed themselves vnto the siege of Capua.

Many difasters befell the Romans, in the beginning of this great enterprise. T. Sem- 40 proning Gracehus, a very good man of warre, that had of late beene twice Conful, was flaine either by trecherie of fome Lucans, that drew him into an ambush; or by some Carthaginian stragglers, among whom he fell vnawares. His bodie, or his head, was very honorably interred, either by Hannibal himselfe, or (for the reports agree not) by the Romans; to whom Hannibal fent it. He was appointed to lie in Beneventum, there to secure the back of the Armie that should besiege Capua. But his death hapned in an ill time; to the great hindrance of that bufineffe. The Volones or Slaves lately manumifed, forfooke their Enfignes, and went enery one whither hee thought good, as if they had beene discharged by the decease of their Leader; so that it asked fome labour to feeke them out, and bring them back into their campe. Neuerthe- 50 leffe the Confuls went forward with their worke: and drawing neare to Capua, did all acts of hostilitie which they could. Mago the Carthaginian, and the Citizens of Capua, coaue them an hard welcome; wherein aboue fifteene hundred Romans were loft. Neither was it long, ere Hannibal came thither; who fought with the Confuls, and had the better; insomuch that he caused them to dislodge. They removed by night, and went feuerall waies : Fuluius toward Cuma; Claudius, into Lucania, Hannibal followed after Claudius: who having led him a great walke, fetcht a compaffe about, and returned to Capua. It so fellout, that one M. Centenius Penula a stout man, and one that with good commendations had discharged the place of a Centurion, lay with an Armie not farre from thence, where Hannibal refled, when hee was wearie of hunting after Claudius. This Penula had made great vants to the Roman Senate, of wonders which he would worke, if he might be trufted with the leading of fine thousand men. The Fathers were vinwilling in such a time, to reject the vertue of any good Souldier; how meane focuer his condition were. Wherfore they gave him the charge of eight thousand; and he himselfe, being a proper man, and talking brauely, gathered up fo many voluntaries, as almost doubled his number. But meeting thus with Hannibal, he gaue proofe of the difference, betweene a front Centurion, and one able to command in chiefe. Hee and his fellowes were all (in a manner) flaine; scarce a thousand of them escaping. Soone after this Hannibal had word, that Cn. Fuluius, a Roman Pretor with eighteene thousand men, was in Apulia, very careleffe, and a man infufficient for the charge which he held. Thither he therefore hafied to visit him : hoping to deale the better with the maine strength of Rome, which pointed at Capua, when he should have cut off those forces, that lay in the Provinces about vnder men of small abilitie. Comming vpon Fuluius, He found him and his men fo jollie, that needes they would have fought the first night. Wherefore it was not to be doubted, what would happen the day following. So hee bestowed Mago with three thousand of his lightest armed, in places thereabout most fit for ambush. Then offering battaile to Fuluius, Hee foone had him in the trap: whence hee made him glad to escape aline; leaving all, saue two thousand of his followers, dead behinde him.

These two great blowes, received one presently after the other, much assonished the Romans. Neuerthelelic all care was taken, to gather up the small reliques of the broken Armics: and that the Confuls should goe substantially forwards with the no fiege of Capua; which was of great consequence, both in matter of reputation, and in many other respects. The two Consuls fate downe before the towne : and C. Claudius Nero, one of the Pretors, came with his Armie from Sueffula to their affiftance. They made Proclamation, That who focuer would iffue forth of Capua before a certaineday prefixed, should have his pardon, and be suffered to enjoy all that vnto him belonged: which day being past, there should be no grace expected. This offer was contumelionfly rejected; the Capuans relying on their owne strength, and the fuccours attended from Hannibal. Before the citie was closed vp, they fent Messengers to the Carthaginian; which found him at Brundusium. He had made a long journie, in hope of gaining the Tarentine citadell : of which expectation failing, He turned to Brundusium; vpon advertisement that he should be let in. There the Capuans methim; told him of their danger with earnest wordes; and were with wordes as braue recomforted. He bad them confider how a few daies fince he had chased the Confuls out of their fields; and told them, that we would prefently come thither againe, and fend the Romans going, as fast as before. With this good answere the Mcffengers returned : and hardly could get back into the citie; which the Romans had almost entrenched round. As for Hannibal himselfe; He was of opinion, that Capua, being very well manned, and heartily denoted vnto his friendship, would hold out a long time: and thereby giue him leifure, to doe what he thought requifite among the Tarentines, and in those Easterne parts of Italie; whilst the Roman armie spent it 50 felfe in a tedious fiege. Thus he lingred : and thereby gaue the Confuls time, both to fortifie themselves at Capua, and to dispatch the election of new Magistrates in Rome; whilest he himselfe pursued hopes, that neuer found successe.

Claudius and Fuluius, when their terme of Office was expired, were appointed to continue the fiege at Capua; retaining the same Armies, as Proconsuls. The townes-

men often fallied out; rather in a brauerie, than likelihood to worke any matter of effect; the Enemie lying close within his Trenches, as intending, without other violence, to subdue them by famine. Yet against the Campan horse (for their foot was easily beaten) the Romans yied to thrust out some troups, that should hold them skirmilly. In these exercises the Campans vivally had the better, to the great griefe of their proud Enemie; who scorned to take foile at the hands of such Rebells. It was therefore denifed, that fome actine and couragious yong men, should learne to ride behinde the Roman men at armes; leaping vp, and againe difmounting lightly, as occasion served. These were furnished like the Velites, having each of them three or foure small darts; which, alighting in time of conflict, they discharged thick upon to the Enemies horse: whom vanquilling in this kinde of service, they much disheartned in the maine. The time thus palling, and faminedaily increasing within the Citie; Hannibal came at length, not expected by the Romans: and taking a Fort of theirs, called Galatia, fell youn their campe. At the same time the Capuans issued with their whole power, in as terrible manner as they could deuise: setting all their multitude of unferuiceable people on the walls; which, with a loud noise of Pannes and Bafons, troubled those that were occupied in fight. Appius Claudius opposing himselfe to the Campans, cassly defended his Trenches against them; and so well repressed them, that he draue them at length back into their Citie. Neuerthelesse, in pursuing them to their gates, He received a wound, that accompanied him in short space 20 after to his graue. Q. Fuluius was held harder to his taske, by Hannibal and the Carthaginian Armic. The Roman campe was even at point to have beene loft and Hannibal his Elephants, of which he brought with him three and thirtie, were either gotten within the rampart, or elfe (for the report varies) being some of them flaine ypon it, fell into the ditch; and filled it up in fuch fort, that their bodies ferued as a bridge vnto the Affailants. It is faid, that Hannibal in this tumult caused some fugitiues, that could speake Latine well, to proclaime aloud, as it were in the Confuls name, That every one of the Souldiers should shift for himselfe, and flie betimes vnto the next Hills, for a fmuch as the campe was alreadie loft. But all would not ferue. The fraud was detected: and the Armie, having fitten there fo long, had at 20 good leifure strongly entrenched it selfe; so as little hope there was to raise the siege by force.

This did extremely perplexe the Carthaginian. The purchase of Capua had (as was thought) with-held him from taking Rome it felfe: and now his defire of winning the Tarentine Citadell, had well neare lost Capus; in respect of which, neither the Citadell, nor Citic of Tarentum, were to have beene much regarded. Falling therefore into a desperate anger with himselfe and his hard fortune, that of so many great victories he had made no greater vie; on the fudden he entertained an haughtierefolution, euen to fet vpon Rome; and carrie to the walls of that proud Citie, the danger of warre that threatned Capua. This he thought would be a meane, to 40 draw the Roman Generalls, or one of them at least, vnto the defence of their owne home. If they role from the fiege with their whole Armie; then had he his defire: If they divided their forces; then was it likely, that either he, or the Campans, should well enough deale with them apart. Neither did he despaire, that the terror of his comming might fo aftonish the multitude within Rome, as he might enter some part or other of the Citie. His only feare was, lest the Campans, being ignorant of his purpose, should thinke he had for saken them; and therupon for thwith yeeld themselues to the Enemie. To prevent this danger, He sent letters to Capua by a subtile Numidian: who running as a fugitive into the Roman campe, conveighed himfelfe thence over the innermost Trenches into the Gitic. The journie to Rome, was 50 to be performed with great celeritie: no fmall hope of good fuccesse, resting in the suddennesse of his arrivall there. Wherefore he caused his men, to have in a readinesse ten daies victuailes; and prepared as many boats, as might in one night transport his Armie ouer the River of Vulturnus. This could not be done so closely, but that the Roman Generalls by fome fugitiues had notice of his purpole. With this danger therefore they acquainted the Seriate: which was therewith affected, according to the diverlitie of mens opinions, in a case of such importance. Some gave counfaile to let alone Capua, yea and all places elfe, rather then to put the Towne of Rome into perill of being taken by the Enemie. Others were so farre from allowing of this, as they wondered how any man could thinke, that Hamibal, being vnable to relieue Capua, should indge himselfe strong enough to winne Rome; and therefore floutly faid, That, those Legions, which were kept at home for defence of the Citic, would ferue the turne well enough, to keepe him out, and fend him thence; if he were so vnwise, as to come thither. But it was finally concluded, that letters should be sent to Fuluius and Claudius, acquainting them perfectly with the forces, that at the prefent were in Rome: who, fince they knew belt, what the strength was which Hannibal could bring along with him, were best able to judge, what was needfull to oppose him. So it was referred vnto the discretion of these Generalls at Capua, to doe as they thought behouefull : and if it might conveniently be, neither to raise their siege, nor yet to put the Citic of Rome into much adventure. According to this Decree of the Senate, Q. Fuluius tooke fifteene thouland foote, and a thousand horse, the choice of his whole Armie: with which he halted toward Rome; leaving App. Claudins, who could not travell by reason of his wound, to continue 20 the fiege at Capua.

Hannibal, having passed over Vulturnus, burnt vp all his boats; and left nothing that might serue to transport the Enemie, in case he should offer to pursue or coast him. Then hafted he away toward Rome; flaying no longer in any one place, then he needs must. Yet found he the bridges ouer Liris broken downe, by the people of Fregella: which as it stopped him a little on his way; so it made him the more grienoully to spoile their lands, whiles the bridges were in mending. The nearer that he drew to Rome, the greater waste he made: his Numidians running before him: driving the Countrey, and killing or taking multitudes of all forts and ages, that fled out of all parts round about. The messengers of these newes came apace, 20 one after another, into the Citie; some few bringing true aductifements; but the most of them reporting the conceits of their owne feare. All the streets, and Temples in Rome, were peffered with women, crying and praying; and rubbing the Altars with their haire, because they could doe none other good. The Senatours were all in the great Market, or place of Assemblie; readic to give their advice, if it were asked, or to take directions given by the Magistrates, All places of most importance were fluffed with fouldiers: it being vncertaine, ypon which part Hampibal would fall. In the middest of this trepidation, there came newes that Q. Fuluins, with part of the Armie from Capus, was hasting to defence of the Citic. The Office of a Proconful did expire, at his returne home, and entricinto the Gates of Rome. Where-40 fore, that Fulnius might lose nothing by comming into the Citie in time of such need, an Act was passed, That He should have equall power with the Confuls, during his abode there. He and Hannibal arrived at Rome, one foone after another: Fuluius having beenelong held occupied in passing over Fuluinus; and Hannibal receiuing impediment in his iourney, as much as the Countrey was able to give. The Confuls, and Fuluius, incamped without the Gates of Rome; attending the Carthaginian. Thither they called the Senate; and as the danger grew nearer and greater; fo tooke they more carefull and especiall order, against all occurrences. Hannibal came to the River Anio or Anien, three miles from the Towner whence He advanced with two thousand Horse, and rode along agreat way under the walls; viewing

50 the firethereof, and confidering how he might beft approch it. But He either went, or (as the Roman Storic faith) was driven aways without doing, or receiving any hurt. Many tumults rofe in this while among the people; but were fupperfield by care and diligence of the Senators. Aboue the reft, one accident was both troublefome, and not without perill. Of Namidians that had fhifted fide, and fallen (vpon Vuluu men and the senators).

fome displeasures) from Hannibal to the Romans, there were some twelve hundred then in Rome: which were appointed by the Confuls, to passe through the Towne. from the Mount Auentine to the Gate Collina, where it was thought that their fernice might be viefull, among broken wayes, and Garden walls lying in the fuburbs. The faces of these men, and their furniture, wherein they differed not from the followers of Hannibal; bred fuch mistaking, as caused a great vprore among the people : all crying out, that Auentine was taken, and the enemie gotten within the wals. The noise was such that men could not be informed of the truth : and the streetes were so full of cattaile, and husbandmen, which were fledde thither out of the Villages adjoyning, that the passage was stopt vp: and the poore Numidians pittifully to beaten from the house-toppes, with stones and other weapons that came next to hand by the defocrate multitude, that would have run out at the gates, had it not beene certaine who lay under the walls. To remedie the like inconveniences, it was ordained. That all which had beene Dictators, Confuls, or Cenfors, should have authoritie as Magistrates, till the Enemie departed. The day following, Hannibal passed ouer Anien, and presented battaile to the Romans, who did not wisely if they undertooke it. It is faid, that a terrible showre of raine, caused both Romans and Carthaginians to returne into their fenerall Camps: and that this happened two daies together, the weather breaking vp, and clearing, as soone as they were departed a funder. Certaine it is, that Hannibal, who had brought along with him no more than ten daies prouision, could not endure to flay there, vntill his victuals were all fpent. In which regard, the Romans, if they fuffered him to wast his time and provisions, knowing that hee could not abide there long, did as became well-aduised men : if they offered to fight with him, and either had the better, or were parted (as is faid) by some accident of weather; the commendations must be given to their fortune. The terrour of Hannibals comming to the Citie, how great focuer it was at the first, yet after fome leifure, and better notice taken of his forces, which appeared lesse than the first apprehension had formed them, was much and foone abated. Hercunto it helped well, that at the fame time, the supplie appointed for Spaine, after the death of the two Scipio's, was fent out of the towne, & went forth at one gate, whileft the Carthaginian ay before another. In all Panick terrours, as they are called, wherof there is either no cause known or no cause answerable to the greatnesse of the sudden consternation; it is a good remedie, to doe somewhat quite contrarie to that which the danger would require, were it such, as men haue fashioned it in their amaled conceits. Thus did Alexander cause his souldiers to disarme themselves, when they were all on a sudden in a great feare of they knew not what. And thus did Clearchus pacifie a foolish vprore in his Armie, by proclaiming a reward vnto him, that could tell who had fent the Affe into the Campe. But in this present example of the Romans, appeares withall a great magnanimitie: whereby they fustained their reputation, and augmented it no leffe, than by this bolde attempt of Hannibal it might feeme to have beene diminished. Neither could they more finely have checked the glorious conceipts of their Enemies, and taken away the difgrace of that feare, which clowded their valour at his first comming; than by making such demonstrations, when once they had recouered spirit, how little they esteemed him. To this purpose therefore that veric piece of ground, on which the Carthaginian lay incamped, was folde in Rome : and folde it was nothing under the value, but at as good a rate, as if it had beene in time of peace. This indignitie comming to his eare, incenfed Hannibal fo much, that he made Portfale of the Siluer-smithes shops, which were neare about the Market or Common place in Rome; as if his owne title to the houses within the Towne, were no whit worse, then any Roman Citizens could be vnto that piece of ground, whereon he raifed his Tent. Butthis counter-practife was nothing worth. The Romans did feeke to manifest that assurance, which they justly had conceived; Hannibal, to make shew of continuing in an hope, which was alreadic past. His victuailes were almost spent: and of those ends, that he had proposed vnto himselfe, this journey had brought forth none other, than the fame of his much daring. Wherefore hee brake vp his campe: and doing what fpoile he could in the Roman Territorie, without fparing religious places, wherein wealth was to begotten. He passed like a Tempelt ouer the Countrie; and ranne toward the Easterne Sea so fast that hee had atmost taken the Citic of Rogium before his arrivall was feared or suspected. As for Capus hee gaue it lost sand is likely to haue cured the whole faction of Hanne, which thus difabled him to relieve that faire Citic; since he had no other way to vent his griefe.

Q. Fuluing returning back to Capua, made Proclamation anew, that who fo would veeld, before a certaineday, might fafely doe it. This, and the very returne of 10 Fuluius, without any more appearance of Hannibal, gave the Capuans to vinderstand. that they were abandoned, and their case desperate. To trust the Roman pardon proclaimed, every mans confeience of his owne enill deferts, told him that it was a vanitie: and some faint hope was given, by Hanno and Bostar, Captaines of the Carthaginian Garrison within the Towne, that Hannibal should come againe; if meanes could only be found, how to conuey fuch letters vnto him, as they would write. The carriage of the letters was undertaken, by some Numidians: who running, as fugitiues, out of the Towne, into the Roman campe, waited fit opportunitie to make an escape thence with their packets. But it hapned creethey could conneigh themfelues away, that one of them was detected by an Harlot following him out of the Towne; and the letters of Bostar and Hanno, were taken and opened; containing a vehement entreatie vnto Hannibal, that he would not thus for fake the Capuans and them. For (faid they) we came not hither to make warre against Rhegium and Tarentum, but against the Romans: whose Legions wheresoeuer they lie, there also should the Carthaginian Armic be readic to attend them; and by taking of such course, have we gotten those victories at Trebia, Thrasymene, and Canna. In fine. they befought him, that he would not dishonour himselfe, and betray them to their enemies, by turning an other way; as if it were his only care, that the Citie should not be taken in his full view : promiting, to make a desperate fallie, if he would once more aduenture to fet vpon the Roman camp. Such were the hopes of Boffar and his 20 fellow. But Hannibal had alreadie done his best : and now beganne to faint under the burden of that warre, wherein (as afterward he protested) he was vanquished by Hanno and his Partifans in the Carthaginian Senate, rather than by any force of Rome. It may well be, as a thing incident in like cases, that some of those which were besieged in Capua, had beene fent ouer by the Hannonians, to observe the doings of Hannibal, and to check his proceedings. If this were fo; juffly might they curfe their owne malice, which had cast them into this remedilesse necessitie. Howsocuerit were, the letters directed vnto Hannibal, fell (as is shewed) into the Reman Proconfuls hands; who cutting off the hands of all fuch counterfait fugitiues, as carried fuch messages, whipt them back into the Towne. This miserable spectacle brake 40 the hearts of the Campans: fo that the Multitude crying out your the Senate, with menacing termes, caused them to assemble, and consult, about the yeelding up of Capua vnto the Romans. The brauest of the Senators, and such as a few yeares since had beene most forward in joyning with Hannibal, vnderstood well enough wherevnto the matter tended. Wherefore one of them inuited the rest home to supper : telling them, that when they had made good cheare, he would drinke to them fuch an health, as should set them free from that cruell reuenge, which the Enemie fought vpon their bodies. About feuen and twentie of the Senators there were, that liking well of this motion, ended their lines together, by drinking poifon. All the reft, hoping for more mercie than they had deserued, yeelded simply to discretion. 50 So one of the Towne-gates was fet open: whereat a Roman Legion with some other companies, entring, difarmed the Citizens; apprehended the Carthaginian Garrifon; and commanded all the Senators of Capua to goe forth into the Roman campe. Attheir comming thither, the Proconfuls laid yrons vpon them all : and commanding them to tell what store of gold and siluer they had at home, sent them into safe Vunun 2

custodic: some to Cales; others to Theanum. Touching the generall Multitude: they were referred vnto the diferetion of the Senate : yet so hardly vsed by Fuluius in the meane while, that they had little cause of hope or comfort in this aduersitie. Ap, Claudius was brought even to the point of death, by the wound which he had lately received: yet was hee not inexorable to the Campans; as having loved them well in former times, and having given his daughter in marriage to that Pacuvius. of whom we spake before. But this facilitie of his Colleague, made Fuluius the more haltie in taking vengeance: for feare, left, vpon the like respects, the Roman Senate might proue more gentle, than he thought behouefull to the common safetie, and honour of their state. Wherefore he tooke the paines, to ride by night vnto Theanum, and from thence to Gales: where hee caused all the Campan prisoners to suffer death; binding them to flakes, and foourging them first agood while with rods; after which he ftruck off their heads.

This terrible example of vengeance, which the Carthaginians could not hinder. made all Townes of Italie the leffe apt to follow the vaine hope of the Campans: and bred a generall inclination, to returne vpon good conditions to the Roman lide. The Atellans, Calatines, and Sabatines, people of the Campans, that in the former change had followed the fortune of Capua, made also now the like submission, for very fear, and want of abilitie to refift. They were therefore vsed with the like rigour, by Fuluim: who dealt fo extremely with them all, that he brought them into desperation. Wherefore some of their yong Gentlemen, burning with fire of reuenge, got into Rome: where they found meanes by night-time, to fet on fire fo many houses, that a great part of the Citie was like to have beene confumed. The beginning of the fire in divers places at once, argued that it was no cafualitie. Wherefore libertie was proclaimed vnto any flaue, and other fufficient reward vnto any free man, that should discouer who those Incendiaries were. Thus all came out : and the Campans, being detected by a flaue of their owne (to whom, aboue his libertic promifed, was given about the fumme of an hundred markes) had the punishment answerable to their deferts. Fulging hereby being more and more incenfed against this wretched people, held them in a manner as prifoners within their walls: and this extreme feueri-tic caufed them at length to become Suppliants vnto the Roman Senate; that fome period might be fet vnto their miferies. That whereupon the Senators refolued in the end, was worse than all that which they had suffered before. Only two poore women in Capua (of which one had beene an Harlot) were found not guiltie of the late rebellion. The rest were, some of them, with their wives and children sold for flaues, and their goods confiscated; others laid in prison, and reserved to further defolation: but the generalitie of them, commanded to depart out of Campania by a certaine day; and confined vnto feuerall places, as best liked the angrie Victors. As for the Towne of Capna, it was fuffered to fland, in regard of the beautic and commodious fite: but no corporation, or forme of politic, was allowed to be therein: only a Roman Prouest was euerie yeare sent, to gouerne ouer those that should inhabit it, and to doc justice. This was the greatest act, and most important, hitherto done by the people of Rome, after many great loffes in the present warre. After this, the glorie of Hannibal beganne to shine with a more dimme light, than before : his oile being farre spent, and that, which should have revived his slame, being vnfortunately flied: as shall be told in place convenient.

How the Carthaginians, making a partie in Sardinia and Sicil, held warr against the Romans in those Hands; and were ouer-come.

Hileft things paffed thus in Italie; the commotions raised in Sardinia and Sicil by the Carthaginians and their friends, were brought to a quiet and happie end, by the industrious valour of the Romans. The Sardimian rebellion was great and fudden; about thirtie thousand being vo in armes, ere the Roman forces could arrive there to suppresse it. One

Hir/icor as with his sonne Hiostus, mightie men in that Iland, were the Ring-leaders; being incited by Hannoa Carthaginian, that promifed the affiliance of his Countrie. Neither were the Carthaginians in this enterprise so carelesse, as in the rest of their maine undertakings, about the fame time. Yet it had beene better, if their care had beene directed vnto the profecution of that maine bufineffe in Italie; whereon this, and all other hopes depended. For it would have fufficed, if they could have hindred the Romans from fending an Armie into Sardinia. Harfeor as with his followers might well enough have ferued to drive out Q. Matius the Pretor; who lay fick no in the Province; and not more weake in his owne bodie, than in his traine. But whileft they fought reuenge of that particular injurie, whereof the fenfe was most grieuous; they neglected the opportunitie of requiting those that had done them wrong, and of the securing themselves from all injuries in the future. Their fortune also in this enterprise was such; as may seeme to hade discouraged them from being at the like charge, in cases of more importance. For where as they sent ouer Aldrubal, Surnamed the bald, with a competent fleet and armie; affifted in this Expedition by Hanno the Author of the rebellion, and by Margo a Gentleman of the Barchine house, and neare kinsman to Hannibal: it so fell out, that the whole fleet by extremitie of foule weather was cast upon the Baleares; so beaten, and in such euill 20 plight, that the Sardinians had even spent their hearts, and were in a manner quite vanguished, ere these their friends could arrive to succour them. Titus Manlius was fent from Rome with two and twentie thousand foot, and twelve hundred horse, to settle the estate of that Hand, which he had taken in, and annexed vnto the Roman Dominion, long before this, in his Confulfnip. It was a laudable cuftome of the Romans, to preferue and vp-hold in their feuerall Provinces. the greatnesse and reputation of those men, and their families, by whom each Prouince had beene first subdued vnto their Empire. If any injurie were done vnto the Provincialls; if any grace were to be obtained from the Senate; or whatfoener accident required the affiftance of a Patron: the first Conqueror, and his race after 40 him, were the most readie and best approved meanes, to procure the benefit of the people subdued. Hereby the Romans held very sure intelligence in enery Province, and had alwaies in readinesse fit men to reclaime their Subjects, if they fell into any fuch diforder, as would otherwise haue required a greater charge and trouble. The comming of Manlius, retayned in obedience all that were not alreadic broken too farre out. Yet was Harficor as fo strong in field, that Manlius was compelled to arme his Marriners: without whom he could not have made up that number of two and twentie thousand, whereof we have spoken before: He landed at Calaris or Carallis. where mooring his ships, he passed vp into the Countrie, and sought out the Enemie. Hyestus, the sonne of Harsicoras, had then the command of the Sardinian Ar-50 mie left vnto him by his father, who was gone abroad into the Countrie, to draw in more friends to their fide. This yong Gentleman would needes adventure to get honor, by giving battaile to the Romans at his owne diferetion. So bee rafhly aduentured to fight with an old Souldier: by whom he received a terrible overthrow; and loft in one day about thirtie thousand of his followers. Hyostus himselfe, with the rest of his broken troupes, got into Cornus, the chiefe Towne of the Island: whither Manlius pursued them. Very soone after this defeature came Astrabal with his Carthaginians: too late to winne all Sardinia, in fuch hafte as he might have done. if the tempest had not hindred his voiage; yet some enough, and strong enough to faue the Towne of Cornus, and to put a new spirit into the Rebells. Manlius herevpon with-drew himselfe back to Calaris: where he had not staied long, ere the Sardinians (fuch of them as adhered to the Roman partie) craued his affiftance; their Countrie being wasted by the Carthaginians, and the Rebells, with whom they had refused to joyne. This drew Manlius forth of Calaris: where if he had staied a little longer. Marubal would have fought him out with fome blemish to his reputation. In But the fame of Afdrubal and his companie, appeares to have been greater than was their firength. For after some trial made of them in a few skirmishes; Manlius aduentured all to the hazard of a battaile: wherein he flew twelue thousand of the enemics: and tooke of the Sardinians and Carthaginians three thousand. Foure houres the battaile lasted : and victorie at length fell to the Romans, by the flight of the Islanders; whose courages had beene broken in their unprosperous fight, not many daies before. The death of yong Hyoftue, and of his father Harficorus, that flew himselfe for griefe, together with the captivitie of Afdrubal himselfe, with Mago and Hanno the Carthaginians; made the victoric the more famous. The vanquished Armie fledinto Cornus: whither Manlius followed them; and in fhort space wanne 20 the Towne. All other Cities of the Isle that had rebelled, followed the example of Cornus, and yeelded vnto the Roman: who impoling vpon them fuch increase of tribute, or other punishment, as best forted with the nature of their seuerall offences, or their abilitie to pay, returned back to Calaris with a great bootie, and from thence to Rome: leaving Sardinia in quiet.

The warre in Sicil: was of greater length, and every way more burdensometo Rome: as also the victorie brought more honour and profit; for that the Romans became thereby not only fauers of their owne, as in Sardinia; but Lords of the whole Countrie; by annexing the Citie and Dominion of Syracufe, to that which they enjoyed before. Sooneafter the battaile of Canne, the old King of Syracuse died: who had continued long a ftedfast friend vnto the Romans; and greatly relieued them in this present warre. He left his Kingdome to Hieronymus his grand-child, that was about fifteene yeares of age; Gelo his fonne, that should have beene his heire, being dead before. To this yong King his fuccesfor, Hiero appointed fifteene tutors: of which the principall were Andronodorus, Zoilus, and Themistius; who had maried his daughters, or the daughters of Gelo. The rest were such, as he judged most likely to preserve the Kingdome, by the same arte, whereby himselfe had gotten and so long kept it. But within a little while; Andronodorus, waxing wearie of fo many Coadjutors, beganne to commend the sufficiencie of the yong Prince, as extraordinarie in one of his yeares; and faid, that he was able to rule the Kingdome without helpe of any Protector. Thus by giving over his owne charge, he caused others to doe the like : hoping thereby to get the King wholly into his hands ; which came to passe in a fort as hee defired. For Hieronymus, laying afide all care of gouernement, gaue himselfe wholly ouer to his pleasures: or if he had any regard of his Royall dignitic, it was only in matter of exterior shew, as wearing a Diademe with ornaments of purple, and being attended by an armed guard. Hereby he offended the eyes of his people; that had neuer feene the like in Hiere, or in Gelo his fonne. But much more he offended them, when by his infolent behauiour, futable to his outward pompe, he gaue proofe, that, in course of life, he would reviue the memorie of Tyrants deadlong face, from whom he tooke the patterne of his habit. Hee grew proud, 50 luftfull, cruell, and dangerous to all that were about him : fo that fuch of his late Tutors as could escape him by flight, were glad to line in banishment: the rest, being most of them put to death by the Tyrant; many of them dying by their owne hands, to avoid the danger of his displeasure, that seemed worse than death it selfe.

Only Andronodorus, Zoilus, and one Thrafe continued in grace with him, and were his Counfailers, but not of his Cabinet. Thefe, howfocuer they agreed in other points, were at fome diffension about that maine point, of adhering, either to the Romans, or to the Carthaginians. The two former of them, were wholly for the Kings pleafures, which was fet on change; but Thrafo, having more regard of his honour and profit, was very earnest to continue the amitie with Rome. Whilest as vet it remained fomewhat doubtfull, which way the King would incline : a confoiracie against his Person, was detected by a groome of his; to whom, one Theodorus had broken the matter. Theodorus hereupon, was apprehended, and tormented; thereby to wring out of him the whole practife, and the names of the vidertakers. Long it was ere he would speake any thing; but yeelding (as it seemed) in the end. vntothe extremitie of the torture; he confessed, that he had beene set on by Thraso: whom he appeached of the treason, together with many more, that were neare in loue or place vnto Hieronymus. All these therefore were put to death, being innocent of the crime wherewith they were charged. But they that were indeede the Confoirators, walked boldly in the ftreets, and neuer farunke for the matter; affuring themselues, that the resolution of Theodorus would yeeld to no extremitie. Thus they all escaped, and soone after found meanes to execute their purpose. The King himfelfe, when Thrase was taken out of the way, quickly resolued upon siding with the Carthaginians; whereto he was very inclinable before. Yong men, when first they grow Masters of themselves, loue to seeme wifer than their fathers, by taking different courses. And the liberalitie of Hiero to the Romans, in their great neceffitie, had of late beene fuch, as might have beene termed excessive; were it not in regard of his prouidence; wherein hee tooke order for his owneestate, that depended ypon theirs. But the yong Nephew, taking little heede of dangers farre off; regarded only the things present; the weakenesse of Rome; the prevalent fortunes of Carthage; and the much monie that his grand-father had laied out in vaine, to shoulder vp a falling house. Wherefore he dealt with Hannibal: who readily entred into good correspondence with him; that was maintained by Hippocrates & Epicides, 20 Carthaginians borne, but grand-children of a banished Syracusian. These grew into fuch favour with Hieronymus, that they drew him whither they lifted. So that when Applus Claudius the Roman Pretor, hearing what was towards, made a motion of renewing the Confederacie, betweene the People of Rome and the King of Syracule; his Mellengers were dismissed with an open scoffe. For Hieronymus would needes have them tell him, the order of the fight at Canna; that hee might thereby learne how to accommodate himselfe: saying, That he could hardly beleeve the Carthaginians; fo wonderfull was the victorie as they reported it. Haujng thus dismissed the Romans, he fent Embaffadors to Carthage, where hee concluded a league: with condition, at first, that a great part of the Island should be annexed to his Domini-40 on; but afterward, that hee should raigne over all Sicil; and the Carthaginians rest fatisfied, with what they could get in Italie. At these doings Ap. Clandius did not greatly stirre: partly for the indignities that were offered; partly for that it behoued northe Romans, to entertaine more quarrells, then were enforced upon them by neceffitie; and partly (as may feeme) for that the reputation, both of himfelfe, and of his Citic, had received fuch blemish, by that which hapned vnto him in his journie, as much discountenanced him when he came into Sicil, and forbad him to looke big. The money that Hiero had bestowed upon the Romans, wherewith to relieue them in their necessitie, this Appius was to carrie back vnto him: it being resused by the Roman Senate, with greater brauerie than their present fortune would allow. But to in fleed of returning the monie with thanks, as he had beene directed, and as it had beene noised abroad that hee should doe : the warre against Philip King of Macedon (whereof we have spoken before) compelled the Romans to lay aside their vaine glorie, and fend word after him, that he should configne that monie over to Marcus beare the charge. This was done accordingly: and hereby Claudius (which name in the whole continuance of that Familie, is taxed with pride) his errand was changed, from a glorious often atton of the Roman magnanimitie; into fuch a pittrull tume of thank fgiuing, as must needes have bred for row and commisseration, in so true a friend as Hiero; or, if it were deliuncted after his death, matter of pastime and scorne, in Meropyman the new King.

But whilest Hieronymus was more desirous of warre, than well resoluted how to beginne it: his owne death changed the forme of things, and bred a great innouation in the state of Syracuse; which thereby might have prospered more than ever, had it beene wifely governed. Hippocrates and Epicides, of whom we spake before, 10 were fent about the Countrie with two thousand men; to follicite the Townes, and perfwade them to shake off their obedience to the Romans. The King himselfe with an Armie of fifteene thousand horse and foot, went to Leontium, a Citic of his owne Dominion: hoping that the fame of his preparation, would make the whole Island fall to him in all halte, and accept him for Soueraigne. There the Conspirators tooke him on the sudden, as hee was passing through a narrow street; and rushing betweene him and his guard, strooke him dead. Forthwith libertie was proclaimed: and the found of that word fo joy fully answered by the Leontines, that the guard of Hieronymus, had little courage to reuenge their Masters death. Yet for scare of the worst, a great largesse was promised vnto the Souldiers, with rewards vnto their 20 Captaines; which wrought foeffectually; that when many wicked acts of the murdered King were reckoned up; the Armie, as in detellation of his bad life, suffered his carkaffe to lie vnburied. These newes, ranne quickly to Syracuse: whither some of the Conspirators, taking the Kingshorses, posted away; to signific all that had paffed; to flirre vp the people to libertie; and to prenent Andronodoris, if he, or his fellowes would make offer to vourpe a Tyrannie. The Syraenfians hercupon presently tooke Armes; and made themselves masters of their owne Citie. Andronodorus on the other fide fortified the Palace, and the Ifland : being yet vncertaine what to doe; betweene delire of making himselfe a soucraigne Lord, and seare of suffering punishment, as a Tyrant, if his enterprise miscarried. His wife Demarata, that was 30 the daughter of Hiero, cherished him in his hopes; putting him in minde of that well knowne Prouerbe, which Dionysius had vsed; That a Tyrant should keepe his place, till he were haled out of it by the heeles, and not ride away from it on horfe-back. But feare, and better counfaile prevailed fo farre: that Andronodorus, having flept vpon the matter; diffembled his affections, and deferred his hope, vnto better opportunitie. The next day he came forth, and made a speech vnto the People : telling them; That hee was glad to fee, how prudently they behaved themselves in so great a change; that he had flood in feare, leaft they would not have contained them felues within bounds of discretion; but rather have sought to murder all without difference, that any way belonged to the Tyrant; and that fince he beheld their order- 40 ly proceeding, and their care, not to rauish their libertie perforce, but to wed it vnto them for euer; he was willingly come to them forth of his strength, and surrendred vp the charge, committed vnto him, by one that had beene an euill Master, both to him and them. Hereupon great joy was made; and Pretors chosen (as in former times) to gouerne the Citie; of which Andronodorus was one, and the chiefe. But fuch was his defire of Soueraignetie: and so vehement were the infligations of his wife; that shortly he beganne to practife with Hippocrates, Epicides, and other Captaines of the Mercinaries: hoping to make himselfe strong, by their helpe, that were least pleased with the change. Hippoerates and Epicides, had beene with the Syracustan Pretors, and told them, that, being fent from Hannibal to Hieronymus, they according to to instructions of their Captaine, had done him, whilest he lived, what service they could; and that now they were defirous to returne home. They requested thereforethat they might be friendly dismissed and with a convoy; that might keepe them from falling into the hands of the Romans, and fet them fafe at Locri. This was cafily eafily granted: both for that the Syracufian Magistrates were well contented to earne thankes of Hannibal, with fuch a little curtefie; and for that they thought it expedient, to rid their Towne quickly of this troublesome couple; which were good fouldiers, and gratious with the Armie, but otherwise lewed men. It was not the defire of these two Sicilians, to be gone so hastily as they made shew: they were more mindfull of the businesse, for which Hannibal had sent them. Wherefore they insinuated themselves into the bosoms of such as were most likely to fill the armie with tumult: especially of the Roman fugitiues, and those that had cause to mistrust what should become of themselves, when the Romans and Syracusians were come to agreement. Such instruments as these, Andronodorus had great neede of: as also of many other, to helpe him in his dangerous attempt. Hee found Themistius, that had married Harmonia the fifter of Hieronymus, readie to take his part; as being carried with the like passions of his owne, and of his wife. But in seeking to increase the number of his adherents; he reuealed the matter to one, that reuealed all to the rest of the Pretorsa Hereupon it followed, that he, and Themistius, entring into the Senate, were flaine out of hand: and afterward accused to the People, of all the cuill which they had done, whilest Hieronymus lived, as by his authoritie; and now since attempted, in feeking to viurpe the tyrannie themselves. It was also declared that the daughters of Hiero and Gelo, were accessarie to this dangerous treason: and that the viquiet spirits of these women, would neuer cease to worke, vitill they had recouered those Royall ornaments, and Soucraigne power, whereof their familie was now disposses These daughters therefore of Hiero and Gelo, were also condemned to die and executioners prefently fent by the enraged people to take away their lines. Demarata, and Harmonia, had perhaps deferued this heavie fentence : but Heraclea, the daughter of Hiero, and wife of Solippus, being altogether innocent; was murdered together with her two yong daughters, in the haltie execution of this rash judgement. Her husband Solippus was a louer of the Common-wealth; and in that refrect to hated by Hieronymus, that being fent Embaffador to King Ptolemie, &c. he durst not returne home: but staied in Egypt as a banished man. This consideration, when it was too late, together with fome other pittiful accidents accompanying the flaughters of affected the multitude; that (pardoning themselves) all cryed out vpon the auchors of fo foule a butcherie. Being thus incenfed against the Scnate: and knowing not otherwise how to satisfie their anger; they called for an ele-Aion of new Pretors, in the roome of Andronodorus and Theraistius, that were lately flaine; meaning to substitute such in their places, as the Senators should have little cause to like. At the election were present a great rowt, not only of the poorer Citizens, but of fouldiers that pressed into the throng. One of these, named Epicides Pretor: another named Hippocrates: and the leffe that the old Pretors and Senators approved this nomination, the more cager was the multitude; and by a generall 40 crie forced them to be accepted. These being made Pretors, did what they could to hinder the agreement that was in hand, betweene the Syracustans and the Romans. But having striven in vaine, and seeing that the People stood in searc of Ap. Claudius, and of Marcellus, that was lately come into Sicil; they gaue way vnto the time, and suffered the old league of Hiero to be reconfirmed; which afterward they purposed to diffolue by practife. The Leontines had fome neede of a Garrison: and to them was fent Hippocrates the Pretor sattended, by fuch fugitives, and mercinarie fouldiers, as were most burdensome to Syracuse. Thither when he came, hee beganne to doe many acts of hostilitie against the Romans: first in secret, afterward more openly and boldly. Marcellus, rightly understanding the purpose of these two brethren, sent 50 word vnto the Syracusians, that they had alreadic broken the league; and that the peace would neuer be kept fincerely, vntill this turbulent paire of brethren were expelled the Island. Episides, fearing to fustaine the blame of his brothers proceedings, and more defirous to fet forward the warre, than to excuse any breach of peace; went himselfe vnto the Leantines, whom he perswaded to rebell against the Syracu-

fans. For he faid, that fince they had all of late ferued one Mafter; there was little reason why the Leantines should not be enfranchised by his death, as well as the Syracustans; yea or much rather, all things considered; since in their streets the Tyrant was flaine, and libertic first proclaimed. Wherefore, fince they of Syracuse were not contented, to enjoy the freedome purchased among the Leantines; but thought it good reason, that they should beare Dominion oner those that had broken the chaine, wher with both the one, and the other were bound : his aduice was, that fuch their arrogancie should be checked betimes, ere it could get any colour of right by prescription. Hereunto occasion was given by one article of the league. made of late by the Romans and Syracusians. For it was agreed, That all which had been 10 Subject to HIERO and HIERONYMVS, Should henceforth, be Vassals unto the State of Syracu/e. Against this article, if the Leantines would take exception, and thereby challenge their owne due; Epicides told then, that in this noueltie of change, they had fit opportunitie to recouer the freedome, which their fathers had loft not many ages before. Neither was it vnreasonable, which this craftie Carthaginian propounded; if the Leontines had beene subdued by the same hand, which tooke libertie from the Syracustans. But seeing they had long since yeelded vnto Syracuse, and been fubject vnto that Citie, by what forme focuer it was governed; this claime of libertie was rather scasonable than just. Neuerthelesse the motion of Epicides was highly approved in fo much that when meffengers came foone after from Syracufe, 20 to rebuke the Leontines, for that which they had done against the Romans; and to denounce vnto Hippocrates and Epicides, that they should get them gone either to Locri. or whither elfe they lifted, fo that they staied not in Sicil: word was returned. That they of Leantium had not requested the Syracusians, to make any bargaines for them with the Romans, nor thought themselves bound to observe the covenants, which others without warrant had made in their names. This peremptoric answere, was forth-with reported vnto Marcellus by the Syraculians: who offered him their affistance in doing justice vpon the Leontines their Rebells; with condition that when the Towne was taken, it might be theirs againe. Marcellus required no better fatisfaction: but forth-with tooke the businesse in hand; which he dispatched in one 20 day. At the first affault, Leontium was taken; all faue the Castle, hybereinto Hippoerates and Epicides fled; and stealing thence away by night conveice themselves into the Towne of Herbesus. The first thing that Marcellus did, when hee had wonne the Towne, was the same, which other Roman Captaines ysed after victorie; to fecke out the fugitive Roman flaves and renegados, whom he caused all to die: the rest both of the Townsmen and Souldiers, he tooke to mercie; for bearing also to thrip or spoile them. But the same of his doings was bruted after a contrarie fort. It was faid, that he had flaine, Man, Woman, and Ghild, and put the Towneto fack. These newes met the Syracusian Armie vpon the way, as it was going to joyne with Marcellus, who had ended his businesse before. About eight thousand Mercinaries 40 there were, that had beene sent forth of Syracuse, under Sosis and Dinomenes two of the Protors, to forue against the Leontines and other Robells. These Captaines were honest men, and well affected to their Countrie; but the fouldiers that followed them, had those diseases, with which all mercinaries are commonly infected. They tooke the matter deeply to heart, that their fellow-fouldiers (as now they termed those against whom they went) had beene so cruelly butchered and hereupon they fell to mutinie; though what to demand, or with whom to be angrie, they could not tell. The Pretors therefore thought it best, to turne their vinquiet thoughts another way, and let them aworke in some place elfe; for as much as at Leontium there was no neede of their feruice. So toward Herbefus they marched: where lay 50 Hippocrates and Epicides, the architects of all this mischiefe, denising what further harme they might doe; but now fo weakely accompanied, that they feemed vnable to cleape the punishments belonging to their offences past. Hereof the two bretheren were no leffe well aware ; and therefore adventured you a remedie litle leffe desperate desperate than their present case. They issued forth of Herbesus ynarmed, with oline branches in their hands, in manner of suppliants; and so presented themselves to the Armie. Sixe hundred men of Creete were in the vantguard; that had been well vied by Hieronymus; and some of them greatly bound vnto Hannibal; who had taken them prisoners in the Italian warre, and louingly dismissed them. These cretans therefore welcomed the two bretheren, and bad them be of good cheare; faving, that no man should doe them harme, as long as they could vie their weapons. Herewithall the Armie was at a stand; and the rumor of this accident, ranne swiftly from man to man, with generall approbation. The Pretors thought to helpe the matter by feueritie; which would not ferue. For when they commanded thefe two Traitors to be laid in yrons: the exclamation was so violent against them, that faine they were to let all alone, and returne, vncertaine what course to take, vnto Megara; where they were lodged the night before. Thither when they came, Hippocrates denifed a trick; whereby to helpe himfelfercand better the vncertaine cafe wherein he stood. He caused letters of his owne perming, to be intercepted by some of his most trustie Cretans; directed (as they made shew) from the Syracusian Pretors, to Marcellus. The contents hereof were. That Mircellus had well done, in committing all to the fword among the Leontines: but that it farther behoued him, to make the like dispatch of all the Mercinaries belonging to Syracuse; which were offentiue, all of them in generall, to the libertie of the Citic, and the peace with Rome. When this counterfait Epiftle was openly rehearfed the vprore was fuch. that Solis and his fellow Pretor, were glad to for fake the campe, and flie for their lines. All the Syracusians remayning behinde, had been cut in pecces by the enraged fouldiers, if the two artificers of the fedition had not faued their lives; rather to keepe them as pledges, and by them, to winne their friends within the Towne, than for any good will. They perfwaded also a mischiguous knaue that had setued among the Leontines, to justifie the bruit of Marcellus his crucitie; and to carrie home the newes to Syracule, as an eve-witnesse. This incensed not only the multitude, but fome of the Senate: and filled the whole Towne with causelesse indignation. In a good time (faid fome) was the auarice and crueltie of the Romans detected who had they in like fort gotten into Syracufe, would have dealt much worfe; where their greedic appetites might have beene tempted with a farre greater bootic. Whilest they were thus discourling, and deuiling how to keepe out the wicked Romans, Hippocrates with his Armie came to the gates's exhorting the Citizens to let him in vnleffe for want of helpe, they would be betraied to their enemies. The Pretors with the best and wifest of the Senate, would faine have kept him out; but the violence of the fouldiers to force a gate, was no whit greater, than the head-strong furie of those within the Towne; that laboured to breake it open. So he entred, and immediately fell vpon the Pretors; whom (being for faken by all men) he put to the fword, and 40 made flaughter of them and their followers untill night. The next day he went openly to worke: and after the common example of Tyrants, gaue libertie to all flaues and prisoners; and being fortified with adherents of the worst and basest fort, made himselfe and his brother Pretors, in Title, but in effect, Lords of Syracule. า ได้ที่ประกอบ เป็นสายเป็น When Marcellus was advertised of this great alteration, hee thought it no time

CHAP. 2. S.15. of the Historie of the World.

When Morellus was aductified of this great alteration, hee thought it no time for him to it fill, and attend the further titlie: He first Embaffadours to Syneighes; that were not admitted into the Hauen, but chafed out as enemies. Then drew hee neare with his Armie: and lodging within a mile and a ball for the Towns, fort bee fore him, fome to require a parke. These were entertained without the walls by not two new Pretors: to whom they declared, That the Romans were come thicher, not with purpofe to doe burr, but in fauout of the Syzaulifans, which were oppressed by Tyrauts; and to punish those, that had murdered and banished so many of the principall Citizens. Wherefore they required, that those worthiemen, their Confederates, which were chafed our of the Towne, might be fusfered to returne and enjoy their owne; as also that the Authors of the great flaughter lately committed. might be delinered vp. Hereto Epicides briefly answered, That if their errand had beene to him, he could have told what to fay to them: but fince it was directed vnto others, they should doe well to returne, when those to whom they were fent, had the government in their hands. As for the warre which they threatned hee told them, they should finde by experience, that to besiege Syracule was an other manner of worke, than to take Leontium: Thus hee fent them gone; and returned back into the Citic. Immediately beganne the fiege, which endured longer than the Romans had expected. The quick and easie winning of Leontium did put Marcellus in hope, that follong a circuit of walls, as compaffed Syracule, being manned with re no better kinde of Souldiers, than those with whom hee had lately dealt, would in some part or other, be taken at the first assault. Wherefore he omitted no violence or terrour in the very beginning; but did his best, both by Land and Sea. Neuertheleffe all his labour was disappointed; and his hope of prevailing by open force, taken from him by the ill successe of two or three of the first assaults. Yet was it not the vertue of the Defendants, or any strength of the Citie, that bred such despaire of haltie victorie. But there lived at that time in Syracuse, Archimedes the noble Mathematician : who at the request of Hierothe late King, that was his kinsman, had framed fuch engines of warre, as being in this extremitie put in vie, did more mischiese to the Romans than could have beene wrought by the Canon, or any instruments of Gunne-powder; had they in that age beene knowne. This Archimedes discoursing once with Hiero, maintained, That it were possible to remove the whole earth out of the place wherein it is, if there were some other earth, or place of fure footing, whereon a man might fland. For proofe of this bold affertion, he performed fome strange workes; which made the King entreat him to connert his studie vnto things of vie; that might preserve the Citie from danger of enemies. To fuch Mechanicall workes, Archimedes, and the Philosophers of those times, had little affection. They held it an injurie done vnto the liberall sciences, to submit learned Propolitions, vnto the workemanship, and gaine, of base handicrasts men. And of this opinion Plate was an author: who greatly blamed fome Geometricians, that 20 feemed vnto him to profane their science, by making it vulgar. Neither must wee rashly taske a man so wise as Plato, with the imputation of supercilious austeritie, or affected fingularitie in his reprehension. For it hath beene the vnhappie fate of great inventions, to be vilified, as idle fancies, or dreames, before they were published; and being once made knowne, to bee under-valued; as falling within compasse of the meanest wit; and things, that every one, could well have performed. Hereof (to omit that memorable example of Columbus his discoucrie, with the much different forts of neglect, which hee vnder-went before and after it,) in a familiar and most homely example, we may fee most apparent proofe. He that lookes vpon our Englifb Brewers, and their Servants that are daily exercised in the Trade; will thinke 40 it ridiculous to heare one fay, that the making of Malt, was an invention, proceeding from some of an extraordinarie knowledge in natural Philosophie. Yet is not the skill of the inventors any whit the leffe, for that the labour of workmanship growes to be the Trade of ignorant men. The like may be faid of many handicrafts: and particularly in the Printing of Bookes; which being deuised, and bettered, by great Scholers and wife men, grew afterward corrupted by those, to whom the practise fell; that is, by fuch, as could flubber things eafily ouer, and feede their workemen at the cheapeftrate. In this respect therefore, the Alchymists, and all others, that baue, or would sceme to have any secret skill, whereof the publication might doc good ento mankinde, are not without excuse of their close concealing. For it is a 50 kinde of injuffice, that the long travells of an understanding braine, beside the losse of time, and other expence, should be cast away you men of no worth; or yeeld leffe benefit ento the Author of a great worke, than to meere firangers; and perhaps his enemies. And furely, if the passion of Enuie, have in it any thing allowable and naturall, as have Anger, Feare, and other the like Affections : it is in some such case as this; and serveth against those, which would vsurpe the knowledge, wherewith God hath denied to endue them. Neuertheleffe if we have regard vnto common charitie; and the great affection that enery one ought to beare vnto the generalitie of mankinde, after the example of him that suffereth his Sunne to fine won the init and uninst: it will appeare more commendable in wife men, to enlarge themfelnes, and to publish vnto the world, those good things that lye buried in their own bosomes. This ought specially to be done, when a profitable knowledge hath not annexed to it fome dangerous cunning; that may bee peruerted by cuill men to a mischieuousvie. For if the fecret of any rure Antidot, contained in it the skill of gining fome deadly and irrecoverable poyfon: better it were, that such a jewell remaine close in the hands of a wife and honest man; than being made common bind all men to y fe the remedie, by teaching the worst men how to doe mischiefe. But the workes which Archimedes published, were such as tended to very commendable ends. They were engins, feruing vnto the defence of Syracufe; not fit for the Syraculians to carry abroad, to the hurt and oppression of others. Neither did he altogether publish the knowledge, how to vie them, but referred so much to his own direction; that after his death more of the same kinde were not made, nor those of his owne making were employed by the Romans. It fufficed vnto this worthy man, 20 that hee had approved, even vnto the vulgar, the dignitie of his Science; and done especiall benefit vnto his Countrey. For to enrich a Mechanicall trade, or teach the

Marcellus had caused certaine of his Quinquereme Gallies to be fastened together, and Towers erected on them, to beat the defendants from the wall. Against these, Archimedes had fundrie deuices; of which any one fort might have repelled the affavlants: but all of them together shewed the multiplicitie of his great wit. He shot heavie stones and long peeces of timber, like vnto the yards of ships; which brake some of the Gallies by their force and weight. These afflicted such as lay farre off. They that were come nearer the walls, lay open to a continual voly of thot, which 20 they could not endure. Some with an yrongraple were taken by the prow and hoifted vp; shaking out all the men; and afterward falling downcinto the water. Some by strange engins were lifted vp into the ayre; where turning round a while, they were broken against the walls, or cast vpon the rockes : and all of them were so beat ten, that they durft neuer come to any second affault. In like fort was the Land-armic handled. Stones and timber, falling vpon it like Haile; did not onely ouerwhelme the men, but brake downe the Roman engins of battery; and forced Marcellus to give over the affault. For remedie hereof it was conceived, that if the Romans could earely before day get neere vnto the walls: they should be (as it were) under the point blanck, and receive no hurt by these terrible Infiruments; which 40 were woond up hard to shoote a great compasse. But this vaine hope cost many of the affavlants lines. For the shot came downe right upon them; and beating them. from all parts of the wall, made a great flaughter of them, all the way as they fled, (for they were vnable to flay by it) even till they were gotten very farre off. This did fo terrific the Romans; that if they perceived any peece of timber, or aropes end, vpon the walls, they ranne away, crying out, that Archimedes his engins were readie to discharge. Neither knew Marcellus how to overcome these difficulties, or to take away from his men, that feare; against the cause whereof he knew no remedie. If the engins had stood vpon the walls, subject to firing, or any such annoyance from without; he might have holpen it by some deuice, to make them vnserso niceable. But all or the most of them were out of fight; being erected in the streets behinde the walls; where Archimedes gaue directions how to vie them. Wherefore the Roman had none other way left, than to cut off from the Towne all prouifion of victualls, both by Land and by Sea. This was a desperate peece of worke,

For the enemies hauing 60 goodly an Hauen; the Sea in a manner free; and the Carthagnians: that were fitting by Sea, willing to fupply them: were not likely fo foone to be confumed with famine; as the beficegers to be wearied our; by lying in Leaguer before fo fitting a Citie; hauing no probabilitie to carrie it. Yet, for want of better counfell to follow, this was thought the beft, and most honourable counfe.

In the meane while, Himileo, Admirall of a Carthaginian fleet, that had waited long about Sicil, being by Hippocrates aduertifed of these passages, went home to Carthage; and there so dealt with the Senate, that five and twentie thousand foot, threethousand horse, and twelue Elephants, were committed vnto his charge; 10 wherewith to make warre voon the Romans in Sicil by Land. Hee tooke many Townes: and many, that had anciently belonged vnto the Carthaginians, did yeeld vnto him. To remedie this mischiese, and to stay the inclination of men, which following the current of Fortune, beganne to turne vnto the Carthaginians; Marcellus with a great part of his Armie, role from Syracule, and went from place to place about the Island. Hee tooke Pelorus and Herbesus, which yeelded vnto him. He tooke also Megara by force and sackt it: either to terrific others that were obftinate, especially the Syracusians; or else because Rome was at this time poore, and his Armic must have somewhat to keepe it in heart. His especiall desire was to have faued Agrigentum: whither hee came too late; for Himileo had gotten it before. 20 Therefore he returned back toward Syracufe; carefully, and in as good order as he could, for feare of the Carthaginian that was too firing for him. The circumfpe-Ction that he vsed, in regard of Himileo; stood him in good stead, against a danger that he had not mistrusted. For Hippocrates, leaving the charge of Syracuse vnto his brother, had lately iffued out of the Citic, with ten thousand foot and fine hundred horse; intending to joyne his forces with Himileo. Marcellus fell vpon him, ere either was aware of the other: and the Romans, being in good order, got an easie victoric, against the dispersed and halfe vnarmed Syracusians. The reputation hereof helped a little to keepe the Sicilians from rebellion. Yet it was not long, ere Himileo. joyning with Hippocrates, ranne over all the Island at his pleasure; and presented battaile to Marcellus, euen at his Trenches, but the Roman wifely refused it. Bomilear alfo a Carthaginian, entred with a great fleet into the Hauen of Syracufe; and victuailed the Citie. After this, the disposition of the Islanders changed so againe; that although another Legion was come from Rome, which escaped from Himileo, and fafely arrived at Marcellus his campe: yet many places revolted vnto the Carthaginians; and flue or betraied the Roman Garrisons.

In the midft of these troubles. Winter enforced both parts to take breath awhile: and Marcellus leaving some of his Armie before Syracule, that he might not seeme to have given over the fiege, went vnto Leontium; where he lay intentine to all occasions. In the beginning of the Spring he stood in doubt, whether it were better to 40 continue the laborious worke of belieging Syracufe; or to turne all his forces to A-grigentum, against Himileo and Hippocrates. But it would greatly have impaired his reputation, if he had gone from Syracufe, as vnable to prevaile: and he himfelfe was of an eager disposition, euer viwilling to give ground, or to quit, as not faisible, an enterprise, that he had once taken in hand. Hee came therefore to Syracuse: where though he found all the difficulties remaining as before; and no likelihood to take the Citie by force or famine; yet was hee not without hope, that continuance of time would bring forth somewhat, which might fulfill his defire. Especially hee affaied to prevaile by treason; against which no place can hold out. And to this end, he dealt with the Syracufian Gentlemen that were in his campe; exhorting them to 50 practife with their friends that remained in the Citie. This was not calie for them to doe; because the towne would hearken to no parlee. At length a slave vnto one of these banished men, making shew to runne away from his Master, got into Syracuse; where he talked in private with some few, as he had beene instructed. Thus beganne Marcellus to have intelligence within the Citie: whence the Conspirators yied to fend him aduertisement of their proceedings, by a fisher-boat that passed forth in the night: But when they were growne to the number of fourescore, and thought themselves able to effect somewhat of importance : all was discovered; and they, like Traitors, put to death. In the meane while; one Damasippus a Lacedamonian, that had beene fent out of the Towne as an Embaffadour to Philip King of Macedon, was fallen into the hands of Marcellus. Epicides was very desirous to ransome him: and many meetings were appointed for that purpole, nor farre from the walls. There, one of the Romans, looking vpon the wall, and wanting the more compendious arte of Geometrie, fell to numbring the stones; and, making an estimate of the height, judged it leffe than it had beene formerly deemed. Herewith hee acquainted Marcelluse who causing better notice to be taken of the place, and finding, that ladders of no extraordinarie length would reach it; made all things readic, and waited a convenient time. It was the weakest part of the Towne, and therefore the most strongly garded : neither was there hope to prenaile by force against Archimedes if they failed to take it by surprise. But a fugitive out of the Towne brought word, that a great feast was to be held vnto Diana, which was to last three dayes: and that, because other good cheare was not so plentifull within the Citic, as in foron mertimes, Epicides, to gratifie the People, had made the more large distribution of wine. A better opportunitie could not bee wished. Wherefore Marcellus, in the dead of the festivall night, came vnto the walls; which he tooke by Scalado. Syracuse was divided into foure parts (or five, if Epipele were reckoned as one) each of which were fortified as diffinet Gities. When therefore Marcellus had gotten some pecces, he had the commoditie of a better and fafe lodging, with good store of bootie; and better opportunitie than before, to deale with the rest. For there were now a great many, as well of those in Acradinia and the Island, inner parts of the Towne, as of those that were alreadie in the hands of Marcellus, that beganne to hearken vnto composition; as being much terrified by the losse of those parts, which the Romans o had taken and fackt. As for the weapons of Archimedes, little harme, or none they did, vnto those, that were sheltred vnder strong houses: although it may seeme that the inner walls were not altogether vnfurnished of his helpe; since they held out a good while, and were not taken by force. The Roman fugitiues, and Renegados, were more carefull than ever to defend the rest of the Citie: being sure to be rewarded with a cruell death, if Marcellus could preuaile. Hippocrates and Himileo, were daily expected; and Bomilear was fent away to Carthage, to bring helpe from thence. It was not long ere Hippocrates and Himileo came : who fell vpon the old camp of the Romans, whilest Epicides fallied out of Acradina vpon Marcellus. But the Romans made such desence in each part, that the Assailants were repelled. Neuerthelesse, 40 they continued to befet Marcellus: whom they held in a manner as streightly befieged, as he himselfe did besiege the Towne. But the pestilence at length consumed, together with the two Captaines, a great part of the Armie, and caused the rest to diflodge. The Romans were (though fomewhat leffe) afflicted with the fame peftilence, in so much that Bomilear died put the Citie of Carthage in hope, that he might be taken where he lay, if any great forces were fent thither. This Bomilear wanted no desire to doe his Countrie service : but his courage was not answerable to his good will. He arrived at Pachynus with a ftrong fleet : where he staied; being loath to double the Cape; for that the windes did better serue the enemie than him-Thither failed Epicides out of Syracufe: to acquaint him with the necessities of the 50 Citie; and to draw him on, With much intreatie, at length hee came forward: but meeting with the Roman fleet, that was readic for him, he flood off into the deepe; and failed away to Tarentum, bidding Sicil farewell. Then durft not Epicides returne into Syracufe, but went to Agrigentum: where he expected the iffue; with a very faint hope of hearing any good newes.

The Sicilian fouldiers, that remained aline of Hippocrates his Armie, lay as neare as they could fafely, vnto Marcellus; and some of them, in a strong Towne three miles off. These had done what good they could to Syracuse, by doing what hart they could vnto the Romans. But when they were informed, that the state of Sicil was given as desperate by the Carthaginians: they sent Embassadours to treat of peace; and made offer to compound, both for themselues, and for the Towne: Hereunto Marcellus willingly gaue care : for he had staied there long enough; and had cause to seare, that after a little while, the Carthaginians might come thither ftrong againe. He therefore agreed, both with the Citizens, and with the Souldiers that lay abroad; That they should be Masters of their owne, enjoying their libertie and proper lawes; yet fuffering the Romans to possesse, whatsoever had belonged vnto the Kings. Hercupon they, to whom Epicides had left his charge, were put to death; new Pretors chosen; and the gates euen readie to be opened vnto Marcellus: when fuddenly the Roman fugitiues disturbed all. These perceiuing their owne condition to be desperate, perswaded the other Mercinarie souldiers, That the Citizens had bargained only for themselves, and betraied the Armie to the Romans. Wherefore they prefently tooke armes, and fell upon the new-chosen Pretors: whom they flue; and made election of fixe Captaines that should command ouer all. But shortly it was found out, that there was no danger at all to the souldiers; excepting only the fugitiues. The treatie therefore was againe fet on foot, and wanted little of conclusion: which yet was delaied; either by some scare of the Citizens, that had feene (as they thought) proofe of the Roman avarice in the fack of Epipole, Tyche, and Neapolis, the parts alreadic taken; or by some defire of Marcellus to get the Towne by force, that hee might vie the libertie of a Conqueror, and make it wholly subject vnto Rome. Mericus a Spaniard was one of the fixe Captaines . that had beene chosen in the late commotion: a man of such faith, as vsually is found in Mercinaries : bolding his owne particular benefit aboue all other respects. With this Captaine, Marcellus dealt secretly: having a fit instrument, of the same Nation.one Belligenes; that went in companie with the Roman Embassadours, daily passing too and fro. This craftic Agent, per fwaded Mericus, That the Romans had alreadic gothome in Spaine, or any where elfe; it was now the only time to doe it; by conforming himselfe to the will of the Roman Generall. By such hopes the Spanish Captaine was easily wonne : and sent forth his owne brother among the Syracusian Embaffadours, to ratifie the couenant with Marcellus. This under-hand dealing of Marcellus against the Syracusians, cannot well be commended as honest: neither was it afterwards throughly approued at his comming to Rome. For the benefits of Hiero to the Romans had beene fuch, as deferued not to be required with the ruine of his Countrie: much leffe, that the miferies of his people, oppressed (though partly through their owne follie) by an Armie of Mercinaries, should minister vnto the people of Rome, advantage against them. The poore Citizens could not make good their parts against the hired souldiers; and therefore were faine to yeeld vnto the time, and obey those Ministers of Hannibal, that ruled the Armie. But as long as they were free after the death of Hieronymus; and now of late, when they had gathered courage by the flight of Epicides : it had been their chiefe care to maintaine amitie with the people of Rome. They had lately flaine many the principall of Epicides his followers; and many of themselves had also been flaine, both lately and in former times, because of this their desire vnto the peace. What though it were true, that the Rascalitie, and some ill aduised Persons, joyned with the Souldiers in hatred of the Romans, by occasion of the slaughter which they so heard to be done at Leontium, and afterward beheld in those parts of their owne Citie which was taken? Ought therefore the Roman Generall, in a treatie of peace held with the Syracufians, to make a bargaine under-hand against them, with a Captaine of the Mercinaries ? These things were objected against Marcellus, at his returne home. But the Senators, thought it a great dealebetter, to comfort the Senators culians with gentle wordes, and promifes of good viage in time to come; than to restore the bootie, and give over the Dominion of a Citie, fo great, wealthie, strong, and many waies important. Neuertheleffeif we confider the many incommences and great mischiefes, whereunto Syracuse was obnoxious; both by cuill neighbours. and by that very forme of politie, after which it was governed; wee may truly affirme. That it received no small benefit, by becomming subject vnto Rome. For thereby it was not only affured against all forraine enemies, domesticall conforracies. and fuch T yrants as of old had raigned therein : but freed from the necessitie of banishing, or murdering, the most worthie Citizens, as also from all factions, intesting feditions, and a thouland the like miferies; that were wont to grow our of the icalousie, wherein they held their libertie in vaine. Neither enjoyed that Citie, from her first foundation, any such long time of happinesse, as that wherein it flourished. when it refted fecure vider the protection of Rome; and was no more molefled, by the disease of ambition; whereof by Marcellus his victorie it was throughly cured. But fuch benefit, arifing from wrongs done, ferues not to make injuffice the more excufable : vnleffe we should approve the answere of that Theefe, who being found to have follen a filter cup from a fick man, faid, He never leaves drinking.

By the treason of Mericus, the Roman Armie was let into possession of all Syracuse: no wherein, the bootie that it found, was faid to have beene no leffe, than could have beene hoped for, if they had taken Carthageat felfe; that maintained warre by Land and Sea against them. All the goodly works and Imageries, wherewith Syracule was miruailoufly adorned, were carried away to Rome; and nothing left vintouched; faue only the houses of those banished men, that had escaped from Hippocrates and Epicides, into the Roman campe. Among other pittifull accidents; the death of Archimedes, was greatly lamented even by Marcellus himfelfe. He was fo buffe about his Geometrie, in drawing figures, that he hearkned not to the noise, and appropriette the Citie; no, nor greatly attended the rude Souldier that was about to kill him! Marcellus tooke heavily the death of him; and caused his body to bee honourably 20 buried. Vpon his Tombe (as he had ordained in his life time) was placed a Cylinder and a Sphere, with an infeription of the proportion betweene them; which hee first found out. An Invention of solittle vie, as this may seeme, pleased that great Artift better, than the deuiling of all those engines, that made him so famous. Such difference is betweene the judgement of learned men, and of the vulgar fort. For many an one would thinke the monie loft, that had been frent young fonne, whose fludies, in the Vniuerlitic had brought forth fuch fruit, as the proportion betweene a Sphere and a Cylinder.

After the taking of Syracufe, all the Townes in Sicil yeelded vnto the Romans; except Agricentum and a few places thereabout. At Agrigentum lay Epicides with 40 one Hanno a Carthaginian, and Mutines an African, that was lately fent from Hannibal. This Mutines, by many good peeces of feruice, had added some credit to the beaten Carthaginian fide; and withall made his owne name great. By his perswasions, Hanno and Epicides adventured to meet Marcellar without the Towne, and not behaue themselves as men expecting to be besitged. Neither was hee more valiant in counfell, than in execution. Onceand againe he fet vpon the Romans, where they lay encamped ; and droue them fearefully into their Trenches. This bred enuie in Epicides and Hanno: especially in Hanno, that having been clately sent from Carthage, with commission and authoritie from the State, thought himselfe wronged greatly by Hannibal; in that he had fent onto him this Mutines, to be his Companion, and to take vpon him, like as good a man as himfelfer. The indignitic feemed the greater, when Mutines, being to frep afide vnto Heraelea, for the pacifying of some troubles there among the Numidians; advised (as directing Hanno and Epicides) not to meddle with the enemic, vntill his returne. So much therefore the rather would Hanno fight: and offered battell vinto Marcellus, before be fought it. It is like, that a great Xxxxx 3 part of the Roman Armie was left behinde in Syratufe, as neede required : which made the Carthaginians the better able to deale with those that came against them. But what soeuer disproportion was betweene the two Armies; farregreater were the oddes betweene the Captaines. For howfoeuer the people of Carthage would giue authoritie by fauour; yet could they not giue worth, and abilitie, in matter of warre. The Numidians, having before conceived some displeasure against their Cantaines : and being therefore some of them gone away to Heraelen ; were much more offended, when they faw that the vaine-glorious enuic of Hanno carried him vnto the fight, vpon a foolish defire to get victories, without the helpe of Mutines their Countriman. Wherefore they fent vnto the Roman Generall, and bad him be confident : for that it was not their purpose to shew themselves his enemies that day : but only looke on, and see the proud Carthaginians well beaten, by whom they had beene missed. They made good their promise; and had their desire. For Marcellus, finding likelihood of truth in their meffage, did folluftily fet vpon the Enemies, that he brake them at the first charge; and with the slaughter of many thousands.

If Hanne could have beene contented, to follow the directions of one, that was a better man of warre than himselfe, and not have hazarded a battaile without nee de: the Romans would shortly have been reduced into termes of great difficultie in their Sicilian warre: For Marcellus, was shortly after to leave the Province; and soone 20 vpon his departure, there landed in the Iland a supply of eight thousand foot . and three thousand Numidian horse, that were sent from Carthage. The same of this new Armie drew many of the Sicilians into rebellion. The Roman Armie, consisting (for the most part) of the Legions of Canne, tooke it very hainously, that no good feruice done, could bring them into the fauour of the Senate; but that, as ba nished men, they were fent farre from home, and not fuffered to returne back to Ronze with their Generall. Mutines had pacified his Countrimen the Numidians, and, like an honest man, did the best that he could for those whom he scrued, without contending against the foolish pride of Hanno; finding that there was a greataker ation; and a greater might have beene, if the Armielately ouerthrowne had beene entire. 20 M. Cornelius, the Roman Pretor, vsed all diligence, both to pacifie his owne: men. and to hinder the Carthaginians. He recovered those inland Townes that had rebelled : and though he could not hinder Mutines from ouer-running all the Countrie; vet hee hindred the Countrie from revolting vnto Mutines. Aboue threescore Townes, great and small, the Carthaginians held in Sicil: of which, Agrigentum was the principall; and farre bigger than any of the rest. Thence issued Mutines as often as he pleased, in despight of the Romans: not only to the succour of his owne adherents; but to the great waste of those that followed the contrarie part. But Hanno, in stead of being pleased with all these good services, was filled more and more with enuie, against the man that performed them. He had (belike) received instru-Ctions from old Hanno at Carthage; not to fuffer Hannibal, or any Hannibalian, to have thare in the honour of these Sicilian warres: which were therefore perhaps the more diligently supplied; whilest Italie was neglected, that should have beene regarded more then all the rest. Wherefore, to shew his authoritie, and that it was not in the power of Hannibal, to appoint vnto him an Affistant, or Director: Hee tooke away from Mutines his charge, and gaue it to his owne sonne; thinking thereby to discountenance the man, and make him little esteemed, as one out of Office, among his Numidians. But it fell out quite contrarie: and this spightfull dealing, occasioned the loffe of what societhe Carthaginians held in Sicil. For the Namidians were so incenfed by the indignitie offered vnto their Countriman, being such a braue Com- 50 mander, that they offered him their feruice to requite the wrong; and were thenceforth absolutely at his owne disposition. M. Valerius Lauinus, the Roman Consul. was newly come into the Prouince, when this fell out : and with him did Mutines enter into intelligence. For he could no longer brooke these indignities: but being, neither a Carthaginian, nor favoured by those that bore all the sway in Carthage; He thought it the wifest way, to play the best of his owne game, and for fake that Citie, which was likely to perish by the euill counsell that gouerned it. He did not therefore, as his Countrimen had lately done, content himfelfe to fee his Aduerfaries reape the bitter fruits of their owne malicious ouer-weening; and to fuffer that harme, in doing whereof he would not beare a part; but conspired against them, to deliuer vp Agrigoniup, and to helpe to expell them viterly out of Sieil. The Conful was glad of hisfriendship; and earefully followed his aduertisements. Neither was there much cunning needfull, to the performance of that which Mutines to had under-taken. For he with his Numidians did forcibly feize vpon a gate : whereatthey let in some Roman Companies, that lay neare in a readinesse for the purpose. Hanno, when first he heard the noise, thought it had beene no worse matter, than fome fuch rumult of the Numidians, as hee had beene well acquainted with of late. But when, making hafte to pacifie the trouble, he faw and heard, the Romans intermixed, among those discontented followers of Matines, forth with he betooke himfelfeto flight : and fatting him felfe, with Epitides, in a small Barke, fet faile for Afrike; leaving all his Armie and Adherents in Siell to the mercie of the Romans, that henceforward continued mafters of the whole Iland.

Lauinus the Conful having taken Agrigentum, did sharpe execution of justice 20 vpon all the Citizens. The principall of them hee fcourged with rods, and afterwards beheaded, as was the manner of the Romans : all the rest of them he fold for flaues, and confiscated their goods; sending home to Rome the monie that was raifed of the bootie. This was indeede a time, wherein Rome flood in no leffe necessitic of gold, than of feele: which may have beene the reason, why Leilinus dealt so cruelly with the Agrigentines. Neuertheleffe the fame of fuch seueritie bred a terrour among all the Dependants of the Carthaginians; fo that in great hafte they fought to make their peace. About fourtie Townes yeelded themselves quickly vnto the Romans: twentie were delivered up by Treason; and fixe only staied to be wonne by force. These things done, Leninus returned home to Rome : carrying 20 with him about foure thousand men from Agairma; that were a companie of outlawes, bankrouts, and banished men, accustomed to live by spoile of others, in these troublesometimes. He bestowed them about Rhigiam in Italie, where they might exercise their occupation against the Brutians; a thecuish kinde of people, that were enemies vnto those of Rhegium, and to the Rhimans. As for Mutines , hee was well rewarded, and made Citizen of Rome: where hee lived in good accompt; accompanying the two Scipioes in their journie against Antiochus, and therein doing (as it is faid) very especial feruice. So by this enterprise of Sicil, the Carthaginians wasted much of their forces, that with greater profit might have been emploied in Italie : leaving yet vnto the Romans, in the end of this warre, the entire poffellion 40 of this Iland; which they wanted when it beganne.

į. XVI.

How the warre paffed betweene the Romans and H ANN I BAL in Italie, from the taking of Capua to the great victorie at Methorns.

Hortly after the winning of Capus, Mareellus came to Rome: where, for his good feruices done in the fland of Sieil, hee had granted vinto him the honour of the leffer Triumph; which was called Ovation. The greater Triumph was denied him : because he had not finished the warre, but was faine to leave his Armie behinde him in the Prouince. Heeftaied not long in Rome, before hee was againe chosen Consul together with M. Valerius Lauinus, who succeeded him in the gouernement of Sicil, and was, at the time of his election, making warre against King Philip in Greece. Great complaint was made against the Conful Marcellus, by the Syraculians, for that which he had done vnto them : they alledging their great friendship to the people of Rome, in the time of their late King Hiero; and affirming, that their Citie did neuer willingly breake the alliance, excepting when it was oppressed by such Tyrants, as were not greater enemies to Rome, than to all good men that lived in Syracuse. The Conful, on the other fide, reckoned up the labours and dangers whereunto they had put him : willing them to bemoane themselves to the Carthaginians that had holpen them in their necessitie; and not vnto the Romans whom they had kept out. 10 Thus each part having fome good matter to alleage, the Senate made fuch an end of the controuerfic, as best agreed with the benefit of their owne Commonwealth: blaming the too much rigour of Marcellus; yet not reftoring the bootie that he had taken, nor making the Syracusans free from their subjection; but comforting them. with gentle wordes, and hopefull promifes, as hath been shewed before. The two new Confuls, Marcellus and Levinus, were appointed to make warre, as their lots should fall out; the one in Italie; the other in Sicil. The Isle of Sicil, fell vnto Marcellus: which Province he willingly changed with his Colleague; to the end that the Syraculians (whose cause had not as yet beene heard in the Senate) might not seeme hindred by feare, from vttering their grieuances freely. Afterwards, when his bu- 20 finefle with them was dispatcht, hee gently, undertooke the patronage of them: which remained long in his Familie; to the great benefit of their Countrie in times following. So Valerius, the other Conful, was fent into Sicil, whose doings there haue beene alreadie rehearled : but Marcellus was emploied against Hannibal.

Before the Confuls departed out of Rome, they were much troubled with preffing of Souldiers to the warre; and most of all, with getting Marriners for their Nanie. They were all of the poorer fort, that yied to be emploied in Sea-fervices; efpecially in rowing. These could not live without present wages : neither was there monie enough in the Treasurie to give them pay: Wherefore, it was ordained that they should be set out at the expense of pringte men; who, in this necessitie of the state, were driven to suitaine all publike charges. Hereat the People murmured: and were readie to fall into fedition; had not the Gonfuls deferred the matter vnto further confideration. The Senate could illtell, what to determine or doc, in a cafe of such extremitie. For manifest it was, that the multitude had alreadic endured so much, as well it could vnder-goe; and formewhat more, than could with honeflie haue been imposed upon it. Neuerthelesse it was impossible to maintaine the warre. against the Carthaginians, or to keepe the Macedonian out of Italie, without a strong fleet. Wherefore, some were of opinion; That; since the common Treasure was fo emptie, the people must be forced, by right or wrong, to take the burden vpon them. At last the Confuls beganne to say, That no perswasions would be so effectue at all with the people, as good examples and that if the Senators would follow the Confuls, like it was, that the Peoplealfo would follow the Senate. Wherefore they propounded, and it was immediately concluded, That every one of them should bring forth, and put into the Treasurie, all the monie that be had; and that no Senator should keepe any vessell of gold, or plate whatsoever; excepting one salt-seller, and a bonle wherewith to make their offerings vnto the Gods: as also a Ring for himselfe, with such other tokens of ingenuitie for his wife and children, as cuerie one did vse, and those of as small value as might be. This aduice of the Consuls was not more thankfully accepted by the Senate athan the readie performance thereof by the Senate was highly applauded; and hastily followed by the Gentlemen of Rome. Neither did the Commonaltierefuseto doe that, which their betters had openly done before them. For fince the publike necessitie could no otherwise be holpen; euery one was contented, that his private effate should runne the same fortune with the Common-wealth; which if it suffered wrack, in vaine could any particular man hope to enjoy the benefit of his proper fubstance. This magnanimitie described well that greatnesse of Empire, whereof it was the foundation.

Convenient order being thus taken for an Armie and Fleet: Marcellus went forth of the Citic against Hannibal; and Lauinus toward Sicil. The armie of Hannibal was greatly diminished, by long and hard service: neither did his Carthaginians seeme to remember him, and thinke your fending the promifed supply, or any such proporrion as he needed. His credit also among his Italian friends, was much weakned, by the loffe of Capua: which gaue them cause to looke vnto themselues; as it in his helpe there were little truft to be reposed, when they should fland in neede. This he well perceived; yet could not tell how to remedie. Either he must thrust Garrison; into all Townes that he suspected, and thereby so diminish his armie, that he should not becable to keepe the field for elfe hee must leave them to their owne sidelitie. which now beganne to waver. At length his jealousie grew so outragious, that he facked, and watted, those places that he was vnable to defend : thinking that the belt way to enrich himselse; and make unprofitable, to his enemies, the purchase from which he could not hinder them. But by this example, many were quite alienated from him; and some of those, whom before he had least cause to doubt. The towne of Salapia yeelded vnto Marcellus: and betraied vnto him agallant Regiment of Numidian horse, the best of all that served under Hannibal; which was a greater losse, then the Towne it felfe, Blassus the author of this rebellion; could not bring his defire to effect: without getting the confent of one Dafina, that was his bitter enemie. Wherefore he brake the matter to this Dasius in private; and was by him accused vnto Hannibal. But when he was convented, and charged of Treason, he so south denied it, and by way of recrimination, to vehemently preffed his accuser with the same fault; that Hannibal thought it a matter deuised out of meere malice; knowing well what enemies they were; and feeing, that neither of them could bring any proofe of what he affirmed. This not with standing, Blafius did not cease to presse his aduerfarie anew, and vrge him from time to time, with fuch lively reasons; that hee who could not be believed by Hannibal, was contented at length to winne the favour 20 of Marcellus. Presently after this, the Consul tooke by force, Maronea and Meles, Townes of the Samnites: wherein hee flew about three thousand of Hannibal

Hannibal could not looke to all at once : but was faine to catch advantages, where he might get them; the Romans now being growne stronger in the field than hee. The best was, that his Carthaginians, having wearied themselves with ill speede in many pettie enterprises, and laid afide all this while the care of Italie, to follow busineffe of farreleffe importance; had now at length refolued, to fend prefently the great fupply, that had beene so long promised and expected. This if they had done in better leason; Rome it selfe might haue beene strucken downe, the next yeare af-40 ter that great blow received at Canna. But fince that which is past cannot be amended: Hannibal must force himselfeto make a good countenance; and tell his followers, that this mightic succour would come time enough. For Masanissa was at Carthage with five thousand Numidians, readie to set saile for Spaine : whither when hee came, it was appointed, that Afdrubal should forthwith take his journie into Italie: of which there had beene so long talke. These newes did not more comfort Hannibal and his followers, than terrifie the Romans. Wherefore each did their best: the Romans to preuent the threatning mischiefe, and winne as much as they could vpon Hannibal, before the comming of his brother; Hannibal, on the contrarie, to hold his owne, and weaken the Romans as much as he was able. He had intelligence. that Cn. Fuluius, a Roman Pretor, lay neare unto Herdonea to get the Towne by praclife. It was not long, fince, neare vnto the fame place, another Cn. Fuluius had lost his armie. Therefore Hannibal made great marches thitherward; and came to Herdonea ere Fuluius heard newes of his approch. As soone as he came, he offered battaile to the Roman Pretor: who accepted it with more halte than good speede. The Roman Legions made good refistance awhile, till they were compassed round with the Carthaginian horse. Then fell they to rowt; and great flaughter was made of them. Fuluius himselfe, with twelve Tribunes or Coronells, were lost: of the common fouldiers that were flaine, the number is vncertaine; fome reporting feuen, others thirreene thousand. The Towne of Herdones, because it was at point to have yeelded vnto Fuluius, Hannibal did fet on fire: and putting those to death that had practifed with the Enemie, carried away the multitude; whom hee bestowed among the Thurians and Metapontines. The Conful Marcellus hearing of this, wrote vnto the Senate; and exhorted them to be of a good cheare; for that he would shortly abate the enemies pride. He followed the Carthaginan apace : and ouer-taking him at 10 Numifire in the countrie of the Lucans, fought with him a battaile: which beginning at nine of the clock in the morning, lasted vntill night; and ended, by reason of the darkneffe, with vncertaine victorie. Afterward Hannibal departed thence into Apulia, whither Marcellus followed him. At Venusia they met, and had many skirmilhes; but none of importance. Hannibal remoued often; and fought to bring the enemic within danger of some ambush. But Marcellus, though he was very cager of battaile, would yet aduenture nothing, but by open day-light and voon faireground. Thus passed the time away, vntill Q. Fabius Maximus, and Q. Fuluius, he that lately had taken Capua, were chosen Consuls. Fabius, considering how much the Reman 20 affaires were bettered by the taking of Capua, purposed that yeare to besiege Tarentum: which if he could winne; like it was, that scarce one good Citie would afterwards remaine true to Hannibal. Wherefore he vehemently exhorted his Collegeue. and Marcellus, (to whom was continued the command of those Legions that served under him the yeare before) to preffe the Carthaginian fo hard, as he might have no leisure to helpe Tarentum. Marcellus was very glad of this charge: for hee thought no Roman fitter than himselfe, to deale with Hannibal in open field. Hee followed him therefore to Cannussium, and thence from place to place : desiring euer to come to battaile, but vpon equal termes. The Carthaginian had not minde to hazard much in fight ; but thought it enough to entertaine his enemie with skirmilh ; as 20 being desirous to keepe his Armiestrong untill the comming of Afdrubal. Yet could he not avoide the importunitie of Marcellus; nor brooke the indignitic of being daily braued. He therefore bade his men to be luftie, and to beat foundly this hot-spirited Roman Captaine, that would neuer fuffer them to be at quiet; vntill they once had cooled well his courage, by letting him bloud. Hereupon followed a battaile: wherein Hannibas had the victorie; tooke fixe Enfignes; and flue of the Romans almost three thousand, among which were some of marke. Marcellus was so impatient of this dishonour, that he rated his men, as Pesants, and base cowards: telling them, that they were the first of the Roman Legions, which had beene beaten by Hannibal, by plaine force and manhood; without being circumvented by any fira- 40 tageme. With these, and many other the like wordes, which they were ashamed to heare, he did fo vexe them; that thinking themselves better able to endure any violence of the enemie, than fuch displeasure of their Generall; they befought him to pardon them, and leade them forth once agains to fight. He did fo : and placing those Companies formost, that had lost their Ensignes the day before, bade them be carefull to winne a victorie; whereof the newes might be at Rome, before the report of their shamefull ouerthrow. Hannibal was angrie, to see that nothing could make this Enemie quiet : and therefore was readie to fight againe, fince all other motiues continued the same, and his men had beene heartned by the late victorie. But the Romans were stirred up with desire of reuenge, and of repairing their honor 50 loft, which affections gave a sharpe edge vnto their valour: whereas the Carthaginians were growne dull, and wearie by feeing themselves disappointed of their hope; and the enemie, not with standing their late victorie, as readie to molest them as before. In this second battaile Marcellus got the victorie : which hee purchased at so deare a rate; that neither he; nor Hannibal, had great cause to yount, the second night. For if eight thousand of the Carthaginians were flaine, and three thousand of the Roman fide, in this next battaile, the difference was no greater, than euen to recompence the late received overthrow: especially fince the number of the Romans that were wounded, was fo great, as disabled Marcellus from pursuing Hannibal; who dislodged by night. Neuerthelesse it sufficed, that Fabius the Consul hereby gor leisure, to follow his businesse at Tarentum without any disturbance. Q. Fuluius the other Conful, about the same time, tooke in many of the Hirpines, Lucans, and Valleenies, that willingly yeelded themselves, and betraied the Garrisons of Hannibal that lay in their Townes: whom Fuluius entertained in louing fort; gently rebuking them for their errours past, without punishing those that had been authors. or buffe doers in the rebellion. That rabble of Sicilian theeues, which Leuinus had lately brought from Agaterna, was then also set on worke to be siege Caulonia, a towne of the Brutians : and nothing was omitted, that might ferue to divert Hannibal, from the fuccour of Tarentum.

Q. Fabius the Conful, having taken Manduria a Towne of the Salentines, fate downe before Tarentum: making all preparation that seemed needfull to carrie it, either by affault or long fiege. Of the Garrisons in the Towne a good part were Brutians, placed there by Hannibal, under a Captaine of their owne Nation. This Captaine fell in loue with a Tarentine wench; whose brother served vnder Fabius. Hereof, thee gaue notice by letters to her brother, as thinking belike to draw him from the Roman fide; by telling him how rich, and of what great accompt her louer was. But her brother made the Conful acquainted with these newes : and faid, that if the Brutian were farre in loue, he might perhaps be wonne, by intreatie of his Miltris, to doe what shee would have him. The Gonsul hearing this: and finding likelihood in the matter, willed his fouldier to convey himselfe into the Towne as a fugitiue; and trie what good might be done. It fell out, according to his desire. The Souldier grew acquainted with this Brutian Captaine : and partly by his owne perswasions, partly by the flattering entreatie of his fifter; wanne him to betray the Towne to the Romans. When they had agreed upon the bulinefle, and resolued how to order it; the same souldier got out of the Towne by night, and acquainted the Gonfal with his proceedings: telling him, in which part that Bruthan kept watch, and what might conveniently be done. So in the night time, Fabris gave an alarme to the Citie; especially about those parts of the wall, which were farthest from the place where he meant to enter. The Captaines in the Towne, prepared to make refistance in those places, where the noise did threaten them with greatest likelihood of danger. But Pabius himselfe, with the choice of his men, came in great silence to the quarter of the Brutians : who being wrought by their Captaine , helped the Romans to get vp, and breake open the next gate; whereat the Armie was let in. The An Tarentines, and Carthaginian fouldiers, made head against Fabius in the Market place: but (as hapneth in like cases, where the maine confidence is alreadie taken away) not very obstinately. Nico, Democrates, and Philemenes, with those that before had let in Hannibal, vied now the last of their courage in dying against the Romans. Carthalo, who commanded the Garrison within the Towne, offered himselfe prisoner : hoping to be well vied, because of hospitalitic that had passed betweene his Father and the Conful. But he was flaine by the way, ere he could come at Fabius. The Romans did put all indifferently to the fword in fuch fort; that they spared few of the Brutians. This flaughter of the Brutians, was thought to have been made by appointment of the Conful, to the end that he might feeme to have wonne the Towne by force and not by treason: though he thereby failed of his purpose; and neither had the glorie which he expected, non preserved his reputation of faithfull dealing, and keeping his word. The bootie found in Tarentum was very great : whereof the Roman Treasurie, whither it was carried, had great neede. As for the Imageries, and other curiofities that were in the Citie, Fabius was contented to let them alone : and being told of some Idolls, that seemed worthie to be carried away, being very goodly peeces, in fuch habit and posture as if they were fighting; he faid, let vs leaue vnto the Tarentines their angric Gods.

Hannibal being gotten cleare from Marcellus, fell vpon those that belieged Canlonia. They fled at his comming : but he was so neare, that they were faine to betake them to a Hill; which ferued to no other purpose, than to beare off the first brunt. There they defended themselves a litle while, and then they yeelded. When this businesse was done, he hasted away to relieve Tarentum. But when hee came within fine miles of the Citic, he had newes that it was loft. This griened him : vet he faid no more than this ? The Romans have also their HANNIBAL; wee have loft Tarentam in fuch fort as we got it. That he might not feeme to turne back amafed. or in any feare of the victorious Conful; he incamped a few daies together, so neare as he was vnto Tarentum : and thence departing to Metapontum, bethought himselfe how to take Fabius in a trap. He caused the chiefe of the Metapontines to write vnto Fabius, and offer to betray into his hands, the Carthaginian Garrison; with condition, that he should in that respect, forgive them all offences past. These letters were fent by two yong men of the fame Citie; who did their errand fo well. that the Conful wrote back by them vnto the Metapontines, and appointed the day. when they should expect him. Hereof Hannibal was exceeding glad; and at good leifure, made readic his ambulhes for the warie Fabins. But whether fome fecret no- 20 tice of the plot were ginen; or whether indeede (asit is related) fome tokens in facrificing, terrified the superstitious Roman; the journie to Metapontum was deferred. Hercupon the same two Messengers were emploied againe; but being apprehended. and threatned with torture, they discouered all.

This yeare was happie to the Romans, in all their warres : for they got every where; faue only at Caulonia; where they loft a companie of fuch lewd fellowes, that it may feeme good fortune, to have so beene rid of them. But their common pouertie, and disabilitie to maintaine their charge, continued, and grew greater than it was before. Thirtie Roman Colonies were then in Italie : of which , twelue refufed to contribute any longer to the warres. For it was confidered; that the Le- 20 gions of Canna, and those vnhappie Companies, that had beene beaten under the one and the other Cn. Fuluius; were transported into Sicil; where they lived, in a fort, as banished men. This grieued their friends at home, and made them reckon up the more diligently those other miseries which they daily felt. Ten yeares together they had beene exhausted with leuies of men, and impositions of monie; inenery of which yeares, they had received some notable overthrow. In this case the least that they could feare; or rather the best which they could hope; was, to fall into the hands of the Enemie to be made prisoners. For Hannibal did gently send home their people that was taken by him : whereas the Romans did banish from their homes, those that had escaped. It was therefore likely to come to passe with- 40 in awhile, that they should be all confumed : since new Souldiers were daily pressed forth of their Townes; and the old ones never did returne. Such talke was frequent among those of the Colonies: especially where they that were transported into Sicil, had most compassionate friends. Wherefore it was concluded by the people of Ardea, Sutrium, Alba, and other good Townes, to the number of twelve, That they should boldly denie vnto the Romans, their farther helpe. This was thought the likeliest way to obtaine peace: whereof otherwise they saw little hope, as long as Hannibal lined. When the Confuls heard the Embaffadors of these townes make fuch declaration, and protest their disabilitie of giuing any farther helpe; they were much amased. They willed the Embassadours to returne home, and bring a 50 better answere, for a smuch as this, was none other than treason: they bade them to consider, that their people were not Campans, or Tarentines, but the off-spring of the Romans; and no leffe partakers of the Empire, than they that inhabited the Mother-Citie. But all would not ferue: the Embaffadours continuing to proteft, that they had already done what they could; and that they had remayning, neither men, nor money. It was well for the Romans, that the other eighteene Colonies did not imitate these twelve; but shewed themselves willing to vodergoe whatsoever should be laved voon them, without shrinking under the burden. This their offer was so highly pleasing to the Consuls; that the Embassadors of those faithfull Colonies, were brought vnto the Senate, and produced into the Affembly of the people; where, with commemoration of all their former good feruices this their present lone vnto the State was magnified, and thankes accordingly bestowed vnon them; with promife, that it should not be forgotten. As for the Embassadors of those twelve Colonies, that refused to contribute; it was thought best, neither to retaine them in the Citie, nor yet to difmiffe them, nor to take any notice of them arall tout leave them to their owne confideration of their ill deferuing.

It may greatly be doubted, what the example of these twelve People would have wrought, in those that were so willing to helpe the State, if Afdrubal had beene then comming into Italie. For then must the Romans have betaken themselves wholly to their owne defence; whereas now, to the great comfort of their subjects, they employed their forces in the conquest of Italie, with hopefull and fortunate successe. Neuerthelesse, they were faine to open their most privie treasurie; and thence take out the golde, that had beene layed up to ferue them in cases of greatest extremitie. Of the money thus extracted, one quarter was delivered to Fabius the Conful, to fet him well out against the Tarentines; all the rest, was sent into Spaine to Scipio, for the maintenance of his Armie; and to prouide, that Afdrudal might not passe from thence into Italie. It is likelie that Fabius did not spend all his money; finding such easic successe at Tarentum as was shewed before. But to stop the journey of Aldrubal, neither the money fent into Spaine, nor any victories wonne by Scipio could fuffice. Neuerthelesse it fell out happily for the People of Rome, that this yeare, and the next, were spent, before his comming; and they better prepared, than at lesse warning they could have beene, to entertaine him. Here it were not amiffe to note, That fince the Romans, being in so great necessitie of money, were driven to surnish on the Armie in Spaine, with the greatest part of all their stocke that was left : it must needes be that either the bootie taken in new Carthage, was farre leffe then fame had reported it; or else that Scipio had not as yet wonne it: how so euer Liuie rather inclines to those, who say that he got it soone after his arrivall.

M.Claudius Marcellus, and T.Quintius Crispinus, were chosen Consuls after Fabius and Fuluius. In their yeare it was, that Afdrubal tooke his journey out of Spaine, though he came not into Italie vntill the yeare following. After the great battaile at Canne. Hannibal had loft much time about Cume and Naples, in feeking to make himselfe Master of a good haven, for the landing of those succours that were promifed from Carthage. The hope that he reposed in Philip, caused him to turne his printo cipall care to the Easterne parts of Italie; where he made readie a faire entrance for the Macedonian if he had been ereadic to come. But fince this hope was vanished. and the long promised succour of Astrabal was (though farre later than had beene expedient) readie to arrive: he began to deale with the people of Hetruria, through whose Countries his brother was to passe, that therein hee might make a partie against the Romans. The losse of Capua, Tarentum, and many other Townes, might have terrified all other of the Italian Townes, from hearkening to any follicitation of the Carthaginians. Yet the pouertie of the Romans, and the wearines of their adherents, together with the fame of a greater Armie comming, than that which Hannibal brought into Italie; did embolden many of the Hetrurians, especially the Aretines, to take fuch counfell as they thought most expedient for themselves; without regard of their fidelitie to Rome. The Roman Senat, hearing the rumour of their conspiracie, lant Marcellus the new chosen Consul into Hetruria: whose comming did so terrifie them, that they rested quiet for a while. All the yeare following they were

denifing how to breake out : as contrariwife the Roman Propretors ; partly by terror of feuere judgements and inquisitions; and partly by the force of two or three Legions, with which they visited all suspected places, kept them honest against their wills; and tooke many Hoftages for better affurance. The two Confuls had an carneft defire, to make firong warre upon Hannibal without more temporifing; perswading themselves, that in battaile they should bee too strong for him. Criffi-200 had further his particular defire, to make his Confulfhip notable by the winning of some good Towne : as Fuluius and Fabius had gotten honour by Capua and Tarentum. Therefore he went about the fiege of Louri; one of the best Cities which the Carthaginian then held in Italie and brought thither all forts of engines; fen- 10 ding for a fleet out of Sicil to helpe him. But Hannibal was not flow to relieue the Citie: the fame of whose approch, made Criffinus desist from his enterprise, and retire vnto his Colleague, that lay at Venusia. Thither followed Hannibal; to whom the Confuls daily offered battaile. This great man of Warre had no neede to fland vpon his reputation: which was alreadie fo confirmed, that his refusing to fight, was not likely to be afcribed vnto feare; but rather deemed as part of his wildome. He entertained the Confuls with many light skirmilhes, and fought to take them at fome advantage; referuing his owne numbers as full as he could, vnto a time of greater emploiment. In this lingring manner of Warre, Charcellus tooke no pleafure: but fought to compell the Enemie to battaile; whether he would or no. The 20 Admirall of the Roman fleet about Sicil, L. Cincius, was commanded againe to affaile the Towne of Locri: which might well enough be forced, if Hannibal continued as he beganne, to trifle away the time at Venusia. To the same purpose a part of the Garrison that lay in Tarentum, was appointed to goe by Land to the affishance of Cincius. But Hannibal had an cic behinde him. He laid an ambush in the way, betweene Tarentum and Local, whereinto the Romans fell; and having loft about three thousand of their companie, were well glad, the rest of them, to quit their enterprife, and faue their owne lines within Tarentum, As for the Confuls, it was the defire of Hannibal, to waite their Armie by little and little; which to doe, hee neeleeted no aduantage. There lay betweene him and them an Hillock, ouer-growne with wood, that feemed fit to couer a number of men: who lying there vindifcerned, might fall vpon fuch, as should straggle from the Roman campe; and cut them off. Therefore he sent thither by night some companies of Manidians: whom he willed to keepe themselues close, and attend their best advantage. To this peece of ground, the Confuls thought it fit to remove their campe: Marcellus thinking that he neuer lay neare enough vnto Hannibal. Thither therefore both of them rode, to view the place, accompanied with the fonne of Marsellus, a few Colonells, and other principall men; and not many more than two hundred horse, most of them Hetrurians. The Numidian Centinell gave warning of their approch to his fellowes: who discouered not themselves, vntill they had surrounded the Consuls 40 and their traine. The Confuls, as necessitie compelled them, defended themselves: hoping to bee quickly relieued from their campe that was neare at hand. But the Hetrurians ranne away from them, at the first : and left them in that great danger, to the weake affiftance of no more than fortie horse-men, that were of the Colonie of Fregelle. These Fregellans abode by the Consuls; and did what they could to have brought them fafe off. But when Marcellus was stricken through with a Lance, and fell downe dead; then beganne every one to shift for himselfe, and escape as they might. Crispinus the other Conful, had his deaths wound, being ftricken with two Darts; and yong Marcellus was likewife wounded; yet thefe two recovered their campe: The rest of the Colonells and Officers; together with the Lictors that carried the bundells of Rods and Axes before the Confuls, were all flaine or taken. To the dead bodie of the Conful Marcellus, Hannibal gaue honourable Funerall, according to the custome of those times; and bestowing bestowing his ashes in a siluer pot, couered it with a crowne of gold; and so sent them to yong Mareellus, to be by him interred, where he thought good.

of the Historie of the World.

Presently after this, Crispinus bethought himselfe, how that the signer Ring of Marcellus, was fallen into the custodic of Hannibal; who might vie it, to his owne purposes, ere that which had hapned were well knowne abroad. Wherefore hee lent word vnto all the Townes about; that his Colleague was flaine, and that Hannibal had gotten his Ring: wilhing them in that regard, to give no credit vnto any letters therewithall figned. This prouidence of Criffinus, was not more than requifite. For his Meffenger was but a little before come to Salapia, when another Melfenger arrived there fent from Hannibal, bringing letters in the name of Marcellus, and sealed with the captine Ring: whereof the contents were, That it was his purpose to come the same night vnto Salapia; where he willed, that the Souldiers of the Garrison should be in a readinesse, for such emploiment as hee should thinke needfull. The device was plaine; and no leffe plaine was the revengefull minde. which he bare against that Citie; because of his braue Numidian companies, that had therein beene betraied. The Salapians hereupon bethought themselves, how to take their Enemie in his owne snare. They sent back the Messenger which was a Roman fugitive; without letting him perceive any figne of diffrust in them. This done, they prepared all things in a readinesse, for the entertainement of such and a friend. Late in the night he came thither; with a troupe of Roman fugitiues, armed Roman like, leading the way. These all talking Latin together, called ynto the Watch, and bade open the gate; for the Conful was there. The gate was opened, faire and leifurely, and the Port-cullis drawne vp no higher than needes it must be, to let them enter. But when fixe hundred of them were gotten in a downe fell the Port-cullis againe: and they that thought to haue taken others, were taken themselves; being laied at on all hands by the Salapians, that quickly made an end with

Hamileal being thus ouer reached with this stratageme, hasted away to Loci; whereun to Cimein the Admirall of the Roman steet about Sicil, did lay hard siege. 30 The first appearance of the Namidian, Hamileal his Vanteur rors, made the Romans, in all confused haste, runne to their ships: leaving all their engines, and what ouer was in their campe, to the enemics disposition. The Roman Senate, hearing of thele accidents, fent vnto Criffinus the furtiuing Conful, and requested him to name a Dictator: that might take charge of the Commonwealth, and dispatch the election of new Magistrates, with other businesse; whereunto himselfe was disabled by his hurts. Hee did so : and soone after died. Then was it thought needfull, that new Confuls should be chosen out of hand: forafmuch as two Roman Armies, lay fo neare vnto the Enemic, without any Generall. Especially it was defired, that election should be made of such men, as were 40 not only valiant, but well admied; fince the best, and most fortunate of their great Darers, M. Marcellus, by loofing himfelfe fo strangely, had given them a faire warning, not to commit their Armie vnto rash heads. Among those that sood for the Consulship, C. Claudius Nero was the most eminent. Hee was of great Nobilitie, a good Souldier, and one, whose many services in this present warre, did forcibly commend vnto the place. Yet he feemed a little too violent; and one, whose temper needed the allay of a more staied wit. The Fathers therefore endeuoured to joyne vnto him in the Confulfhip M. Liuius : one that had borne the same Office, long before. This M. Liuius had beene Gonful with L. Emylius Paulus, in the yeare foregoing the beginning of this warre. After their Confulthip, wherein they did to good feruice, they had both of them been called into judgement by the People : and this Liuius condemned; Æmylius hardly escaping. Though it hath been oncealreadie noted: yet I cannot for beare to remember it againe: how it pleafed God, to vpbraid the vnthankefull Romans, with the malicious judgement, given by their multitude voon honorable men. For in the battaile of Canna, it was apparant, what lamentable effects, the memorie of their injuffice wrought; when L. Amylius rather chofetoyeeld to the froward ignorance of his Colleague; and afterward to die in the greatell ouerthrow, that euer fell vpon the State of Rome, than by relifting the pernicious courses of Terentius Varro, to cast himselfe anew vpon the danger of the popular furie. As for M. Liuius, he is even now readie, and will so continue, to tell the People of their faults in a divers manner. Eight yeares together after his condemnation had hee beene absent out of the Citic, and lived in his Countrie Grange: vexing himselfe with the indignitie of his condemnation. Marcellus and Lauinus, being Confuls two or three yeares agoe, had brought him into Rome : where he liued private, in discontented fort, as might appeare, both by his carelesnesse in apparell, and by the wearing of his long haire and beard; which in that age were the badges of men afflicted. Very lately he was compelled by the Cenfors, to poll his haire, and come into the Senate: where he vied to fit filent, and fignifie his affent or diflike to what was proposed; either in short formall wordes, or in passing from fide to fide, when the house was divided. At length it hapned, that in some businesse weightily concerning one that was his kinfman, he flood vp, and made a fet speech: whereby he drew all the Fathers to attention; and bade them inquire of him, and take better notice, what he was, and what he had beene. The Senate was much altered fince he had left it: many braue men were loft; new ones were chofen; fuch as rather ferued to fill vp the number, than to answere to the dignitic of the place: 20 and they that were left of ancient standing, had even spent their Vertues to no great effect. Wherefore, all beganne to fay; that it was great pittie, so worthie and able a man, as this Linius, had beene all this while forgotten; one, of whom the Common-wealth flood in great neede, yet had not yied, in this dangerous warre. Now feeing that the Confuls ought, one of them, to be chosen a Patrician, the other, of necessitie a Plebeian: and since, neither Fabius, nor Valerius Lauinus, being both of them Patricians, could be joyned with Claudius Nero: enery one was of opinion, that there could not be chosen and coupled together, two fitter men than C. Claudius. and this Marcus Liuius. But Liuie would not endure to heare of this. He faid it was vnreasonable, that one condemned as a dishonest man, should afterwards be chosen 30 Ruler of the Citic. If they had done ill to trust him with one Consulship, what meant they then to offer him another? With these, and the like phrases hee relisted their delires : till by perswasions, and examples rehearsed, of such as had patiently digested injuries done by the People, and repaied good for cuill; he was contented to accept the honour.

Here we may behold a true figure of that Embleme, with which Themistocles checked the ingratitude of the Athenians: refembling himfelfe to a Piane tree, the branches and boughes whereof men breake in faire weather; but runne vnder it for shelter in a storme. Such vnthankfulnesse, to well-deserving men, is not rarely found in the outragious multitude. Neither was the late example hereto much vnlike, of Philip the fecond King of Spaine his dealing with the Duke of Alva. For although he had committed the Duke to prilon, vpon some small offence conceiued, without all regard of his former deferts; yet when his intended conquest of Portugal, required the feruice of a man, more then ordinarily sufficient; he stood no longer upon the scanning of late displeasures; but emploied the same Duke, whom he had newly diferaced. Thus is wisdome often taught by necessitie.

It was a dangerous yeare toward, when C. Claudius Nero, and M. Liuius were chofen Confuls. A [drubal was alreadie come into France, and waited only, to have the waies of the Alpes thawed by warme weather, for his passage into Italie. The Romans vsed at this time the service of three and twentie Legions: and wanted not employ- 50 ment, for many more, if they had knowne how to lenie and maintaine them. Of these which they had, foure served in Spaine, two in Sicil, and two in Sardinia: the rest were so disposed, in severall parts of Italie, where need seemed to require, that only two Legions were left to each of the Confuls. But the Confuls were men of execution; and would not be tied to the punctuall observance of what the Senate thought fit. M. Liuius would not firre out of Rome, against so mightie a power as followed Aldrubal; untill hee had first obtained, that hee might carrie with him as many as could well be spared from other emploiments; and those, or the most of them, chosen Companies: It was true, that two Legions, appointed to serue under Lucius Porcius a Pretor of that yeare, among the Cifalpine Gaules, might be reckoned as an additament to the forces of Liuing; to whom the warre against Aidrubal was alotted. So might also two other Legions, that were among the Salentines, neare unto Tarentum, under another of the Pretors, be accounted a part of Claudius his Armie; that was fent against Hannibal. Neverthelesse the Consuls, by the especiall instance of Linie, did obtaine, that all might be left to their owne discretion. For newes came, that Aldrubal was alreadie passing the Alpes; the Ligarians, who dwelt in the Countrie about Genua, with their Neighbour people, were in readinesse to joyne with him; and L. Porcius fent word, that he would adventure no further, than hee fafely might. When all was ordered, as themselves thought best, the two Consuls went forth of the Citie; each, his feuerall way. The People of Rome were now quite otherwise affected, than they had beene, when L. Amylius Paulus, and C. Tegentius Varra, were fent against Hannibal. They did no longer take you them, to direft their Generalls; or bid them dispatch, and winne the victorie betimes : but rather they flood in scare; least all diligence, wisdome, and valour, should proue too little. For fince few yeares had paffed, wherein some one of their Generalls had not beene flaine; and fince it was manifelt, that if either of these present Confuls were defeated, or put to the worst; the two Carthaginians would forthwith joyne, and make (hort worke with the other: it seemed agreater happinesse than could bee expected, that each of them should returne home Victor; and come off with honour, from fuch mightie opposition, as he was like to finde. With extreme difficultie had Rome heid up her head, ever fince the battaile of Canna: though it were fo, that Hannibal alone, with little helpe from Carthage, had continued the warre in Italic. But there was now arrived another sonne of Amilear; and one, that in his present Expean dition, had feemed, a man of more fufficiencie than Hannibal himselfe. For, whereas in that long and dangerous march, through barbarous Nations, ouer great Riners, and Mountaines, that were thought vnpaffeable, Hannibal had loft a great part of his Armie: this Afdrubal, in the same places, had multiplied his numbers; and, gathering the people that he found in the way, descended from the Alpes like a rowling Snow ball, farre greater than he came over the Pyrenees at his first setting out of Spaine. These considerations and the like, of which scare presented many vnto rhem; caused the People of Rome, to wait vpon their Confuls out of the Towne; like a pensine traine of Mourners: thinking vpon Marcellus and Crispines, vpon whom in the like fort they had given attendance the last years; but faw neither of them re-40 turne alive, from a leffe dangerous warre. Particularly, old Q. Fabius gave his accufromed adulfe to M. Liuius, that he should abstaine from giving, or taking battaile, untill he well understood the Enemies condition. But the Conful made him a froward answere, and faid, That he would fight the very first day : for that he thought it long, till he should either recouer his honour by victorie; or by feeing the ouerthrow of his owne vnjust Citizens, satisfic himselfe with the joy of a great, though not an honest, reuenge. But his meaning was better than his wordes. Of the overthrow that A drubal received in Spaine, by Scipio, a little before hee tooke his journie into Italie; fuch mention hath alreadie beene made, as agreed with thereport of that noble Historian Linie. Yet I thinke it not amisse to adde in this 50 place, what may be gathered out of the remaining fragments of Polybius his historie; Except. E. concerning that accident. Aldrubal had wrollled with many difficulties in Spaine; Polyb. bifl. 1,10. by reason of those Captaines that were sent from the citie of Carthage, to jovne with him in the administration of that Province : they being, as it may seeme, of the Hannonian faction; which is to fay, thus farre forth Traitors, that they preferred the ad-

uantage of their owne fide, before the good of their Commonwealth. In what particulars they wronged this worthie fonne of Amilear, and how they hindered his courfes vndertaken, it can not be knowne: fince of those bookes, wherein Polybius hath exactly handled these matters; there are to vs remaining, only a few broken peeces. But by the spightfull dealing of Hanno in Sicil with Mutines, a better man of warre than himfelie, whom Hannibal had fent into the Iland: we may conceine. that against the brother of Hannibal it was thought needfull, by these mischieuous Partilans of Hanno, to vie the violent opposition of more earnest malice. Neuertheleffe Aldrubal was a good Patriot: and therefore endured patiently fuch indignities. as Mutines could not long digeft. His journie into Italie being resolued vpon: he lay 10 with part of the Armie at Betula, not faire from the mines of filuer; whence he was to furnish his Expedition. Thither came Scipio: and draue him out of his Campe. though he were strongly lodged, before the other Carthaginian Captaines could. or would, come to his affiftance. The onerthrow feemes not to have beene fo great. as it must have beene supposed, if no way lay open to those that fled. Rather it appeares, that Aldrubal dealt like a provident man: and feeing that his Campe was likely to bee forced, fent away all his monie, with his Elephants before him : but staied behinde him selfe to sustaine the Romans awhile, vntill his carriages might bee out of danger. Herein he had his defire. Afterwards, he gathered his broken troups together: and retired in such fort, that Scipio thought it not good to pursue him, and 20 fo paffed ouer Tagus. Then taking vnto him the forces affigned for his Expedition, he marched away toward the Pyrenees: leauing the care of Spaine vnto his brother Mago, and to Aldrubal the sonne of Gelco; that thought himselfe the fittest man for the administration thereof. Faine would Scipio have stopped him on his journic.bv fending to defend against him the ordinarie way of the Mountaines. But whether Aldrubal tooke another way, or whether he forced the guards that Scipio had let to keepe the Pyrenees (as the defence of hard passages commonly forts to no good effect) he was not letted in his voiage by any fuch impediment. Comming into Gaule, and following the steps of his brother Hannibal: hee found the Nations that lay in his way, so well affected, either to him or to his monie, that no passages were defended against him, nor any fort of resistance made; but he, and his Armic, well entertained, and their numbers much increased; by accesse of such as were desirous to take his pay. Of these he had the better choice: for that hee was driven to Winter in their Countrie; whileft that the paffages of the Alpes were closed up with Ice and Snow. The Mountaines likewife, that had fo greatly molefted Hannibal in his journie ouer the Alpes; were easily wonne to take part with Afdrubal, when he trauailed through their Countrie. For these poore men, at the first comming of Hannibal. were verily perfuaded, that it was his purpofe to robbe them of their cattaile; and to make spoile of that little wealth, which they had paincfully scraped together out of the desolate rocks. But now in processe of time, they were better informed. Therefore understanding, that there were two mightie Cities, farre disloyned afunder, which made warre vpon each other, by Land, and Sea; and that the Alpes did only lie in their way: they gladly condescended, to take their part in the fortune of the Inuaders. The like affection, vpon greater cause, was afterward found in the Cifalpine Gaules. The Ligarians also joyned with Afdrubal : and so would the Hetrurians have done; if he had arrived in their Countrie. There was no other Roman Armie neare, than L. Porcius with his two Legions; of whom there was no great feare. Therefore did Afdrubal fet vpon Placentia a Roman Colonie: in hope to make his comming the more terrible; by the destruction of that Towne. But there hee loft a great deale of time, and finally was driven to quit the enterprise: by vnderta- so king which, he gaue the Roman Confuls leifure, to make readie for him; and caused his brother Hannibal (who upon the first bruit of Afdrubal his so timely, and easily paffing the Alpes, was about to leave his wintring camps, and goe forth to meet with him) to fit ftill awhile, as well aware, that Placentia would not be taken in halte.

C. Claudius Nero the Roman Conful, made what speeds hee could, to meet with Hannibal, and ftop him from joyning with his brother. He had about fortie thoufand foot, and fine hundred horse; with which he daily offered battaile to the Curtheginian; and had of him the better in many skirmillies. Hannibal was once driven to make a tedious march from the borders of the Salentines and Applians, into the Countrie of the Brutians, there to encrease his forces; which were otherwise too weake for the journie intended. Afterward comming to Grumentum, a Towne of the Lucans; he there fought ynprosperously with Aero the Conful. Neuerthelesse he got off, and marched away to Kenusia. But Nero followed him; and had there againe the better of him. Wherefore hee was driven to return to Metapontum: where toyning with Hanno, that had made readie a good Armie; hee affaied againg to make way by force to his brother. So he paffed on ward, and came againe to Venulla, having Nore still at his heeles. Thence went he over the River Aufidius to Canulium, where he fate downe, not farre from the place in which he had obtained, his most memorable victorie. There also did Were sit downe by him; and both of them refted, without making offer to fight. It feemed perhaps vnto Hannibal, who knew the Gountrie very well; that his brother might, with little impediment, over-come the way to Capulium: where if he could once againe deale with both the Confuls. and all the Roman forces together, he had reason to hope for such another victorie. as once he had gotten in the fame open Countrie. If this had fo fallen out; Rome would have beene vindone for euer. But the Carthaginians should not have needed to with any fecond victorie, in the naked Champans about Canna; if fuch an armie. as this which Adrubal now brings, had come to second Hannibal, when hee was in his full strength; and the Romans not able to keepe the field. Wherefore this worthie Generall had good reason afterward to say, that Hanno was the man, who by delaying the fupply, did beat him out of Italie; which elfe no power of the Romans could have done.

Whilest Nero waited vpon the Carthaginians, and thought it enough to hinder them from meeting with the Armie that was comming to their fuccour: he was ad-20 uertifed of Afdrubal his approch; by Letters and Messengers intercepted, as they were going to Hannibal. These gaue notice, that Afdrubal had left the siege of Placentia, and drew onwards apace: being alreadie come within two laundred miles of bis brother: notwithstanding all opposition that could bee made by Linie the Conful. Of these newes Claudius Nero was nothing toyfull. For if Hannibal could once be joyned as head, vnto that great bodie of an Armie, which Afdrubal brought with him; it was most apparant, that how soeuer the fortune of Rome should avoid, for the prefent, any great calamitie; yet the very continuance of so strong a warre at home, would enforce the Latines, and other faithfull Affociates, to faint under the burden; as twelve of the thirtie Roman Colonies had alreadie done. Wherefore he 40 refolued, that it were better to make any desperate aduenture, than to suffer the coninnction of two fuch malevolent Planets: whose pestilent influence, if not on the suddaine, yet within few yeares, was like to worke most lamentable effect. It seemed apparant, that his Colleague was vnable to stay the progresse of Astrabal: neither were there any good Legions in a readinesse, that could doe service in such a needfull case; excepting those, that were alreadie emploied under the two Consuls. Herevpon hee concluded, that it was not expedient for him to tie himselfe to his owne charge, which was the warre against Hannibal : but rather that it behould him , to helpe where more necessitie required; and to carrie part of his forces vnto his Colleague. This could not be without much danger. Yet fince the meeting of the two Carthaginian bretheren, was farre more dangerous to the Roman Common-wealth; it seemed the best way to put Fortune in trust, with that which was of the leffe importance. Sixe thousand foot, and a thousand horse he therefore tooke, that were the very choice of his Armie: and making flew, as if he would only ftep aside, to doe some small peece of service neare at hand; away hee posted as fast as hee could, to 536

affift his fellow Conful. His Mellengers ranne before him, to give warning to all Townes by which he was to passe, that they should be readie to meet him, with vi-Quaills, and all other necessaries for his Armie. Linius the other Consultat that time. lay incamped, neare vnto Sena Gallica; and Afdrubal within halfe a mile of him. In fixe daies Nero had finished his journic thither; and when he drew neare, sent Meffengers before him, to give notice of his comming. Livie thought it fittest that hee should stay in some place of couert vntill darke night, and then enter secretly into the campe : least the Enemie, perceiuing this accesse of strength, should accordingly frame his counfailes. This was done : and a token given, that the Colonells, Captaines, and all Souldiers, aswell horse as foot, that Nero had brought with him; to should bee lodged and entertained by men of their owne fort. Their Companie was formwhat increased by Voluntaries that joyned with them on the way. Neuertheleffe, it was not needfull, that the Quarter which received them, should be enlarged; fince they had brought with them nothing but their armes. The next day they held a Counfaile of warre: wherein some were of opinion, that it was best for these new-arrived Companies, to refresh themselves a few daies after their wearie iournie, before they should be drawne forth to battaile. But against this, Nero was very earnest: and befought his Colleague, to make vse of him out of hand; that he might betimes returne to his owne Campe, ere Hannibal should have notice of his absence. The souldiers also of Nero, were full of spirit; perceiping that the honour 20 of the victoric was like to be theirs; for a finish as the battaile would not have been vndertaken, without this their comming to helpe. Finally, it was agreed when the Counfaile brake vp, that the figne of battaile should be hung out; which was com-

Adrubal was no leffe willing than the Romans to come to battaile: having long defired it, and hitherto not found occasion before. But when he had put his men in order, and was riding before the head of his Armie, to behold the Enemies countenance: it seemed to him, that they were more than they had beene; and some of their armes and horses, looked as though they had wanted dreffing, after a long iournie. Hereupon he beganne to with draw his Armie back into the Campe : and 30 gaue order, that if no prisoners could bee taken, by whom he might bee certified of the truth; yet should there good observation be made, whither the enemies campe were enlarged, or no; or what other alteration could be noted, that might flew their forces to be increased. The campe, as hath beene said, was not extended : but the trumpet, that founded only once in the quarter of L. Porcius the Pretor, did now, contrarie to former custome, found twice in the quarter of Liuius the Conful, Hereat Afdrubal greatly mufed; and being well acquainted with the Roman orders; held this for a fure token, that the other Conful, was there arrived. How this might be, if Hannibal were aliue, and in good case, he was not able to coniecture: but thought it the best way, to goe leisurely to worke; till he might be better informed. Vpon 40 confidence in his owne forces, he had not cared hitherto, how neare hee lay to the Romans; nor troubled himselfe perhaps with ouer-strongly fortifying his owne Campe. Yet when hee now perceived, that somewhat was fallen out beside his expectation: he changed his resolution; and held it no dishonour to remoue a little further off. So he dislodged secretly by night : intending to get ouer the Riner Metaurus; whereby to keepe himfelfeas long as he could, from necessitie of battaile. But whether it were fo, that his guides did steale away from him in the darke, so that he could not finde the way to the Foords; or whether his carriages were too hear vie, and hindred his speede : farre hee had not gone, ere the Consul Nero was at his heeles with all the Roman horse, and staied him from passing any further. Soone aster came L. Porcius with the light armature : whom the other Conful followed anon with all the Legions; in good order, and readic for battaile. Afdrabal, seeing himfelfe ouer-taken with necessitie to fight; omitted no care and circumspection. His Gaules, in whom he reposed least confidence, he placed in his left wing upon a Hill, which the Enemie should not, without much difficultie, bee able to climbe; in the right wing he stood himselfe, with his Africans and Spaniards; his Liquians her placed in the midit; and his Elephants, he bestowed in the front of his battailes. On the Roman lide, Nero had the leading of the right wing; Linius of the left; and Porcius of the battaile. Both Romans and Carthaginians well understood, how much depended upon the fortune of this day; and how little hope of fafetie there was unto the vanquished. Only the Romans herein seemed to have had the better in conceipt, and opinion; That they were to fight with men defirous to have fled from them. And, according to this prefumption, came Liuius the Conful with a proud brauerie. to give charge on the Africans: by whom he was fo sharply entertained that the victorie scemed very doubtfull. The Africans and Spaniards were stout souldiers; and well acquainted with the manner of the Roman fight. The Ligarians also were a hardie Nation, and not accustomed to give ground; which they needed the leffe, or were able now to doe, being placed in the midst. Linius therefore, and Porcius, found ftrong opposition and with great flaughter on both sides, prevailed little or nothing. Belides other difficulties, they were exceedingly troubled by the Elephants, that brake their first rankes; and put them in such disorder, as the Roman Ensignes were driven to fall back. All this while Claudius Nero, Jabouring much in vaine as gainst a steepe Hill, was vnable to come to blowes with the Gaules; that stood opno polite vnto him, but out of danger. This made Afdrubal the more confident; who feeing his owne left wing fafe, did the more boldly and fiercely make impression on the other fide, upon the left wing of the Romans. But Nero, perceiving that the place wherein he stood, was such as would compell him to remaine idle till the fight were ended : tooke a part of his forces, and led them round behinde the forces of Porcius and Livius: which having compassed, he fell upon Asdrubal, and charged him in the flanke. Here beganne the victorie to be manifest on the Roman side. For Nero, finding none to relift him in front, ranne all along the depth of Aldrubal his battaile: and falling upon the skirts thereof, difordered the Enemies, and put all to rowt. Of the Spaniards therefore and Africans, that were laid at on enery fide, the greatest part was flaine. The Ligurians and Gaules escaped as they could; and saued themselves by timely flight. Of the Elephants, foure were taken aline : the rest were slaine; fome by the Enemies weapons; others by their owne guides that rode them. For when any of them, being fore wounded, begannetto wexe vnruly, and rush back vpon their owne battailes following them: the guide had in readinesse a Mallet, and a Chizzell, wherewith he gaue them a stroke betweene the cares, in the joynt of the neck, next vnto the head; wherewith hee killed the beaft upon the fuddaine. This speedie way of preuenting such harme as the Elephants, being hurt, were wont to doe to the fquadrons following them; is faid to have beene the device of Afdrubal himselfe; who died in this battaile.

Great commendations are given to Afdrabal, both by Polybius, and by Linie. He is faid at all times to have showed himselfe worthic of Amilear his father, and Hannibal his brother; to have firiuen with great patience, against many difficulties, whereinto he fell by the meanes of those Captaines, that were sent from Carthage into Spaine; to have performed in this last battaile all duties of a worthie Generall; and finally when hee faw the loffe irreparable, to have ridden manfully into the thickest of his Enemies; where fighting brauely, hee was slaine. Of the number that died with him in this battaile, the report of Liuie, and of Polybius, doe very much difagree. For Livie faith, that the Carthaginians had no leffe an overthrow, than was that, which they gave to the Romans at Canne; that fiftie fixe thousand of them were flaine, fine thousand and foure hundred taken prisoners; and aboue four thousand Roman Citizens, whom they had captines with them, delinered, and set at libertie. He faith alfo, that of the Romans and their Affociates there were flaine eight thousand : and of the bootie, that it was exceeding great; not only in other kindes. but in gold and filuer. Concerning the bootie; Polybins hath no mention of it, Likely it is to have been east ich as Linie reportechtit; for Afanbal came well flored with monie. But Polybins (who had no defire to make this battaile of Metamru, a parallel vinto that of Cames) reports no more than about tenthousand of the Cantaggians side, and two thousand of the Reman, to have been slaine. The tumber of the prisoners he doeth not mention; but only saith. That some of the Carthaginian Princes were taken aline; and that all the rest died in the battaile. Whereby it may seeme, that they were all Barchmes: for asmuch as they preferred the honour of themselves, and of their Countrie, aboue their lives.

The joy of this victorie, was no leffe in Rome, than had beene the feare of the euent, For euer fince it was knowne in what fort 2 ere had left his Armie; the whole to Gitie was troubled, as much as lately at Hannibal his coming thither. Men thought it strange, that the Conful should make such a great adventure, as thus to put the one halfe of all the Roman forces, vnto hazard of the Dice. For what if Hannibal should chance to have notice of this his departure; and either pursue him, or set ypon the Armie that staied behinde, much weakned, and without a Generall? Thus did they talke; yet referuing their censure vnto the successe; with libertie to approue or condemne, according to the iffue. In the meane while the People filled the Market-place; the Women ranne to the Temples, with Vowes and Pravers and the Senators were daily in counfaile, waiting still readie at hand vpon the Magiftrates: as if some great matter were likely to fall out, that would require every 20 ones helpe. In briefe, they were all so full of melancholie, that when first newes of the victorie came, there were not many that would beleeue it. Afterwards when Messengers arrived from the Consuls, with Letters containing all that had passed; there was not only great and joyfull concourse of all forts of men vnto the Temples, but the very face of the Citie was altered; and men from thenceforth beganne to follow their private businesse; making contracts one with another ( which they had long forborne to doe) and attending their owne affaires in fuch wife, as if Hannibal were alreadie driven out of Italie.

Were returning to his campe, threw forth openly the head of Aldrubal before the Carthaginians: and producing his African prisoners bound; sent two of them 20 loofe to give Hannibal notice of what had hapned. These two prisoners, might have ferued well enough to certific Hannibal of this mifaduenture, without doing wrong to the dead body of Afdrubal: especially since Hannibal, in honourable, and farre different manner, had giuon buriall to Gracebus and Marcellus; yea to all the Roman Generalls, whose carkasses fell into his hands. But it may seeme, that howfocuer the People of Carthage, wanted much of the generous disposition, which was found among the Romans, in their love vnto the Commonweale; yet in dealing with Enemies, they were farre more civill, and leffe prone to the infolencie of reuenge. The best excuse of this outrage done by Nero, is, that hee hoped much more by the fudden terrour of fuch a spectacle, than by the simple relation of that 40 which had passed, to make a deepe impression of feare into the Carthaginians. It may also be said, That he forgot him selfe, being over-joyed with the greatnesse of his prosperitie. For it was the battaile of Metaurus that weighed downe the ballance, and turned the Tide of the Roman fortune: which being then at the lowest Ebbe, ceased not afterwards to flow, till it could not be contained within any banks. Hannibal having lost in this vnhappie fight (besides that worthic Gentleman his Brother) all the hope that so long sustained him in Italie; with-drew himselfe into the Countrie of the Brutians : and thither hee caused all the Lucans that were of his partie to remoue; as likewise all that dwelt in Metapontum. For he wanted men to defend so many places as he held at the present, because they lay too farre asunder. Wherefore he drew them all into a leffer compaffe in the vtmoft corner of Italie; it being a Countrie of much faltnesse, and the people exceedingly denoted to his feruice. In this bufineffe Nero gaue him no memorable impediment: either because Hannibal was too strong for him, having all his forces vnited; or because it is likely that this remoue of the Lucans and Metapontines, was not before the end of Sommer, when their haruest was gathered in; at what time the Senate called him home to Rome. M. Linius the other Conful tarried among the Cifalpine Gaules yntill the end of Sommer; there to fet things in such order as he thought requisite: which done, hee wrote vnto the Senate, that there was no more neede of him and his Armie in that Province; but that L. Porcius, with the two Legions that were there before, might very well discharge the place. For this cause, hee desired leane to returne home; and that he might bring his Armic with him. The Senate well vnderstood bis meaning: which was to have the honour of a triumph, as he well deferued. But forafmuch as it was well knowne, what interest Nero had in the late viftorie : order was given, that not only Livie with his Armie should come home : but likewise Nere; though leaning his Armie, behinde him, to confront Hannibal. So the honour of triumph was granted to them both; in the pompe whereof Linie made the greater flew, as riding in a Charlot, and followed by his Souldiers: because in his Province, and vpon his day of command, the victoric was gotten; his Armicalso being present at the triumph. But Were that rode on horse back, and without fuch attendance, was the more extolled both by the People and Souldiers. by whom, the victoric was in a manner wholly afcribed unto his great worth. Neither wanted L. Veturtus Philo, and Q. C. ecilius Metellus, Lieutenants to the Generalls, 20 the due acknowledgement of their good feruice. For they were commended vnto the People, as men worthie to bee chosen Gonfuls; and Confuls they were chosen for the yeare following. But nothing was done by them, worthie of memorie, in their Consulship. Neither indeede from this yeare, which was the thirteenth of the prefent warre, untill the eighteenth yeare wherein it ended, was there any matter of importance wrought in Italie; faue only the taking of Locri from the Carthagimians by furprise. For Hannibal wanted firength, wherewith to make any oreat offer : and the Romans had little minde to prouoke him ; but thought it well that hee was quiet. Such opinion had they conceived of him; that though all about him went to ruine; yet in him alone they thought there was force enough to hold him-20 selfe vpright. And surely very notable are the commendations given vnto him by Polybius; whom Linie therein followes: That making warre vpon a People, of all other the most warlike, hee obtained so many victories by his owne good conduct: and that leading an Armie, compounded of so many sundrie Nations, Africans, Spaniards, Gaules, Carthaginians, Italians, and Greekes; which were, neither in Language, Lawes, Conditions, or any other thing, one like to another; hee held them all in fuch good order, that they never fell to fedition among themselves, or against their Generall. But that which Liuie addes hereto, is yet perhaps of greater admiration: That he sustained his Armic, without helpe from other places, from this time forward, vpon the hungric foile of the Brutians: which, when it was best manured in 40 time of peace, could hardly fuffice to nourish the Inhabitants. It is therefore apparant, that by his proper worth and vertue, he kept his Armie in fuch order and obedience, rather than by any greatnesse of reward and bootie: since, after the death of As a made no invasion vpon the wealthier parts of Italie; but held himselfe still among the poore Brutians. Where we must leave him vntill he be drawne into Africk by Scipio; whose doings will henceforth entertaine, and leade vs, vnto the end of this Warre.

How P. CORNELIVS SCIPIO the Roman, made entire conquest of Spaine.

t. I.

How the Carthaginians were driuen by SCIPIO from the Continent into the Isle of Gades.

A G O, and A S D A V B A L the sonne of Gesso, tooke vpon them the charge of Spaine, when Ashabal the sonne of Amusicar departed thence into I Ludic. These agreed together, that Mage should make a voiage to the Baleser; there to leuie a supply of men: and Ashabal with-draw himiles into Lusitania (which is now Portugal) whither the Remanshad ill meanes to follow; being altogether vnacquainted in those parts. Mage had soone ended his businesse, and returned into Spaine; where hee met with one Hanno (the same perhaps hat had lately beene emploied in Stail), who bought new forces out of Africk, and came to succeede in place of Africkal the Barchine. It is not vnlikely that Spaine was now the better, and more readily furnished with men, and all things needfull from Carthage; when that soon of Amicro, whose authoritie had beene greatest, was thencedeparted. For hereby might the stations diligence of old Hanno approue it selfe, against that noble race of Warriors; when it should appeare, that things did prosper much the better by being lest wnto the handling of other men. Whether it were upon desire to make good some such opinion raised of him at home, or whether yopn considence in the forces that he brought ouer: Hanno tooke the field, and led Mage with him; as purposing affesh to set yopn the Romans. So he entred into the Countrie of the Celisterians, not very surre from new Carthage: where, by monic, and other persualions, be levied aboue nine thousand men.

P. Scipio in the meane while contained himselfe in the Easterne parts of Spaine: attentiue, as it may feeme, to the proceedings of Afdrubál the fonne of Amilear; against whom, he is reported by some Writers to have sent part of his forces into Italie, to the affiltance of C. Claudius Nero, and M. Linius the Confuls. But bearing of the leuie made by Hanno and Mago, among the Celtiberians: hee fent M. Syllanus the Propretor, with ten thousand foot and fine hundred horse. Syllanus got intelligence by some fugitive Celtiberians, who became his guides, that their Countrimen encamped apart from the Carthaginians in great disorder; as men fearing no danger. because they were at home. Wherefore as closely as he was able, he drew neare to these Celtiberians : and falling vpon them on the suddaine, gave them such an onerthrow, that Hanno and Mago comming to their fuccour, in flead of heartning and reinforcing them, became partakers of the loffe. Mago faued himfelfe, with all the horse, and old Companies of foot, which were about two thousand; and in ten daies journey brought them safe to Astribal. The rest of the Africans were either flaine or taken : among whom, Hanno had the ill luck to bee taken prisoner; though he kept himselfe out of the fight vntill all was lost. As for the Celtiberians, they knew better how to make shift; and saued most of themselves by running into the woods.

It could no otherwise bee, but that Scipio was much troubled with the danger wherein Italia stood, by the comming thither of Ashabal. Tenthousand foot and eightence hundred horse he did therefore send out of Spaine (as it is reported by 50 some Authors) to the desence of his owne Countrie: or was perhaps about to send them; and thereupon remained at new Carthage, intentiue to the necessitie and successed in his Countrimen at home. But when had word of the great victoric at Metaurus, which sell out long before the end of this Sommer, then might her well ad-

Against the next yeares danger, Astrobal prepared a great Armie: and spared nor cost, nor trauaile, in strengthning himselfe, for the triall of his last fortune in spaine. With scuentie thousand foot, foure thousand horse, and two and thirtie Elephants, he tooke the field: which number I beleeue that hee could hardly haue raifed, without boldly denying the truth of those reports that came from Italie. Scipio thought his Roman Legions too weake to encounter with fuch a multitude. Wherefore hee judged it needfull to vierthe helpe of his Spanish friends. But the death of his Father and Vncle, that were cast away by the treason of such false Auxiliaries; made him on the other fide very doubtfull, of relying upon those, that might perhaps betray him in his greatest neede. Yet since one Colobas, that was Lord of eight and twentie Townes, had promifed him the last Winter, to raise three thousand foot, and five hundred horse for his service : hee resolved to make vse of those, and some few others; that might helpe to make a shew; and yet not bee able to doe great harme, if they would reuolt. So with fine and fortie thousand foot, and three thousand horse, he sought out the Enemie; neare to whom hee incamped. At his first comming, Mago and Masanissa fell upon him; with hope to take him unprepared, whilest hee was making his lodgings. But hee laied certaine troupes of horse in couert: which breaking vpon them vnexpected; caused them to fall off. They made at first an orderly retrait: but being more hardly pressed, they shortly betooke themselves to plaine flight. After this encounter, which added some courage to the Romans, and abated the presumption of the Carthaginians: there were daily skirmilhes betweene the horse, and light armature on both sides; wherein was nothing done of importance. Afdrubal drew forth his Armie, and arranged to it before his Trenches: the like did Scipie; each of them to shew that he durst fight; yet not proceeding any further. Thus they continued many daies: Aldrubal being still the first that issued forth in the morning; and the first that, in the enening, withdrew himselse into his Trenches. The Spanish Auxiliaries, were placed on both fides in the wings; the Carthaginians were in the midft, with their Elephants before them; and opposite to these on the other side were the Roman Legions. When they had in this order confronted one another, though at farre distance, many daies together: it grew to be the common opinion, that they should shortly meet in the same forme; and be matched on each part, with the Enemies, long before deligned. But Scipio, when hee purposed indeede to fight, altered the forme of his Armie; and withall, came forth earlier than he had beene wont. He caused his men, and horses, to be well fed betimes in the morning before day : and then fent forth his horse and light armature, to traine out the Carthaginians with their bellies emptie: vling herein the same trick, whereby he might remember, that Hannibal had beaten his father in the battaile of Trebia. His Roman Legions he bestowed in the wings; his Spaniards, in the battaile. Afdrubal fent forth his horsein all haste, to entertaine the Romans; whilft he himselfe arranged his men, in their wonted order, at the Hill foot, vpon which he incamped. In the skirmishes of the horse it could not be discerned which part had the better: fince being ouer-preffed on either fide, they had a fafe retrait vnto their foot; and one troupe seconding another by course, returned to charge, This fight was protracted by Scipio to a great length: because his men, having well fed themselves, were like to hold out better than the Enemie. But about noone, he caused his wings to advance a good pace; leaving their battaile of Spaniards farre behinde them; that came on leifurely, according to direction. The Spanish Mercinaries that flood in A [drubal his wings, were no way comparable, faue only in num- 10 ber to the Latin and Roman Souldiers, that came against them; for they were fresh Souldiers, leuied in hafte; and fighting only in respect of their pay. Being therefore charged in front by the Legions, and in flanke, at the same time, by the Roman Velites, and by some cohorts, that were appointed to wheele about for the same purpose: they were forely pressed; and with much difficultie made resistance. The Carthaginians would faine have succoured them; but that they durst not stirre out of their places, because of the Spanish battaile which was coming against them; though it were as yet farre off. Thus the best part of Adrubal his Armie stood idle; vntill the wings were broken. For, had he aduentured to meet with the Spaniards; he must have cast himselfe into the open space that lay before him betweene the Ro- 20 man wings: to the depth whereof when he had arrived, he should have found himselfeinclosed in such fort, as was the Conful Paulus at the battaile of Canna. Wherefore hee did only employ his Elephants; which did, according to their manner, no greater harme to his Enemies; than to his Friends. When they were chafed with wounds, they could no longer bee ruled by their guides: but ranne, as chance led them, and troubled both parts; or those perhaps the more, that were the more vnwilling to kill them. In processe of the fight: the Romans, who had well refreshed their bodies in the morning, endured luftie; when the others beganne to faint with trauell and heat of the day. Wherefore perceiving their advantage, they followed it the more hotly : and gaue not ouer, till they had for fit the enemie to change his 20 pace and runne from him. Afdrubal did his best to have made an orderly retrait; and afterward againe, to have caused his men turne head; at the Hill foot. But the Romans would not fuffer the victorie to bee fo extorted from the the neither was it casie to put fresh courage into the vanquished; led by the obstinate passion of scare which hearkens to no perswasion. The Campe of Asdrubal had that day beene taken; if a storme of raine, which fell violently on the fuddaine, and bred fome supersition in the Romans, had not caused them to giue ouer.

The fame night, Afdrubal gaue no rest to his men: but caused them, hungrie, and ouer-laboured as they were, to take paines in fortifying the Campe; wherein 40 hee feared to bee affaulted. But little affurance could hee haue in the strength of his Trenches; when he had loft the hearts of his Spanish Souldiers. One Attanes, that was Lord of the Turdetani, fled from him to the Romans, with a great Band of his Subjects: many followed this example; and soone after, two strong Townes were yeelded vp to Scipio, and the Garrisons betraied. It seemes that the peruerse fortune of this late battaile, whereupon Afdrubal had fet his rest; bred in the Spaniards a disposition, to believe the more easily those reports which they heard from Italie. For henceforward, they never did good office to the Carthaginians. Afdrubal, perceiuing this, with-drew himfelfe, and marched away, faster than an ordinarie pace, toward the Ocean Sea. Scipio followed the next morning: and overtaking the Carthaginians with his horse, caused them so often to make stand; that they were at length attached by the Roman Legions. Here beganne a cruell flaughter: for there was no refistance made, but all fell to rout, faue only seuen thousand, that with Afdrubal himselfe recouered a very strong peece of ground, which they fortified in haste.

This place he made shift awhile to defend; but wanting there necessaries to suffaine himselfe long, he was forsaken by some of those few, that continued hitherto partakers of his fortune. Wherefore he refolued to make shift for one; and stealing from his Companie by night away to the Sea-fide, that was not farre thence; hee tooke thipping, and let faile for Gades. When Scipio understood that Afdrubal was thus gone; he left Syllanus with ten thousand foot and a thousand horse to believe their Campe (which was not taken in hafte, for Mago and Mafaniffa stated in it) whilest he with the rest of the Armie did what was needfull in the Countrie abroad. It was not long, ere Mago and Malaniffa followed Aldrubal to Gades: and their Armie differred it felfe; fome flying ouer to the Romans; other taking what way they liked. So vpon all the Continent of Spaine, there were only three Towneslett, Illiturgi, Castula, and Aftapa, that made countenance of warre against the Romans : of which only Cafulo had in it a Carthaginian Garrison; confilting of such as had sayed themselves by flight, in the late overthrowes. Hereby it feemes, that the report of those Historians was ill grounded, who faid, that Castulo yeelded long since vnto the Romans : though Hannibal tooke a wife in that Citie. For this was one of the last three Townes that held out, on the Carthaginian fide. Illiturgi had fometimes been inclinable to the Romans; if not altogether at their denotion. Yet after the death of the two elder Scipiaes, following too earnestly the Carthaginian fortune; it not only rebelled; but with great crueltie betraied, and flue, the poore menthat escaped thither from the operthrowes. Alapa was a Towne, that had ftill adhered to the Carthaginians: and, which was worfe, had thriuen by spoile of the Romans and their Confederates. Wherefore (though not vntill the next yeare) Scipio went against these, and tooke himselfe Illiturgi and Castulo: Illiturgi by assault, and with a generall slaughter of the Inhabitants; Castulo, by treason of one Cerdubellus. Astapa was taken by Lucius Marcius; or rather destroied by the Inhabitants. For a great pile of wood was raised in the Market-place: whereinto was throwne all the gold, and filter, with what focuer elfe was precious; the women and children standing by it under a fure guard; that should kill and burne them if the Romans got into the Towns. This provision being made: all the Inhabitants that could be are armes, rufhed forth desperately: and fell vpon the Roman campe; where striuing beyond their power, they were cuery one flaine. Then was the Towne forth-with fet on fire, by those that had taken charge to docit; and many of the Romans confirmed with the flame; whileft they ruffied ouer-halfily to catch the gold, and filter, which they faw lying on the pile readie

Afdrubal, being beaten into the Hand of Gades, found no cause of long stay there: but returned home to Carthage, with feuen Gallies; leaving Mago behinde him, to wait vpon occasion, if any should be offered. Hee visited in his way home, Syphax King of the Mafajili, a people of the Numidians; hoping to winne him to the friendship of the Carthagenians. But he met with Scipio, as it were with his coill Angel, in the Kings Port: who, landing at the fame time, carried Syphax quite another way. For Scipio, having driven the Carthaginians out of Spaine, did forth-with bethinke himselfe, how to finish the warre; by putting them to the like diffreste in Africke. Hercunto it feemed, that the helpe of Syphax would be much availeable: a King that had many times fallen out with the Carthaginians, and fustained much hurt by their procurement; of which in all likelihood he might eatily be moved to feeke revenge. He had also beene beholding to P. and Cm. Scipio, that fent him over a Captaine into Afrike; who instructed him so well in marshalling his forces, as he thereby often became victorious. Vpon these reasons the Wumidian King sent Embassadours to 50 Rome, and made league with the Citic, in a time of great extremitie. So that hereby P. Scipio conceined hope of laying a good foundation to the warre, which he intended in Afrike; vpon the friendship of this ill Neighbour to the Carthaginians. For which cause he sent ouer C. Lalius his Embassadour, to deale with Syphax: who declaring that the Carthagmians did very ill in Italie, and had nothing now at all to doe in Spaine; easily perswaded the King to take part with those that had the better. and were without question his better friends. Only Syphan requested, that the Roman Generall should visite him in person, to conclude the League; by which hee was to enter into conditions of more importance, than in any former Treatie, Hereto Scipia condescended: thinking the friendship of so great a King, that was neighbour to Carthage, and not farre distant from Spaine, well worthic of the adventure. So with two Quinquereme Gallies hee tooke Sea; and arrived in the Kings Port, at the fame time, with Aldrubal. This would have beene very dangerous to him, had he beene discried by his Enemies further at Sea: but in the Hauen, they forbare to make offer one vpon the other. Syphax might well be proud; feeing at one time, two fuch Captaines of two most powerfull Cities, came to desire his friendship. Hee would have brought them to treat of peace : but the Roman excused himselfe, by want of fuch commission from the Senate. He feasted them together: and shortly dismissed Scipio, with whom he readily entred into couenant; which in time of performance, he as readily brake.

t. I I.

Funerall games held by SCIPIO. A duell betweene two Spanish Princes. A digression, concerning Duells.

SCIPIO returning into Spaine, and resting that winter, tooke vengeance the next yeare, vpon those of Illiturgi, Castillo, and Astapa, as hath beene said before. The Conquest of the Countrie being then in a manner at an end : hee performed at new Carthage, with great folemnitie, some Vowes that he had made; and honoured the memorie of his Father, and Vncle, with funerall games, especially of those that fought at sharpe, according to the manner of the times. Neither was it needfull, that he should trouble himselfe with preparing slaues for that spectacle, to hazard their lines, as was vied in the Citie of Rome: for there were enough, that either offered themselues as voluntaries, or were sent from their Princes; to give proofe in fingle combat, of the valour that was in their feuerall Countries. Some alfothere were, that being in contention, which they could not, or would not otherwise end, agreed to referre the decision of their Controuersies, to triall of the sword in single fight. Among these, the most eminent, were, Corbis, and Orfua, Cosen-germans: that contended for the principalitic of a Towne called Ibes. Corbis was the eider, and the elder brothers fonne; wherfore he claimed the Lordship, as eldest of the house; after the manner of our Irish Tanishrie. But the father of Orsua stood lately seized of the Principalitie: which though himselfe received by the death of his elder brother; yet this his fonne would not let it goe back; but claimed to hold it as heire vnto his father, and old enough to rule. Faine would Scipio have compounded the matter. But they answered peremptorily, That all their friends, and kindred, had alreadie laboured in vaine, to take vp that quarrell; and that neither God, nor Man, but only Mars, their God of battaile, should be Vmpire between them. So they had their wills: and the elder, who was also the stronger, and more skilfull at his weapon, cafily vanquished the foole-hardinesse of the yonger.

Such combats have beene very ancient; and perhaps more ancient, than any other kinde of fight. We reade of many performed before the Warre of Troy, by Thefeus, Hercules, Pollux, and others: as also of two at the Warre of Troy; the one, betweene Paris and Menelaus; the other, betweene Hector and Aiax. Neither want so there examples of them among the Hebrewes: whereof that betweene David and Goliah; and others performed by fome of Davids Worthies, against those that challenged them; are greatly celebrated. Unto the same kinde appertaines the fight, betweene twelve of the Tribe of Inda, and as many of the Beniamites. The Romans had many of them; whereof that was principall, in which they ventured their Dominion vpon the heads of three brethren the Horati, against the three brethren Curisty that were Albans. The combat of Manlius Torquatus; and shortly after, of Valerius Coruinus with two Champions of the Gaules, which challenged any Roman; were of lesse importance, as having only reference to braueric. In England there was a great combat fought, betweene Edmond Ironfide and Canutus the Dane, for no leffethan the Kingdome. The vse of them was very frequent in the Saxon-times; almost vpon enery occasion, great or small. In the raigne of Edward the third, who fustained the partie of Mount fort against the Earle of Bloys, contending for the Duchie of Britaine; there was a fight, for honour of the Nations, betweene thirtie of the Britons, and thirtic English: two of which English, were Caluerlie a braue Captaine; and that Sir Robert Knolles, who afterwards became a renowned Commander in the French warres, and did highly honour his bloud, whereof the Lord Knolles is descended. It were infinite to reckon the examples of the like, found in English, French, and Italian Histories. Most of them have been combats of braueric, and of gayete de cure, as the French terme it; for honor of seuerall Nations; for love of Mistresses; or what focuer else gaue occasion vnto men, desirous to set out themselves. But befides those of this fort, there are two other natures of combats; which are, either vpon acculation for life; or vpon trial of Title and Inheritance, as in Writ of right. And of this latter kinde, was that, of which wee spake even now, betweene Corbis and Orfus. Vnto these (methinkes) may be added, as of different condition from the reft, the combat vpon Wager; fuch as were that betweene Dauid and Golish; or that betweene the Horatii and Curiatii : in which, without regard of Title, the Dominion of Nations, one over the other, is adventured your the head of Champions. Vpon an acculation for life, there was a combat appointed betweene the Lord Hen- Ao, 21, Ric. 241, rie of Boulinbrooke Duke of Hereford, and Moubray Duke of Norfolk. There was a combat performed by Sir John Anfley and one Cattrington: whom Anfley charged A. 3. Ric. 241. with treason; and proued it vpon him, by being victorious. The like was fought betweene Robert of Mountfort and Henrie of Effex. The like also, betweene a Nauar- As a Herradi 20 rois and one Welch of Grimsby, whom the Navarrois accused of treason: but, being beaten in fight, confessed that hee had belied him; and was therefore drawne and hanged. Whether our triall by battaile doe determine, that the false accuser, if he be vanquilhed, shall suffer the punishment which had beene due to the offender, if the accusation had beene proued; I cannot affirme. But we every where finde, That if he which is accused of treason, or according to the customes of Normandie, of Murder, Rape, or burning of Places (offences punished by death) bee ouer-come, He shall suffer the paines appointed for those crimes. In combats for trial of right, it is not fo: neither is the Appellant or Defendant bound to fight in person, but hee may trie it by his Champion; as did Paramor and Love, or offered to doe, in the an raigne of Queene Elizabeth. And in this case, he that is beaten, or yeeldeth, looseth only his cause, not his life. Neither are the combats, vpon accusation, or triall of right, fought in open field, as are those of brauerie; but in campe close, that is, within railes. Now this triall by combat was so ordinarie in Prance, before the time of St. Lewes, and Philip the faire his grand-child, as every Lord of Fee, Ecclefiafticall or Temporall, had power to grant it within his owne Iurisdiction. And it seemeth that the French Kings, and other Lords, made their profit hereby. For in the * Me- . Si homines de merialls of the Chamber of Accompts, is found an Articleto this effect: That if a combat I oralico Vadica were once accepted, and after, by confent of the Lord, were taken vp, each of the parties should pay two shillings fixe pence; but if it were performed, then should the so partie vanquished forfeit an hundred and twelve shillings. And vpon this custome grew the French Prouerbe, which they vie when any man hath had an hard or vnjust judgement; faying, That hee was tried by the Law of Loray, or Berne; on le battu paye l'amende, where he that is beaten giues the recompence. Of these frequent trials by battaile, that great learned man Tue, Bilhop of Chartres, did often complaine, and * clerici voltri fpecially against the French Church-men: as appeares by * his letters to the Bishop nuper ad narre- of Orleans, to the Arch-deacon of Paris, to Rembert Arch bilhop of Sens, and to others: wherein he rebukes the judgement of their Churches, that had ratified fuch challenges of combat. But this libertie, and kinde of triall, was retrencht by Saint Lewes, and Philip the faire; fo that no man should decree, or grant it, faue the King himselfe. It bath since beene granted, though more sparingly, by the French Kings: as to the Lord of Carouges against laques le Gris ; and to Iulian Romero the Spaniard, against More, his Countriman : wherein Sir Henrie Kneuet, Father of the Lord Kneuet now living, was Patron to Romero that had the victoric, and laftly to the Lord of Chast. Now in those Challenges, vpon accusation of Treason, Murder, or other of fence descruing death, (and in those only) the rule held, That le desendeur estoit tenu de proposer ces dessenses per une dementir : The Desendant was bound to pleade not ouiltie, by gining the accuser the Lie: otherwise it was concluded, that the Defendant did taifiblement confesser le crime ; filently confesse the crime. But after such time as Francis the French King, vpon some dispute about breach of Faith, had sent the Lie vnto the Emperour Charles the fift, thereby to draw him to a personal combat; enery pettic Companion in France, in imitation of their Master, made the giving of the Lie mortalitic it felfe; holding it a matter of no small glorie, to haue it said, That the meanest Gentleman in France, would not put vp, what the great Emperour Charles the fift had patiently endured.

From this beginning is derived a challenge of combat, grounded vpon noncof those occasions that were knowne to the Ancient. For, the Honor of Nations, the Triall of Right, the Wager vpon Champions, or the Objection and Refutation of capitall offences, are none of them, nor all of them together, the argument of halfe fo many Duells, as are founded your meere private Anger, yea or your matter feeming worthie of anger in the opinion of the Duellifts. So that in these daies, wherein every man takes vnto himfelfe a Kingly libertie, to offer, accept, and appoint perfonall combats; the giuing of the Lie, which ought to be the Negation only in accufations for life, is become the most fruitfull root of deadly quarrells. This is held a word fo terrible, and a wrong fo vnpardonable, as will admit no other recompence, than the bloud of him that gives it. Thus the falhion, taken yp in hafte by the French Gentlemen after the patterne of their King, is grown to be a custome; whence we have derived a kinde of Arte and Philosophic of quarrell, with certaine grounds and rules, from whence the points of honour, and the dependencies thereof, are deduced. Yea there are (among many other no leffe ridiculous) some so mysticall curiolities herein, as that it is held a farre greater dishonour to receive from an enemie a flight touch with a Cane, than a found blow with a Sword : the one, having relation to a flaue; the other, to a fouldier. I confesse that the difference is pretie: though, for mine owne part, if I had had any such Italionated enemie in former times. I should willingly have made with him such an exchange; and have given him the point of honour to boot.

But let vs examine indifferently the offence of this terrible word, the Lie; with their conditions, who are commonly of all other the most tender in receiping it: I fay, that the most of these, who present death on the points of their swords to all that give it them; vie nothing so much in their conversation and course of life; as to speake and sweare falsly. Yea it is thereby, that they shift and shuffle in the World. and abuse it. For how few are there among them, which, having assumed and sworne to pay the monies and other things they borrow, doe not breake their word and promife, as often as they engage it? Nay, how few are there among them, that are not Liers by Record, by being fued in some Court or other of Justice, vpon breach of 50 word, or bond? For he which hath promised, that he will pay monie by a day or promifed any thing elfe, wherein he faileth; hath directly lied to him, to whom the promise hath beene made. Nay, what is the profession of love that men make nowa-daies? What is the vowing of their fernice, and of all they have, yfed in their or-dinarie complements, and (in effect) to euery man whom they bid but good-morrow, or falute, other than a courteous and courtlike kinde of lying? It is (faith a wife French-man, deriding therein the Apilh custome of his Countrie) vne marché & complot fait ensemble the se mocquer, mentir, & piper les vins les autres; A kinde of merchandize, and complet made among them, to mock, belie, and deride each other : and lo farre now-a daies in fashion, and in vie; as he that vieth it not, is accounted either dull, or Cynicall. True it is notwithstanding (omitting the old distinctions) that there is great difference between these mannerly and complementall lies, with those which are somtime perswaded by necessitie vpon breach of promise; and those which men 10 vic out of cowardize and feare: the latter confessing themselves to be in greater awe of men, than of God; a vice of all other stiled the most villainous. But now for the Lie it selfe, as it is made the subject of all our deadly quarrells in effect : to it I fay, That who fo gives another man the Lie, when it is manifest that he hath lied, doth him no wrong at all; neither ought it to be more hainoufly taken, than to tell him, that he hath broken any promise which he hath otherwise made. For he that promileth any thing, tells him, to whom he hath promifed, that hee will performe it; and, in not performing it, he hath made himselfe a Lier. On the other side. He that gives any man the Lie, when himfelfe knowes that he, to whom it is given hath not lied; doth therein give the Lie directly to himselfe. And what cause have I, if I and that the Sunne thines when it doth thine, and that another fellow tells me I lie. for it's mid-night; to profecute fuch an one to death, for making himfelfe a foolish Ruffian, and a Lier in his owne knowledge ? For he that gives the Lie in any other dispute, than in defence of his Loyaltie, or Life; gives it impertinently, and Ruffianlike. I will not denie but it is an extreme rudenesse to taxe any man in publike with an vntruth: (if it be not pernicious, and to his prejudice against whom the vntruth is vttered) but all that is rude, ought not to bee civilized with death. That were, more to admire and imitate a French custome, and a wicked one, than to admire and to follow the counsaile of God. But you will say, That these discourses sauour of cowardize. It is true; if you call it cowardize, to feare God or Hell: whereashe that 20 is truly wife, and truly valiant, knowes that there is nothing elfe to be feared. For against an Enemies sword wee shall finde ten thousand seuen-penie-men ( waged at that price in the warres) that feare it as little, and perchance leffe, than any profest Sword-man in the World. Diligentissmain tutela fui Fortitudo; Fortitude is a diligent preserver of it selfe. It is (faith Aristotle) a mediocritic between doubting and daring. Sicut non Martyrem pana: sience fortem pugna; sed csusa; As it is not the punishment that makes the Martyr : foit is not fighting that declares a validat man; but fighting in a good cause. In which who seemer shall resolvedly end his life, resolvedly in respect of the cause, to wit, in defence of his Prince, Religion, or Countrie: as hee may justly bee numbred among the Martyrs of God; fo may those that die with malicious 40 hearts, in private combats, be called the Martyrs of the Devill. Neither doe we indeede take our owne reuenge, or punish the injuries offered vs, by the death of the injurious. For the true conquest of reuenge is, to give him, of whom we would bee reuenged, cause to repent him; and not to lay the repentance of another mans death on our owne consciences; animafg, in vulnere ponere; And to drowne our soules in the wounds and bloud of our enemies. Hereupon you will againe aske me, if I condemne in generous and noble spirits the defence of their honours, being prest with injuries ? I fay that I doe not ; if the injuries bee violent. For the Law of Nature, which is a branch of the eternall Law : and the Lawes of all Christian Kings and States ; doe fauour him that is affailed, in the flaughter of the Affailant. You will fecondly aske ne, Whether a Noble-man, or a Gentle-man, being challenged by Cartel by one of like qualitie, bee not bound in point of honour to fatisfie the challenger in private combat? I answere that he is not : because (omitting the greatest, which is the point of Religion) the point of the Law is directly contrarie and opposite to that, which they call the point of honour; the Law which hath dominion ouer it, which can judge it, which can destroy it; except you will stile those Artes honourable, where the Hang-man giues the Garland. For, feeing the Lawes of this Land have appointed the Hang-man to second the Conquerour; and the Lawes of God appointed the Devill to second the conquered dying in malice: I say that he is both base, and a foole, that accepts of any Cartel fo accompanied. To this perchance it will be anfwered. That the Kings of England, and other Christian Kings, have feldome taken any fuch advantage over men of qualitie; who you even termes have flaine their private enemics. It is true, that as in times of trouble and combustion they have not often done it; fo did our Noble-men and Gentle-men in former ages, in all important injuries, fue vnto the King, to approve themselves by battaile and publique to combat. For as they dared not to braue the Law : so did they distaine to submit themselves to the shamefull revenge thereof; the same revenge (because it detesteth murder) that it hath declared against a common Cut-pursse or other Theeues, Nav let it be granted that a pardon bee procured for fuch offenders; Yet is not the Manflaier freed by his pardon. For these two remedies hath the partie grieued not withstanding; that is, to require justice by Grand Assize, or by battaile, vpon his appeale, which (faith St. Thomas Smith) is not denied; and he further faith (for I vie his owne wordes) That if the Defendant (to wit, the Man-flaier) be continced either by Great Affize or by Battaile, vpon that appeale; the Man-flaier shall die notwithstanding the Princes pardon. So fauourable (faith the same learned Gentleman) 20 are our Princes, and the law of our Realme, to justice, and to the punishment of bloud violently shed. It may further be demanded, how our Noble-men & Gentlemen shall be repaired in honour, where an enemie, taking the start either in wordes or blowes, shall lay on them an infamie vnsufferable ? I say that a Marshalls Court will easily give satisfaction in both. And if wee hold it no disgrace to submit our selues for the recouerie of our Debts, Goods, and Lands, and for all things else, by which the lines of our felues, our wines, and children, are fultained, to the Judges of the Law; because it may bee fellonie, to take by violence even that which is our owne: why should we not submit our selues to the Judges of honour in cases of honour: because to recouer our reputation by strong hand, may be murder? But yet 30 againe it may be objected, That the loffe of honour ought to be more fearefull vnto vs, than either the loffe of our goods, of our lands, or of our lives; and I fav for on-But what is this honour, I meane honour indeede, and that which ought to bee fo deare vnto vs, other than a kinde of historie, or fame following actions of vertue, actions accompanied with difficultie or danger, and under-taken for the publike good? In these he that is imploied and trusted, if he faile in the performance, either through cowardize, or any other base affection; it is true that he looseth his honor. But the acting of a private combat, for a private respect, and most commonly a friuolous one, is not an action of vertue; because it is contrarie to the law of God, and of all Christian Kings: neither is it difficult; because even and equall in persons and 40 armes: Neither for a publike good, but tending to the contrarie; because the losse

Now that a Marshall of England hath power to sauceuery mans fame and reputation, as farre as reputation may sustaine injurie by wordes. I thinke no man doubteth. For to repent vs of any ill wordes that we have given, and to confesse that we haue done him wrong to whom we have given them, is a sufficient satisfaction; and as it may fall out, more than sufficient. For hee that gives ill wordes in choller, and fuddenly denies them, or repents himfelfe of them vpon adulfement; bath the disadvantage in point of reputation. Concerning blowes, which are indeede not to be given but to those that are servile, whether sufficient recompense will be emade 50 for them, it shall appeare by a notable example of a most worthic Gentleman Mounsieur du Plesis, that was stricken in France not long since by a Baron of the same Nation. The satisfaction which was given him by a judgement of the Constable and Marshalls of France, was this. In the open Court, wherein the Constable gaue judge-

ment. M. de Pless: was set in a chaire vnder the degrees where the Contable and Marihalls fate : the Baron, who had given him the blow, did kneele before him on both his knees, holding in his right hand a fword with the point towards himfelfe. and in his left hand the like cudgell or bastinado, wherewith he had stricken Ost. de Plesis; both which weapons he delinered into Plesis hands, submitting himselfe to fuch revenge, as it should please him to take with either of those weapons; the Constable and Marshalls having formerly left it to the will of Plesis to vie his owne difcretion in the reuenge of his owne wrongs. Now whether the Baron had reason to please himselfe, as one before hand in point of honour, who struck M. de Plesis like 10 a Ruffian comming behinde him, and (hauing advantage of companie, and his horses readie) shifted himselfe away on the suddaine, but being afterward taken, was taught to repent himfelfe in this shamefull manner: Or whether Mansieur de Plesis (of whose valour no man doubted) had not farre juster cause to restlatisfied, since he might at his pleasure have beaten or wounded his enemie, but forgave him; let any wife man judge. To this if it be faid. That the Baron was confirmined to make his submission; that his repentance was enforced and not voluntarie; and therefore no diserace vnto him: I answere, that one may say as well, that it is no diserace to a Theefe, when he is brought to the Gallowesto repent him of the Robberies by him committed, because his repentance also is constrained. And it is true, that enforced repentance is no diffrace in respect of the force, but in respect of the fact: which (but for our finnes to God) makes all repentance shamefull; because all forced repentance is inflicted upon vs for somewhat unworthie of a Gentleman and of an honest man. Nay voluntarie repentance it selfe, as it hath relation to men, ariseth either out of the feare of the ill that may befall vs, or out of the acknowledgement of our owne weakenesse. Certainely, as wise men, and valiant men, doe rather deride pettie injuries or suddaine injuries, that are not offered from malice forethought. then reuenge them: fo men, apt to quarrell, doe commonly suspect their owne valour; and rather defire, that thereby the world should beleeue them to be of great daring, than know any fuch resolution in themselves. For he that knowes himselfe 20 indeede to be a valiant man, scornes to huntafter the opinion.

Now the same power which the Constable and Marshalls of France have, bath also a Marshall of England, or his Deputies; by whose judgement, in all disputes of honour, every mans reputation may be preferred; wee may therefore as well fishmit our selues to the Judge of honour in all disputes of honour, as wee doe submir our selues in all controuersies of liuelihood and life, to the Judges of the Law, And, out of doubt, the inflitution of this Court of Cheualric in England, in France, and elfewhere; was no leffe charitable than politike. For the bloud of man, violently spilt, doth not bring forth honie-bees, as that of Bulls doth, which sting but the fingers or the face : but it produceth that monstrous Beast, Revenge, which bath stung 40 to death, and eaten up of feuerall Nations, fo many noble personages; as there is nothing more lamentable, nor more threatning the wrath of God vpon supreme Gouernours, than the permission.

His Majestie therefore (which Henrie the fourth of France also endeaoured) hath done a most Kingly and Christian like deede in Scotland, which the most renowned of all his Predeceffours could never doe: in beating downe, and extinguishing, that hereditarie profecution of malice, called the deadly fend; a conquest, which shall give him the honour of Prudence and Kingly power, for ever-more. And we have cause to hope, that his royall care shall be no leffe happie in preventing the like mischiefe, which threatens England, by the audacious, common, and braue, yet outragious vaso nitie of Duellifts.

Vnto this that I have spoken of lying, and of man-slaughter, it must be added, That each of these are of great Latitude, and worthic of reproofe and vengeance proportionably, more or leffe, in their feuerall degrees. There is much difference betweene Lies of necessitie vpon breach of promise, or complementall lies; and fuch permicious lies, as proceede from feare and cowardize, or are vetered by false witnesses; the former fort, being excusable by weakenesse or leuitie; the latter, being altogether detestable. No leffe, if not more, difference there is, betweene killing of a man in open field, with cuen weapons; and that killing, which the Scriptures call killing by guile, dolo or per infidus; though our Lawes doe not much diffinguilh them in punishment. For in the latter, God, for saking his owne priviledge, commandeth, but the guilefull murderer bee drawne by force, from the protection of his Altar. Neither is enery guilefull murder performed by the fword, nor by ouert violence: but there is a guilefull murder also, by poisoning; and by the pen, or by a canse, vpon hope of spoile, after such manner as the net is spread before the eyes of the birds. Francis the first, Queene Marie of England, and the Kings Majestie now raigning, have given notable testimonic of their justice, vpon three Noble men, who committed guilefull murder. Of the first kinde, King Francis vpon the Lord of Ta-

lard : who being (faith the French Historian) de haute & ancienne lignee, & supporte de plusieurs grandes alliances; who being of high and ancient linage, and supported by di-uers great alliances, of which the Cardinall of Bellay (in especial fauour with the King) was one, was notwi hitanding delinered ouer into the handes of the Hang-man.

leffe ancient and faithfull, than himfelfe valiant, and greatly friended both at home and abroad. Of killing guilefully by poifon, and of punishment following fuch wicked Artifans; every Age hath had too many examples. Of guilefull killing by the pen (that I may not speake of any English Judge) the Authour of the French Resher-ches gives vs two notable inflances; the one of des Eshars, who (faith Pasauire) fit

mourir Montaigu grand Maistre de France, pour contente l'opinion de celuy dont il estoit

lors idolastre; & Dieu permit que depuis il fut pendu & estrangle; Who caused Montaigu great Master of France to die, to content his minde (to wit, the Duke of Burgoyne) whom ter hanged and strangled. The other was of the Great Francis the first, upon his Chancellor Payet: who, to fatisfie the Kings passion, practifed the destruction of the Ad-mirall Chabot, a man most nobly descended, and of great service. For as in other men, fo in Kings, the passion of lone growes old, and weares out by time. So the Kings affection being changed towards the Admirall, hee charged him with some offences which hee had formerly committed. The Admirall, prefuming youn the great good service which hee had done the King in Piemont, and in the desence of

The last Acts of Scipio in Spaine. His returne to Rome where he is sholen Conful.

THe last businesse that troubled Scipio in Spaine, grew by the rebellion of the People, and mutinie of his Souldiers. He fell dangeroufly fick, in such fort, that the rumor of his death ranne currant throughout Spaine. This encouraged Mandonius and Indibilis, pettie Kings, that had for faken the Carthaginians, and followed Scipio awhile before, to take armes against the Romans. They were vainely perswaded, that after the Carthaginians were driven out, they themselves should become the mightiest in all Spaine. But seeing now, that things were no way answerable to the greatnesse of their hopes; they thought it best, to take the present advantage, and hammer out their owne fortunes. So they rally fell vpon the Sucfetaniand Sedetani, Confederates of the Romans; and walted their Countrie. Part of the Roman Armie lying at Sucro, in stead of making head against these Rebells, grew to be affected with the like diffemper. They had not reaped fuch profit of their Roman conquests. as might fatisfie their defires; or as they thought caffe to bee gotten, if they might be their owne Caruers. Wherefore, when the death of Scipio was reported : they thought, that the time ferued very well, to enrich themselues with spoile of the Countrie. Many outrages they committed: and, which was greatest of all driving away their Colonells, that should have bridled their furie; they chose out of their owne number two base fellowes, Albius Calenus, and Atrius Vinber, to their Coman manders. These tooke vpon them all the Enlignes of Proconsuls, or Propretors: as if this their election had beene like to that, wherein Lucius Martius was chosen by the Souldiers, after the death of the two Scipia's. But whilest they were deuising, what exploits they might doe, for the enriching of them selves, in a time of such combuffion, as was expected; there arrived more certaine newes, that Scipio was both aline, and in good health. There came also new Golonells, fent vnto them from their Generall: who mildly rebuking their want of confideration, and feeming to bee glad that they had no further over-fhot them felues; led them to Carthagena, there to receive their pay. Before their comming, Scipio had resolved to doe exemplarie justice on the principall offenders; and to put the whole multitude of them 40 in feare, of what they had deferued. Therefore hee caused Syllanus to make readie the Companies which lay before in the Towns, as it were to make an Expedition against Mandonius, and Indibilis; He caused Albins and Astring with some thirtie other of their Complices, to be secretly apprehended in their lodgings; He called the Mutiners to affembly; and having them vnarmed as they were, encircled round by Syllanus and his Companies, prepared for the purpose; hec bitterly inuciahed against them all, as Traitors. This done; Albim, and Atrim, with the other prisoners, were haled to the stake; where they were whipt, and beheaded, as was the Roman custome toward such offenders. The rest of the Souldiers, to the number of being Spaniards, and greater offenders, of harder measure, Scipio went against them; and found them in a Valley, that was scarce large enough to hold all their Armie. In the entrance thereof hee fought with them : and fending Lelius with all his horse to fetch a compasse about the Hills, and charge them in reare; he ouerthrew them. Indibilis and Mandonius had after this no hope remayning, to preferue themselves and their effaces, otherwise than by making submission. Mandonius therefore came to Scipio: and humbly crauing pardon, both for himselfe, and for his brother Indibilis. obtayned his request; yet so, that they were taught to acknowledge themselves lesse

Afterward Scipio went toward Gades : and was met on the way by Masanissa; who fecretly promifed to doe him all feruice, if the People of Rome would fend him to make Warre in Africk. Vnto Mago that lay in Gades, came directions from Carthage; that letting all care of Spaine alone, he should thence depart with his fleet into Italie; and there wage an Armie of Gaules, and Ligurians, to joyne with Hannibal. For this purpose, was monie sent vnto him from Carthage; and he himselfe laid hold voon all that he could finde in the Towne of Gades; without sparing either private men, the common treasurie, or the Temples. In his voiage thence, hee landed at Carthagena: hoping to have taken it by surprise. But hee failed in the attempt; and was so beaten to his ships, that he returned back to repose himselfe awhile at Gades. The Gaditanes, offended with the robberies and spoile that hee had made at his taking leave of them, would not fuffer him to enter againe into their Citie. By this hee forefaw, that it would not bee long ere they became Roman. Wherefore fending Messengers into the Towne, to complaine of this vincourteous dealing, hee allured their Magistrates forth vinto him; whom, not withstanding all the excuse that they could make, he whipt, and crucified. This done, he followed his former intended voiage; bidding Spaine farewell for euer.

The Isleand Citie of Gades, was yeelded to the Romans, presently after the departure of Mago. Then did Scipio deliuer up the Province, to those that were fent from Rome to succeede him therein : and himselfe with ten ships returned home. At his comming to Rome he made fuite for the honour of a triumph. But it was denied 30 him: for that it had as yet been granted vnto no Proconful; excepting to fuch, as received that dignitie after a Confulfhip, as it were by prorogation. But to make amends for this repulse; the election of new Consul's being then in hand, by generall voice of the Citie P. Cornelius Scipio was chosen Conful; and P. Licinius Crassus joyned with him. This Crassus, being high Pricit, or Bishop of the Romans; might not, by the custome of those times, goe farre from the Citie; as being to intend the matters of their superstition: though Cafar, and others, who in ages following held the same Office; were staied by no such religious impediment, from being farre, and long ablent. Hereby it came to pale, that scipe desiring to have the Warre transferred into Africk, was in no danger to loofe that honourable charge, by any mischance of lot, in the division of Provincies; for that his Colleague was not capable of emploiment to farre off.

A XXIII.

SCIPIO obtaines leaue to make warge in Africk. His preparations. Of MA-SANISSA who toyned with Scipio. The victories against ASDRVBAL and SYPHAX.

VB. CORNELIUS SCIPIO, and P. LICINIUS CRASSUS, entring into their Confullhip, held a meeting of the Senate in the Capitol: wherein it was decreed, that Scipio should be allowed, to bestow part of the monie which he had brought out of Spaine into the treasurie; vpon the fetting forth of folemne plaies, that he had vowed to make.

whilest he was busied in his Spanish warres. This helped well to reviue the memorie of his victories alreadie gotten; and to giue hope vnto the People of greater vi-Stories in the warre, which he intended to make in Africk. To the same purpose, did the Spanish embassages availe much in the Senate, especially that of the Saguntines; who magnified his actions, highly and descruedly; saying, That they were the most happie of all their Countrimen, fince they being present, had seene him chosen Conful, and should carrie home such joyfull newes. The Saguntine Embassadours, were louingly entertained by the Senate; as their faith to Rome, though coffly it were both to them, and to the Romans, had well deferued. Neuertheleffe, when Seipio proposed, that Africk might be decreed vnto him for his Prouince : there wanred not many, even of the principall men, that vehemently gainefeld him. Of thefe was Q. Fabius Maximus the chiefe: who feemes to have been troubled with that difcase; which too often causeth men renowned for long approued vertue, to looke asquint upon the actions of those, that follow them in the same kinde. Hee alleaged many reasons against the purpose of the Conful: whereof the chiefe were. That the treasurie was ynable to sustaine the charges of a warre in Africk; and that it was extremely perillous to hazard fo great forces, where they could not at pleafure beerecalled, vnto the defence of Rome it felfe, if neede required. Hercunto he added many wordes concerning the danger wherein Italie flood, not only of Hannibal, but of Ma-

30 go his brother, that was arming the Ligurians: as also concerning the honour of the Conful; which would (he faid) be greater in fetting Italie free from enemies, than it could be in doing any harme to Africk. Neither did he forget, both to cleuate the Spanish warres, as of leffe moment than the intended voiage against Carthage; nor withall to lay great blame vpon Scipio, for having suffered Afdrubal to passe into Italie: shewing, that it was greatly to be feared, least the like might happen againe; and that a new Armie, not withflanding the good successe of Scipio ( if it happed to bee good) might be sent from Carthage, to the vitter endangering of Rome, whill the Roman forces were emploied abroad. But the main point which he viged, was, That neither the Senate had ordained, nor the People commanded, Africk to be that yeare o a Province: which the Conful nevertheleffe propounded in fuch wife, as if it were a matter alreadic concluded, and no longer to be argued. Scipio on the other fide, infifted voon this one point; That it was better to make an offenfine, than a defenfine warre: especially against such as the Carthaginians; who being ill provided of able men at home, did furnish themselves by helpe of monie, with levies made abroade. As for the care of Italie, he doubted not, but P. Licinius his Colleague, would becase well able to discharge it now, as others had done in times of greater danger. So promifing to draw Hannibal into Africk, for defence of his owne home; and taxing as ciuilly as he could, the enuie of Fabius, which withstood such a gallant enterprise; hee proposed the matter againe vnto the Senate. Much altercation there was about the so manner of his proceeding: for a fmuch as it was notifed abroad, that if hee could not bring the Senate to his minde, he would carrie it by the People. This offended many of the Ancients: who refented in this honorable man a little spice of that arrogancie, which in following ages, grew to be much hotter in those that had commanded long abroad. But in conclusion, Scipio referred himselfe wholly vnto the Senates good will and pleasure; whereby hee obtained thus much, That the Isle of Sicil might be appointed vnto him for his Province; with leaue to passe ouer into Africk, if he found it expedient.

Want of monic, and no great liking to his voiage, made the Roman Senate have little care to furnish out Scipio to the warre, by him intended upon Africke. Herewithall it fell out, that Mago, comming on the Suddaine from the Baleares to Genua. and winning the Towne, bred a feare of no leffe terrible inualion vpon Italie, than that which Afdrubal had lately made. He could not indeed eraife any great Armie of the Ligurians; for that he found them distracted with civill warres. Therefore he was driven to make choice of his partie; and to helpe those whom hee thought fitteft for his turne, against the others. This troublesome businesse, though it occurried more of histime, than he could willingly have spared : yet it got him reputation by his victories; and made the vnfteadie Gaules readie to enter into his pay. Hereupon the differred Legions of the Romans, that under Proconfuls, and Pretors, lay readic to be emploied where need should require; were directed vnto the borders of Lome bardie, and Liguria, there to make head against Mago. But all his menaces passed a. way in vapour. For a fleet, either comming to his aide from Carthage, or by him fent thither (the report is vacertaine) loaden with the bootie that hee had taken; fell into the hands of the Roman Pretor, that governed in Sardinia. This did much difable him : and though after awhile, there came letters from Carthage, together with 20 flore of monic, heartning him in his proceedings: yet some impediments which he found, and that fatall voiage of Scipio into Africk, diffurbed all; and made him bee recalled home.

Againt Hamilal, was nothing done this yeare. Neither was any thing done by him, of which the Roman Hillorians haue beene pleafed to take notice. Only it is faid, that he fpent the fommer by the Temple of Inno Launia, where he railed an Altar, with a huge Title of all that he had performed, grauen in Punike, and Greeke letters. Such accompt of winnings past, is commonly in Gamesters that are at the hight of their fortune, a cause of remission, and careclassific; in those that are youn the loosing hand, a cause both of the same for the present, and shortly after of dejection, when they finde a notable change. A great pelisine, chiefting both the Cara theyinian, and the Roman Campe, is said to haue beene the occasion of this yeares idlensific which sell not our much amissific for the Citic of Rome, that was marual lously empoureished by this warre; and had alreadic tried the vtmost way to defray the charges, which grew insupportable. To relieve the present necessific, it was well thought youn, that agreat part of Campania (not many yeares since consiste ted) should bee fold, or te our: in which bargaine, that the Citie might receive no losses the tenth part of the fine was ordained as a reward, wnto the detectors of lands concealed.

Of this, or other monie, none was giuen to Scipio. Neither was hee allowed to Mofthis, or other monie, none was giuen to Scipio. Neither was hee allowed to Make pressed of Souldiers for his African voiage; a neither did hee ouer-much labour to obtain eit. That which the Senate refused, the People did for him: or rather they did it for themselves; that were therein wifer than the Senate. It is vsually found in Councells of estate; that the busic, or obstinate heads of a few, doecarrical the rest. And many times, men make a furrender or other ownejudgements, to the wisedome that hath gotten it selfe a name, by giuing happie direction in troubles forepast. Therefore, hee that reposeth himselfe vyon the aduice of many, shall often sinde him selfe deceived: the counsalie of those many being wholly directed by the empetr of a few, that ouer-sway the rest. Passius was accounted the Oracle of his time: for his warie nature forted well with the businesse, that were growne old in following one course, that other of the Senators, that were growne old in sollowing one course, from which they could not shift, as sthe change of times required. But the People (who though they could not well aduise, and deliberate, yet could well apprehend) embraced the needfull refolution of Scipio: in fuch fort, that belides his Roman forces, he had from divers parts of Italie about feuen thousand. Voluntaries. He had also prouision from the seuerall Townes; Corne, Iron, Canuas for failes. Axes, Beede hookes, Hand-mills, and the like implements, Firre for building of thips, many thousands of Targets, Helmets, and Speares of all kindes : every place furnishing him with that commoditie, which it best could affoord. Vnto this willingueffe of the People, the diligence of Sapie was correspondent. In the compaffe of five and fortie daies, he had both feld his Timber, built, and lanched, twentie Trireme, and ten Quinquereme Gallies; wherewith hee transported his Armie into 10 Sicil. In Sicil he found, besides other forces, two Legions, that had served at Canna: which were old Souldiers, and (as hee himfelfe well knew) not guiltie of the ouerthrow; for which they had long vnder-gone a heavie censure. They had ferued under Marcellus, and Leuinus, at the taking of many Cities, and ftrong peeces : in which regard, they were like to bee of good vie to him in a frick; where would bee flore of fuch emploiment. For increasing the number of his horse, hee pressed three hundred Sicilians, all wealthie yong men, and fuch as loued well their eafer These he afterward discharged from the Warre, highly to their contentment : but with condition, that they should deliuer their Horse and Armes, to as many Roman Gentlemen; which hee brought ouer with him for the purpose. Whilest hee was prouiding, to have things in a readinesse for Africk; the banished Locrians that followed the Roman fide, made him acquainted with an intelligence, whereby they hoped to recouer their Citie. Some handicrafts men, that wrought for the Carthaginians in one of the Citadells of Locri (for there were two in the Towne) being taken prisoners by the Romans, promised to betray the place, if they might be ransomed, and rewarded. Scipio being aduertised of this, gaue order to have the attempt made by night: which happily succeeded; and that Citadell was surprifed. The other Citadell was strongly defended by the Carthaginian Garrison: which fent to Hannibal for aide. The Romans in like fort, fearing leaft their owne paucitie should make them too weake for Hannibal, craued helpe of the Conful Scipio. The Townsfmen, were doubtfully affected : but the best, and most of them inclining to the Romans, kept Hannibal out; whom the comming of Scipio caused thence to depart; and caused likewise the Carthaginian Garrison to abandon the other Citadell. Many outrages were committed by the Roman Souldiers, that were left by Scipio incultodie of the Towne. Wherefore a vehement complaint was made by the Locrians ynto the Roman Senate; not only against those of the Garrison; but much more against Pleminius the Captaine, who gaue bad example, and was worse than all the rest. Besides many Murders, Robberies, Rapes, and other Villanies: the Temple of Proferpina, that had a great fame of fanctitie, was spoiled by these barbarous Theeues. The Locrians therefore aduited the Senate, to make prefent a-40 mends to the Goddeffe for this facriledge : faying, that the like had neuer been committed, without notorious vengeance by her taken vpon the Authors. The Senate gaue good eare to this complaint; comforted the Locrians, and redreffed the injuries done vnto them; fent for Pleminius, with other principall the offenders, whom they cast into prison, and vsed according to their deserts: as also they restored vnto Proferpina her monie twice told. But old Q. Fabius was not herewithall contented. He laid much of the blame vpon Scipio, that had placed fuch a manin Locri; and had not carefully hearkned to the complaints made against him, but suffered him to runne on in these his wicked courses. By the sharp inucctive that Fabius made, others tooke courage to speake what they pleased: as well against the demeanor of Scipio, as against the diffoluteneffe of his Armie; which lay, as they faid, idle in Sicil, neither mindfull of any service toward, nor fit for it if neede should require. Finally, things were so farre vrged, thatten Legates were fent ouer into Sicil, together with the Pretorappointed for that Iland; two of the Tribunes, and one of the Adiles, who should examine these matters; and either cause the Generall to returne into Italie, or continue him in his charge, as they thought fit. The end of all was : they found him fo well prepared against Carthage, as that they hastned him on his journie; and gaue him high commendations at their returne.

Scipio had alreadic emploied Lalius in Africk; ratherto make discouerie, than to worke any other great effect of warre. He tooke a great bootie : and ftruck no little terrour into the Carthaginians; who faw their affaires to bee vpon termes of change. But the greatest fruit of his journie was, That speaking with Majaniffa, he well informed himselfe of the flate of Africk; and knew what was to bee expected of those two Kings, that had promifed to joyne with the Romans at their landing.

Concerning Masanissa his revolt from the Carthaginians, and his compact made vnder-hand with the Romans : Liuie doth professe, That there was no such euident cause thereof at the present; but that the long continuance of his faith and constaneie, in following times, must belpe to proue, that this his change was not without fome good caule. But Appianus (an Historian farre inferiour to Linie, both in Worth and Time) giues one reason so probable of this, and many accidents thereto belonging, as that it carries with it a great appearance of necessarie truth. Only the doubt is, How it could any way come to passe, that the knowledge of such a matter should haue escaped the diligence of Linie, if it had beene true : vnleffe wee should beleeue. that he wilfully forbare to rehearle a Tragedie; the forrow whereof would cause * Appian Alex- men to thinke amiffe of Scipio. How loeuer it was, thus * Appian tells it: and many 20 circumstances of things done confirme it. Afdrubal, the sonne of Gifco, had a faire daughter, whom both King Syphasiand Majaniffaloued. Majanifia, being brought up at Carthage, and being withall a goodly gentleman of person, and excellent in qualities, was chosen by Afarubal to be his sonne-in-law. When the virgin was betrothed vnto him be went into Spaine, and there did great feruice. But afterwards, the Carthaginian Senate thought the mariage of Afarabals daughter to be a matter of State: and bestowed her upon Syphax; without standing to acquaint her father or Masanisa therewithall. This they did, for that Syphax was the more mightic Prince; and for that the indignitic of the repulse, had made him become their enemie. Hereof Ma/amisa was advertised; and forthwith entred into intelligence with Scipio, secretly as he thought; yet not so secretly, but that some notice was taken of it: which would have cost him his life, had he not with great circumspection conveighed himselfe home in to his fathers Kingdome. Thus farre forth we may beleeve Appianus: all the narration well cohering with things past, and following. Only it seemes, that how soeuer Sophonisbathe daughter of Afdrubal, was promifed by the Carthaginians vnto Syphax: vet fince this their courtesie proceeded from seare, He thought it wisdome to continue and increase the same their feare, by making faire promises to the Romans; vntill A SDR VB AL had fent for his daughter from Carthage, and the marriage was confummated. In other matters concerning the warre it selfe, wherein Appian differs much from Linie, and from Polybius, whom (as appeares by the broken peeces of his works 40 remaining) Liuie did follow; it will be no offence, to take litle heed vnto his reports.

Malanilla was the fonne of Gala, a King of the Numidians: whose father dying, the Crowne descended, by order of the Countrie, vnto Desalees the brother, not vnto Mafanisha the sonne. But this Vncle of Masanissa shortly died : and his elder sonne, who tooke possession of the Kingdome, was vanquished, and slaine in battaile by a Rebeli that made himfelfe Protector ouer the yonger which was a child. The Traitor fortified himselse against Masamssa, whose returns hee feared; by Alliances with the Carthaginians and Syphax. But all would not serve: He, and his Pupill, were disposfeffed of their Estates by Mafaniffa; that was a skilfull Warriour, and well beloued for the memorie of his father Gala. The Carthaginians in reason should have beene 50 glad, that Masanissa, who had done them notable service, was thus confirmed in his Effate: had they not been guiltie of the injurie by them done vnto him; whilft his Vncle or Cosen raigned, and hee seemed vnlikely to stand them in any stead. But Syphan, by their procurement, and perhaps by his owne malice towards his Corriual, warred upon him; and oner-charging him with numbers, draue him out of his Kingdome. Neuertheleffe Malaniffa still retayned the hearts of his people; and thereby remayned firong enough, to infest both Syphax and the Carthaginians. though he was often put in distresse, by great forces that were sent against him. He therefore keeping much about the leffer Syrtis, betweene the borders of the Carthaginians and the Nation of the Garamants, expected the comming of the Romans; yet fo, as he made long roades ouer all the Countrie, even as farre as to Hippo; and when Lelius arrived thereabouts, exhorted and encouraged him to haften on Scipio to the invalion of Africk.

But Syphax, in whose great aide and succour was reposed more hope of good succeffe, than could be expected from the good will of poore Mafaniffa; fent an Embaffage into Sicil about the fame time, which was little pleafing vnto Scipio. He excufed himselfe of his promise lately made: and signified his alliance with the Garthaginians; adding, That hee could not choose but fight for the defence of Africke: wherein he was borne and raigned; and for defence of his beloued wives Countrie. if it were inuaded. Neuertheleffe he promifed to remaine a Neuter; fo long as the Romans and Carthaginians held warre abroad, farre enough from Africk, as hitherto they had done. This meffage halfned Scipio in his Expedition, much more than any perswasion could have done. For the promised affistance of Syphax had not a little aduanced his enterprise; in procuring both the aftent of the Senate, and the forwardnesse of many Aduenturers. Lest therefore the failing of this hope, should worke too great a change in common opinion; He thought it the best way, to preuent all discourse, and set the warre vndertaken immediately on soot. The Embasfadours he dismissed in all haste, with letters to their King; wherein hee willed him to confider, that what he had promifed he had also sworne; and therefore should doe well to make it good. Having fent them away . Hee called his Souldiers together, and bade them make readie for the voiage; which he intended no longer to deferre. For, faid he, Masanissa hath beene with Lalius and Syphax hath newly sent to me; greatly wondering vpon what I should thus stay; and saying, that they will prouide for themselves, if I faile their expectation by tarrying any longer. This fine tale preuented all further inquisition, that might elfe haue beene made concerning the message of these Embassadours; whose followers had beene seene walking vp and downe Syrgen/e. And left any thing should afterwards breake out, that might hinder the businesse, Scipio immediately sent about his fleet ynto Lilybaum and toquefting by letters M. Pomponius, that was Pretor in Sicil, to meet him, there; hafted thither with his Armie. At Lilybaum he agreed with the Pretor, about the division of the Legions betweene them; which to leave behinde for defence of the Hand; and which to carrie with him into Africk. What numbers hee transported, it is not certaine : some Historians reckoning only wen thousand foot, and two and twentie to hundred horse; others increasing them to five and thirtie thousand, horse and foot. Concerning his directions for embarking, and other matters belonging to their course, I hold it needlesse to set them downe : since they were points of ordinarie care, and which it is like that neither he, when he tooke his voiage into Spaine, nor others upon like occasions, have omitted; they being also word for word set downer by an Historian, who borrowed them from Linie, and fitted them to a Prince of

This Roman Armie landed in Africk, neare vnto a Fore-land then called the faire ... Promontorie: which how farre it was from Carthage, or toward what point of the Compasse, I cannot precisely affirme; because it is vncertaine, whether it were that 50 Cape or Head-land which bore the name of Mercurie, and lay to the North-cast of Carthage: or whether that of Apollo, which lay Northerly from Carthage, and by West. The comming of Masanissa vnto Scipio at his first arrivall, helpes to confirme the opinion of Xylander: who thinkes the faire Promontorie to have beene the fame; that was also called Mercuries Cape, fince with little difficultie Masanissa might come Aaaaaa 2

thither from the leffer Syrtis, whereabout was his common abiding. But for a fmuch as without any memorable impediment, soone after his arrivall, Scapio encamped before Vica, that flood Westward from Carthage beyond the River Bagradas: it may rather feeme, that hee landed within the Promontorie of Apollo; whence the way to Vica was not long. This is also strongly proued; for that out of Carthage were fent, the next day, fine hundred horse to trouble him in his disembarking. Neither was it so hard for Masanissa, that roued about the Countrie with a troupe of horse. to finde out the Romans, though they landed farre from the place to the which hee viually reforted, like as before he had met with Lelius at Hippo that was farther off: as it would have beene for Scipio, with his Armie and Carriages, to ouer come the trouble of a long journie, and fetch a great compaffe to Viica by Land; when hee might have disembarqued nearer vnto it. Neuerthelesse it may passe as a conjecture. That Scipio came first of all to Emporia; a plentifull Region about the leffer Syrtis; fince he gaue charge to the Masters of his ships, at the letting forth from Lilybeum. to shape their course for that coast. The Countrie thereabout was very rich, and fit for fustenance of an Armie: neither were the Inhabitants warlike, or well prouided to make relistance. Thus much perhaps Mafanissa had signified voto Lalius, when he foake with him at Hippo: thinking that the Romans, how focuer they made braue promises, would not come strong enough to fight at head. But when hee saw their fleet and Armie to be such, as not only scrued to invade the Lands of Carthage, but 20 threatned a conquest of the Citic, and whole Estate : then might hee better aduise them to fet faile for Vice, and make warre vpon the Enemies at their ownedoores.

The Carthagenians had at that time neither any Captaine of great worth at home, nor better Armie than of raw Souldiers; that were leuied, or to bee leuied in hafte. as drubal the sonne of Gisco, the same that had lately beene chaced out of Spaine by Scipio, was their best man of warre. And good enough perhaps he was thought by Hanno and his fellowes, of whose faction he was or if ought were wanting in him, vet his Riches and Nobilitie, together with the affinitie of King Syphax, made him passeable. He was at that present with the King his sonne-in-law, working him (no doubt) against the Romans: when letters were brought from Carthage, both to Sy- 20 phase and to him, informing them of the Inualion: entreating the one of them to giue affistance; and comanding the other to make his repaire vnto the Citie, where he was chosen Generall. But ere these could be readie, Scipio had beaten the troupe of Carthaginian horse, that were sent out of the Citie to disturbe his landing; and flaine Hanno a yong Gentleman, that was their Leader. He had also taken and sacked a Towne of the Carthaginians: wherein, besides other bootie, hee tooke eight thousand prisoners; all which he conveighed aboard his Hulkes or ships of burden, and fent them back loaden into Sicil. Hee tooke likewise a Towne called Salera; which he held and fortified. In Salera lay another Hanno, with foure thousand Numidian horse: whose service being sitter for the field, than for defence of walled places; made Scipio to perceive the vaskilfulnesse of their Leader, that had thus housed them. Wherefore he fent Masanissa before him : who rode up to the gates; and, by making a Brauado, trained out the improvident Hanno fo farre, that hee drew him vnto a place, where the Romans lay in wait for him. The victorie was eafily gotten; and Hanno cither taken, or flaine. With those that fled, the Romans entred pell-mell into the Towne; which presently they made their owne. Thence went Scipio to * Lib.5. cap.2. Vtica, a Citie of great importance, * of which mention hath beene formerly made; and fate downe before it. Fortie daies hee spent about it : affailing it both by Land and Sea, and vling all his engines of batterie whereof hee had plentie; yet was in no likelihood of prenailing. And now the Sommer was quite spent: so that it was time 50 for him to choose a place, and fortifie his Winter-campe; which must bee well stored against the yeare following. Whilest thus necessitie vrged him to leave Vica: and shame of taking the repulse in his first great enterprise, rather than any hope of better successe, caused him to stay there : Astrobal and Syphax gave him the honour of a faire pretence to leave the fiege. Afdrubal had made a Levie of thirtie thoufand foot, and three thousand horse; yet aduentured not with this ill-trained Armic to draw neare vnto the Romans, beforethe comming of Syphax. Syphax brought with him vnto Carthage fiftie thouland foot, and ten thouland horse; which joyning vnto the forces of Aldrabal, they marched brauely toward Scipio; who thereby tooke occasion to dislodge. He chose for his Winter-campe the bankes of an Inler, that had good harbour for his Nauie. His foot-men he lodged on a Promontorie, joyning to the Continent by an arme of Land: his horse-men he bestowed your lower ground on the other shore in the bottome of the Creeke he mored his ships: and there hee quartered the Mariners, with all that belonged vnto the fleet. The whole Campe he firongly fortified; and fo attended the feafon of the yeare; when it should serve him agains to fight. Of captails and other bootie Masanilla had brought in great store; by driving the Countrie, before the comming of Afdrubal and Syphax. Corne also he had gotten some and great store was fent him from Sicil and Sardinia. Likewise apparrell for his Souldiers, was fent from home; or from Sardinia: though scarce enough to serue turne; for that it was a matter of more cost, The ships that brought these things, he freighted homewards with such part of his bootie, as he could best spare; especially with Captines, to bee fold for flanes. Afdrubal and Syphax encamped near vnto Scipio vnot fo ftrongly fortifying themselues. as did the Romans; either for that they wanted the feuere inflitution, which the Romans yled in discipline of Warre; or for that they presumed upon their muleitude, against which they found in Scipio no disposition to iffue foith of his strength, and fight. So the Winter passed without action When Spring drew neare; Scipio thought it good to affay his old friend the Numidian King, if perhaps he might bee wonne by perswasions to for sake the Carthaginians. It was confidered, that those Barbarians were naturally vnconstant; and particularly, that Syphax had given proofe before this of his much lenitie. It might therefore be hoped, That having wearied himselfe, by lodging a whole Winter in the Campe; and being peraduenture no lesse wearie with satietie of his wife, who 20 had caused him to enter into this warre : Hee might bee moved with a little entreatie, to with-draw himselfe homeinto his Kingdome, and rest a Neuter. But it is not vnlikely, that such a friend as this King, had beene highly entertained and honored in the Citic of Carthage, which was neare at hand, as often as during this Winter it had pleased him, or as he had beene inuited, to make a step thither and repose himfelfe a while : his wife Queene Sophonisba lying also there at the same time, to cherish him in his resolution. How socuer it were, Syphax did only make an overture of peace: propounding it as reasonable, That Hannibal should be recalled out of Italie by the Carthaginians: and that the Romans in like fort should quietly depart out of Africk; and so make an end of the Warre, wherewith now both Africk and Europe were disquieted. Vnto this would not Scipio at the first give care: yet being pressed earnestly by many messages from Syphax, and desiring to continue the inter-course of Embassadours: He beganne to make shew, as if he would consider of the motion. He was given to understand by those whom he had sent unto the King, That the Enemies had their Campes without any great defence of earth, full of woodden Cabbins, and coucred with boughes; and that the Numidians, such of them as came first with Syphax, vsed couerings of Mats and Reedes; others, that came later, had thatched their lodgings with drie boughes and leaues: vnder which they lay carelefly without their Trenches. Vpon this aduertisement hee bethought himselfe, That it would not be hard for him to fet their camps on fire; and thereby give them so a notable ouerthrow. Without helpe of some such stratageme, Hee foresaw that it would be a worke of great difficultie for him, to proceede in his warres when time should serve. It was a plaine open Gountrie wherein he lay: and the Enemies had great aduantage of him in number, especially in horse, which, vpon such ground, could not be relisted by the Roman Legions. The longer therefore that he thought

vpon the matter : the more needfull he found it for himfelfe, to make some sudden attempt vpontheir Campe. To this end hee fent many Embaffadours, vnder pretence of treating about the Peace; but indeede of purpole to discouer all that might concerne the intended furprife. With these Embassadours he sent, as Attendants. many old Souldiers disguised like slaves; that wandring (as it were ) idlely vo and downe the Campe, might observe the waies and entrances, with whatsoever else was needfull. When hee had learned as much as hee defired; you the fudden hee fent word to Syphax, that it was vaine to hold any longer Treatie, for a fruich as he could not get the confent of his Councell of warre; without whose approbation, all that himselfe could doe was no more, than the good will of one man. This he did, to the 10 end that, without any breach of faith, he might put his deligne in execution. The Truce being thus cut off: Adrubal and Syphax were very penfine; as having lately perswaded themselves, that their trouble was almost at an end. But since it could be no better: they beganne to denife by what arte they might draw Scipie out of his campe; and prouoke him to battaile in those Plaines. This if they could doe; they hoped to make his Councell of warre repent as greatly the refufall of peace, as did M. Atilian after the like prefumption. But if he should refuse to come forth of his Trenches; what elfe remained than to beliege him? which they themselves were well able to doe by Land; and the Carthaginian fleet should doe by Sea, that was making readie for the purpose. By such discourses these two comforted themselves: 20 recompencing in conceipt the loffe of their hopes palt, with that of victorie to come. But herein they were extremely and worthily disappointed : for that, confulting about the future, they provided not against present danger; but continued in the fame nealigence, which was growne vpon them by the long discourse of peace. As for Scipio, Hee was not idle; but made preparation out of hand; as it were to doe fomewhat against Vica. Two thousand Souldiers he had made readje; and appointed to take the same peece of ground, whereon hee lay against Ptics before. This he did, partly to keepe fecret that which he had in hand, left being suspected by his owne Souldiers, the Enemie might happen to have notice of it; partly to hinder those of Vica from setting vpon the few, that hee purposed to leave behinde him in 20 his campe. He caused his men that night to suppe well and betimes; that they might be readic for the journie. After supper, he appointed such Companies as he thought fit, vnto the defence of his Campe; all the rest of his Armie he led forth, about nine of the clock at night. The Carthaginians lay from him feuen miles and an halfe: whom he purposed to vindertake himselfe with the one halfe of his armie; the other halfe he committed vnto Lalius and Mafaniffa, whom hee fent before him to fet vpon the Campe of Syphax, that was farther off. It was his meaning, that the campe of Syphax should be on a light fire, ere he would meddle with the Carthaginians. For the fire might feeme to have taken hold by casualtie vpon the Numidians, that lay farther off: whereas if it first appeared in the campe of Afdrubal, it would bee suspe- 40 Etcdas the doing of enemies; and give Syphax warning to looke ynto himselfe. To this end therefore Scipio marched faire vnd foftly: that Lalius and Malanilla, who had a longer journie, and were to fetch a compasse about for feare of being discougred, might have time to get before him, and doe their feat. It was about two or three of the clock in the morning, when the campe of Syphax beganne to blaze : which not only the Numidians, but their King himfelfe, imputed vnto casualtie; as thinking themselues safe enough from Enemies, for that the Carthaginians lay interposed betweene them and the danger. Wherefore as if there were no more to doe, fome, flarting halfe afleepe; and others, that had fitten vp late at drinking; ranne out of their Cabbins to quench the fire: But fuch was the tumult, that they neither could 50 rightly understand in what case they were; nor give remedie to the mischance, as it was supposed. Many were smothered, and burnt in the flame, which grew greater and greater : many, leaping into the Trenches for feare of the fudden mischiefe. were trampled to death by the multitude that followed them. They that escaped the fire, fell ypon the Enemies fword, which was readic to receive them. Especially Malanilla, that best knew the Countrie, did great execution your them; having laid all the waies, by which he foresaw that they would seeke to escape. The Carthagimians perceiving this fire, thought none other than that it was a pittifull mischance. fo that some range out to helpe the poore Numidians; carrying only what would ferue to quench the fire. Others ranne up to the Rampart : where, feareleffe of any danger towards themselves, they flood beholding the greatnesse of the slame, and lamenting the misfortune. This fell outright as Scipio would have it. Hee therefore loft no time; but fetting vpon those that were running towards the Numidians. no he killed some, and pursued the rest back into their campe; which in a little while he made to burne as bright, as did that of Syphax. Aldrubal feeing this, and knowing that the Romans were there, did not fland to make reliftance, but shifted only for himselfe, and escaped with a few of his borse about him. If Hannibal, or any of the Barchine faction, had beene taken in fuch a manner; it is more than probable, that old Hanno would have judged him worthie to be crucified. It would then have been faid. That with leffe than one halfe of thirtie thousand men, bee might at least hance given some bad recompence, to them that were taking paines in kindling these fires. had he not beene only carefull how to fauchis owne fearefull head. Neuertheleffe Politius acknowledgeth, and it is most likely to have beene true, That if Adrubal, Except Pol or any of those about him, would have striven to shew valour, when the camb was 116-14. once on fire : He should not thereby have done any manner of good; because of the tumult and consternation. I shall not neede to tell what a searcfull thing it was, to heare the cries of fo many thousands that perished by fire and sword, or to behold. the cruell frame that confumed them; which (as Polybius affirmes) none that hath being is able to describe. It is enough to say, That of those many thousands very few did escape; which accompanied A/drubal and Syphax in their severall waies of flight. Befides these also there were some scatterers, especially of the Numidians, that saved themselues in the darke : but they were not many; as after shall appeare. Surely it must needes have beene very hard to tell, how many were burnt or otherwise made away; and what numbers escaped in the darke of night. Wherefore Linie, who in two Campes. Aldrubal, putting himselfe into the next Towns that was very strongly fortified; thought there to finde the Romans worke, vntill the Carthaginians at good lei-40 fure might repaire their Armie. He had with him no more than two thousand foot. and five hundred horse: which he thought sufficient to defend the Towne; if the Townsmen would not be wanting to themselves. But he found the Inhabitants of the place very earnest in contention, whether it were better to fight, or to veeld. Vnto this disputation, hee well foresaw that the arrivall of Scipio would soone sine an end. Wherefore, left they should lay hold vpon him, and seeke the Victors fanour by delivering him vp; Heeshrunke away betimes, and made all haste to Carthage. As for the Towne, which hee left; it opened the gates to Scipio, at his first comming : and thereby preferued it felfe from all manner of losse. The two next Townes adjoyning would needes bee valiant, and make countenance of warre : but their strength not being answerable, they were soone taken by Scipio; who abandoned them to the pleasure of his Souldiers. This done, hee returned to the siege

the rest of this Relation, as often elsewhere, doth follow Polybius: may seeme to horse, to haueescaped; fortie thousand to haue perished by sword or fire; and aboue fixe thouland to have beene taken prisoners: the whole number of all which together, is farre short of fourescore and thirteene thousand, which were in these

The Carthaginians were fore troubled, as they had good reason; when, in stead of either Peace or Victorie, which they lately hoped for they heard newes of fuch a lamentable lamentable ouerthrow. Necessitic enforced them to make hastic provision for the future: but how to doe it, few of them faw any meanes. Some gane aduice to craue peace of Scipio: others, to fend for Hannibal out of Italie; but the most, and they which finally preuailed, were of opinion, That notwithstanding the losse of this Armie, they might well defend themselues against the Romans, by raising new forces: especially, if Syphax would not leave them. It was therefore concluded. That they should bend all their care this way: leuving in all haste another Armie; and Sending Embaffadours to deale with Syphax, who lay then at a Towne called Abba. not passing eight miles from Carthage. Immediately the same their infortunate Commander, Astrubal the sonne of Gisco, was imploied to make new leuies of men: 10 and Queene Sophonisba went forth with Embassadors to her husband Syphax; who having gathered together as many as he could, of his subjects that had escaped from the late flaughter, was thinking to returne into his owne Kingdome. Sophonishalaboured fo with her husband, that at length shee wonne him to her owne desire. And it fell out at the same time, that foure thousand Spaniards, waged by the Carthaginians, were brought ouer to ferue in Africk. Of these were made such braue reports: as if their courage, and the armes which they vied, were not to be relifted. Euen the multitude within Carthage beleeved these tales, and were more glad than they had cause to be; which is great wonder, fince in one Age, the whole Countrie of Spaine had beene twice conquered, first, by the Carthaginians themselves, and after by the 20 Romans. But with Syphax these tales prevailed much: which the Carthaginian Embaffadours helped with a lie; faying, that there were come ten thousand of these terrible Spaniards. Vpon this confidence, the people of Carthage and their friends gathered such spirit, that in thirtie daies they made up an Armie consisting wellneare of thirtie thousand men; reckoning the Spaniards, and Syphase with his Wumidians, in the number. So they encamped in a Region called the great fields, about fine daies journie from Vtica. Scipio hearing of this, came from Vtica thither, to visit them: leaving behinde him his impediments, with some part of his Armie: to make a shew of continuing the siege. Two or three daies, after the meeting of both Armies, passed away in skirmish; without any great thing done. It had now beene time for Asarba, to follow the example of the Roman, Fabius; and seeketo wearie out the Enemie by delaies. But either (which is likely) hee was a farre worfe Commander; or elfe it was not in his power, to give fuch directions as best pleased himfelfe. The fourth day the Armies met in battaile: wherein the Romans were marshalled by Scipio after their wonted manner; having their Italian horse in the right wing; and Masanisa with his Numidians in the left. On the contrarie fide. Aldrubal and his Carthaginians had the right wing; Syphax, the left; and the Spaniards, the Battaile. The victorie was gotten without many blowes: for the vntrained followers of Syphan and Astrubal, could not fultaine the first charge of the Italians, or of Mafanissia. Only the Spaniards fought a long time, even till they were all in a manner flaine : rather as men desperate, and not hoping for mercie, since they were thus come ouer to fight against Scipio, who had otherwise deserved of them; than you any likelihood or conceit of victorie. This their obstinacie was beneficiall vnto those that fled; for that it hindered the Romans from making any great pursuit. Hereby Afdrubal and Syphax escaped: Afdrubal, to Carthage; and Syphax home, to his owne Kingdome: whither his wife was either gone before, or immediately followed him.

Scipio, having thus gotten the mastrie of the field, tooke counsaile about the profecution of the Warre. It was refolued vpon as the best course, That hee himselfe, with part of the Armie, I hould attempt the Cities round about him and that Ma-josmista, with his Namidians, and Lalue, with some of the Roman Legions, should follow after Sphax; nor permitting him to take rest within his owne Kingdome, where easily else he might repaire his forces, and put them to new trouble. This aduice it seemes that Chassis and analysis who knew best the qualitie of the Namidians;

and what good might be done among them, by the reputation of a victorie. The least that could be expected, was his restitution into his owne Kingdome, vsurped by Syphax : which to accomplish, it no leffe concerned the Romans at the prefent, than it did himselfe. According to this order concluded . Lelius was sent away with Ma-Canilla : and Scipio Staied behinde ; carrying the warre from Towne to Towne Many places yeelded for feare: many were taken by force: and all the subjects of Carthere wayered in their fidelitie; as if the time were now come, wherein they might take notice of those wireasonable burdens, which their proud Masters had laid voon them, for maintenance of the warre in Spaine and Italie. What to doe in this cafe the Carthaginians could hardly refolue. Fortune was their Enemie: they had loft their Armies, and many of their Townes: neither durst they make bold to trouble their owne subjects with any violent exaction of men or monie; who neuerthelesse of their owne free will were likely to give little helpe. Very much it grieved them, to fend for Hannibal out of Italie: yet lince there was no other hope remaining, than in him and his good Armie; it was decreed, that Embassadours should bee forthwith fent to call him home. Some there were that gaue aduice, to fet out a fleet against that of Scipio; that rode before Vtica, weakely manned, and calle to be taken, whilst Scipio himselfe was busied in the Inland Countries. Some were of opinion, That it should be their principall care, to fortifie by all meanes the Citie of Carthage: vpon the fafetie whereof they faid that all depended; adding, that whilest they were true, and at vnitic among themselves, they might well enough sublist, and expect those opportunities, with which Fortune (doubtlesse) would present them. These counfailes were not rejected; but order was forthwith taken, both for all thinges concerning defence of the Citie, and for the attempt you the Roman fleet at Vtica. Neuertheleffe it was confidered, that hereby they should only protract the warre: without any way aduancing their owne affaires towards likelihood of victorie: no. though it should fall out, that all the ships at Vtica might bee taken or destroyed. Wherfore the determination held concerning Hannibal, That he should immediately come ouer into Africk, asthelast refuge of Carthage. The Councell was no fooner broken vp, than all the Senators betooke themselves to the execution of that which was decreed : fome, to fortification of the Towne : fome, to make readie the Fleet: and some appointed thereunto, forthwith to embarque themselves for Italie. In this their trepidation Scipio comes to Tunes; a Citie in those daies very strong; and standing in prospect almost of every part of Carthage. This place, or rather some defencible peece adjoyning, He eafily tooke; the Garrison forsaking it, and running away, as foone as he drew neare. But whilest hee was about there to incampe, and fortifie himselfe against the Citie: He might perceiue the Carthaginian fleet setting forth, and making towards Plica: What this meant, he readily conceived: and flood in great feare, left his owne ships, that were very ill prepared for Sea fight (as being to heavily loden with engines of batterie, and wholly disposed in such order, as was most conucnient for assaulting the Towne) should make bad resistance, against a fleet appointed for that speciall service. Wherefore hee halted away towards visal, to affilt with his presence in this needfull ease. It fell our well, that he had sent his carriages, and all the great bootie which he drew along with him, thither before, at his going to Times. For had not he now made great expedition, hee should have come too late. Neither could he indeede hane beene there in due time; if the Carthagi mians had vsed such diligence, as was convenient. Burthey rested one night in harbour by the way : and at their comming to Vica, they tarfied awhile to make a brauado : presenting themselves in order of battaile, as if the Romans would have put forth to Sea against them. But Scipio had no such intent : He thought it would bee fufficient, if he could preferre his Gallies. As for the pleasure of their brauerie at Sea: it should little availe the Carthaginians; if they got nothing by it, and lost their whole Effate by Land. Wherefore he tooke his thips of burden; and, hillning them

the Channell of the Hauen; whereon he placed a thouland of his choice men, with flore of Darts and other casting weapons, to make defence. Some open spaces hee left, whereat his Frigots, and other small Vessells, might runne out and back againe vpon any advantage or neede: but these he coursed with plankes; vsing the masts and vards of his ships in stead of rafters, to joyne all together, that his men might help one another, and the bridge it felfe not be torne afunder. Scarce was this worke finished; when the Carthaginians, seeing none issue forth against them came into the Hauen. The fight betweene them and the Romans, that were in the Hulkes, was rather like to the affaulting of a wall, than to any Sea-fight. For they that flood vpon the bridge, had fure footing, and threw their weapons downwards with their 10 whole strength and violence; which the Carthaginians out of their Gallies, that were lower and vnsteadie, could not doe. But the Roman Frigots and long Boats, aduenturing forth from behinde the Bridge, were greatly ouer-borne by the force of the Gallies: and were one occasion of that small losse which followed. They that stood upon the Bridge were neither able to relieue them; nor yet could freely bestow their weapons among the Carthaginians, as before; for feare of hurting these their friends. that were entangled and mixed among the enemies. The Carthaginians had brought with them grapling hookes, hanging at Iron chaines. These they threw your themasts and yards which served as Arches to joyne the bridge together: then rowing backwards, they tore all afunder; in fuch fort that one ship followed another, and 20 all the first ranke was broken, or defaced. The Defendants had no other way than to faue themselves as hastily as they could, by shifting into the next ranke of ships, that lay behinde them vntouched. Neither did the Carthaginians trouble themselues any further in this laborious worke; but having haled away fixe ships of burden, and towed them out of the Hauen, returned home to Carthage. Their well-come was greater than their victorie; because among so many grieuous losses, only this exploit had succeeded well; though it were of small importance.

Whileft things thus passed about Carthage; Lelius and Masanista, in their journie against Syphax, found as good successes could be defired. The same of the victories alreadie gotten, restored Masanisa to his Kingdome, without further contention: 20 the Masasyli, his subjects, joyfully receiping him; and for saking the Vsurper, But here they staied not : neither indeede would Syphax permit them to be quiet. Hee had fuch abundance of men and horses, that he felt not greatly the losses past; and, therefore being follicited by Afdribal and Sophonisba, hee prepared agains for warre. But belied the infligation of his beloued wife; the loffe of the Mafafylis would let him take no rest : neither was it the purpose of Lalius and Masanissa, to give him any breathing time. It is common in men, to depart no leffe vnwillingly from that which they have gotten by extortion, than from their proper inheritance: but to thinke all alike their owne, whereof they are in possession, bee the title vnto fome part neuer fo vnjust. Hercunto alludes the fable of the yong Kite: which thought that shee had vomited up her owne guts; when it was only the garbage of fome other fowle, that shee had hastily swallowed, and was not able to digest. But whether or no, Syphax, like the yong Kite, beleeved the Kingdome of the Mafafyli to be part of his entrailes: Lalius and Mafaniffa will shortly give him somwhat, that shall make him cast his gorge. For to this purpose chiefly are they come so farre. It concerned the Romans to dispossesse (if it might be) that King: whose salse and hollow friendship towards them, had been converted into strong enmitie; as also to fet in his place another, who might doe them fuch good offices, as Syphax had lately done vnto the Carthaginians. How easily this might be effected, Masanissa knew best: as being well acquainted with the nature of those Countries; wherein, even to this day, though there be many firong Townes, yet the fortune of a battaile is enough, to translate the Kingdome from one Competitor to another. So they met with Syphax: who came against them with no lesse an Armie, than his former, and marshalled in the Roman order; according to the skill, which he had learned of the Roman

Centurion, long agoe fent vnto him out of Spaine from Cn. Scipio. But though hee could teach his men how to march in order; yet could he not teach them to fight couragiously. They were a rabble of all forts, gathered vp in hast; and few of them had seene the warre before. Encamping neare vnto the Romans, it fell out, as commonly, that some small Troupes of Horse on both sides, encountred one another in the mid-way: and they that had the worst, were seconded by other of their fellowes. By continuance of the skirmish, more and more were drawne out from either Campe: fo that at length Syphax, vnwilling to dishearten his men by taking any foile at their first meeting with the Enemie, came vp with all his Horse, which were the best part of his forces, and therewith ouercharged Masanisa, whose numbers were farre leffe. But whileft he was profecuting his hope of victorie : fome Roman Squadrons of Foot came against him through their owne Troupes of Horse; which fell to the fides, and made a lane for them. So their Battaile standing now more firme, than a little before; Syphax was vnable, though hee laboured much in vaine to make them give ground. Masanissalikewise, and his Troupes, grew confident vpon this afsistance: and charging affesh the Enemic, that could not make way forward, caused him to give back. Herewithall the Legions came in sight: which terrified fo the Numidian Horse, that they beganne presently to disband. Faine would Syphan have flaved them from flight; and to that end made head in person against the Romans; with hope, that his men would be ashamed to leave him. But it fell out vnhappily, that he was cast from his Horse, which received a wound; and so taken prisoner. Of others that were flaine or taken, the multitude was not great. It fufficed, that they for sooke the place, and fled : and that their King, vpon whom all depended was in the Romans hand. Masanissa told Lelius, That this victoric should make an end of the Numidian war, if presently they hasted away to Cirta the chiefe Citie of the Kingdome; whither hee himselse desired to be sent before with the Horse, carrying Syphax along with him. Hercunto Lalius agreed. Masanissa comming to Cirta, before any newes of the Kings mischance was there arrived, called out the chiefe of the Citie to parlee; wherein by many faire promifes and threats, but especially by shewing vntothem Syphax bound, he prevailed so far that the gates were forthwith opened vnto him ; and every one strove to get his favour, that was like to be their King hereafter. Among the reft, Queene Sophonisha yeelded her selfe into his hands : and vehemently befought him, that the might not be deliucred vp vnto the Romans. Her youth, and excellent beautic, so commended her suit, that Masamilla forthwith granted it; and to make good his promise, married her himselfe that verieday: thereby to prevent Lalius and Scipio from determining otherwise of her, fince the was his wife. But Lalin, when he came thither, tooke the matter hainoufly; fo that at first he would have haled her away, together with Syphax and other prisoners, and have sent her vnto Scipio. But being over-entreated by Malanisa. hee fuffered the matter to rest awhile as he found it, and referred all to Scipio's discretion: to whom he fent away Syphax and other Captines immediatly; following shortly after himselfe with Masanissa, when they had done what was needefull in the Kingdome.

At the comming of Syphax there was great ioy in the Roman Campe: the mightie Armies which he had lately brought into the field: and his entertainment of Stipio and Afaribad, both at one time, when Roma and Caribage together fought his friendfhip: with fuch other commemoration of his paft and pefent fortune; ministring to enery one a large argument of discourse. Stipio demanded of him, what had moued him, not only to for sake the Roman friendship, but to make warre vpon them, unpromoked. He briefely answered, That his wife had moued him so to doe: calling her a Furic, and a pession where daying, That Malamissan owifer than himselfe; since he had now taken the same woman to his wise, who would shortly draw him to the same courses. Hereat Stipio was greatly troubled: and but fince they who had power to hinder him of his defire, would not yeeld thereto. he fent her a cup, that should preserve her from falling aliue into the handes of the Romans; willing her to remember her birth and estate, and accordingly to takeorder for her felfe.

As the receit of this Meffage and Present, shee onely faid, That if her Husband had no better token to fend vnto his new wife, thee multaccept of this; adding. That flee might have died more honourably, if shee had not wedded so late, lybefore her Funerall. And herewithal! thee boldly dranke off the poifon. Thus Linic reports it. But Appian varies from this; and lets it downe agreeably to that which hath beene fpeten before, concerning the pracontract betweene Malanilla and Sophonisha. Hee faith, That after the taking of Syphan, Embaffadors from Cirta met with Lalius and Mafeniffavoon their way thither, yeelding vp their Citic, and the Kings Palace : and that Soy banisba, for her owne private, fent meffengers to excuseber marringe with syphax; as made against her will, by compulsion of those in 30 whose power the was. Masariffs readily admitted this excuse; and accepted her to wife. But when Seizio had received information from Syphax, how cunning in per-Iwalion Sophonishs was; and that all her thoughts laboured for the good of Carthage: he fell out about her with Mafasiffa at his returne; and challenged her, as a part of the bootie belonging to the Romans. Malaniffa faid, thee was his owne wife, and vnte him betrotacd textry yeares before. But Scipio would not heare of this: or if it yere true; yet he faid it was no reason, that Mesaniffa should keepe her in posfession, as long as it was disputable, vnto whom she might appertaine. Wherefore he willed him first of all to produce her, and then afterwards to make his claime vnto her; wherein he hould have no wrong. Herewithall hee fent to fetch her away: 40 and Maferuffa coon apanies the metiongers, as it were to deliver her; but making her acquainted with the necessatio, gaue voto her a cup of poison, wherewith shee ended her life, before they came that faculd have apprehended her. So he lifewed unto the Raman her dead bodie; which her syally enterred. The fudden violence of Mafanifa his love, and the readic confent of Sophanisha to marrie with him : adde not formuch credit vato this relation of Applem; as doth the want of all other cuident cause (which * Linie notes) of the sudden felling out betweene him and the Carthaginians; under whom he had bin trained up, or don them great feruice. Howfocuer it were : Saiplo, hearing of this tragicall accident, fent for Mafanissa, and comforted him as well as he could ; left his melancholic should lead him to some inconuenience. Having therefore gently rebuked him for his rashnesse, he brought him forth in presence of the Armie: where extolling his noble acts, and shewing how highly he had descrued of the Citie of Rome, he proclaimed him King; and gaue vnto him a Crowne of gold, with other royall ornaments. This was indeed the readie way, to direct histhoughts from the fadde remembrance of that which was past, who the more cheerefull contemplation of good fortune, that beganne to imile voon him.

This was the first time that the Romans tooke vpon them to create or proclaime a King, Which honour though Masanisa well descrued : yet would not the Title haue redounded vnto his great benefit; neither should be baue beene much beholding to them for it, if he had not by their meanes recourred possession of his Countrie, together with the greatest part of Syphax his Dominions. It seemes not valikele that had he remained a Neuter in these warres, and sustained himselse with his Troupe of Horse, in such fort as hee did before the comming of the Romans; hee might neuerthelelle hauerecouered his proper inheritance, by the loue of his owne fubicets, without other helpe, when Syphan had once or twice been evan quilhed. As for the enlargement of his Kingdome, it was not more than hee deserved : neither were the Romans then in case, to make a conquest of Numisia for themselves; neither could they have wished a fitter opportunitie, than of such a man, vpon whom to beflow it, that was their affured friend, and paffable withall among the Numidians, as being (for the Masassyli were a Numidian Tribe) a great Prince of the same Nation. Yet this liberalitie of the Romans, was noyfed abroad as verie glorious: and the Ro-20 mans them clues, in a politicke fort of graulitic, tooke highly upon them; as if even their falluting him by the name of King, had beene a matter of great confequence. Hee thriued indeed well after it: and by their maintenance waxed mightie in times following encroaching vpon his neighbours on all fides; but most of all vpon the State of Carthage, whereat they were little displeased. Hence it grew that Vermina the sonne of Syphax (of whom wee shall shortly speake more) which held some peece of his Fathers Kingdome, desiring friendship of the Romans, and promising by all meanes to deserue their love, requested therewithall, that they would call him King. But though it were fo, that neuer any before him had made this a matter of fuit: yet the Roman Senate was puntilious herein; and answered very grauely, That 30 it was not their custome to give the honour of that appellation, faue onely vnto such Kings, as had greatly descrued of their Gitie. Thus they made it a matter of State: and in procelle of time grew fo proud of this their imaginarie prærogative, that they imputed as a fingular benefit vnto Kings, that no way depended vpon them, the fa-Intuition by b that name; though it were not accompanied with any other fauour or his. profit thence redounding.

à. XIX. The Carthaginians desire Truce: and breake it.

He Carthaginians were extremely difinaicd, when they heard of the great calamitic, that was befaine their good friend Syphax; and vnderflood that Masanissa, their mortallenemie, had got possession of his Kingdome. To increase their scare, Scapio returned againe to Tunes in view of their Citie: where hee made an end of that Fortification, which hee had begunne at his last being there. The Carthaginians had neither forces, nor courage, to withfland him: but their hearts fo failed them, that they fent forth vnto him thirtie Embassadors, Princes of the Citic, which were their 50 Privic Councell, to make fuit for peace. These being admitted into the presence of Printe Counceil, to make interior peace. There being admit the feet of him, Except Peace, Scipio, did not only proftrate themselves on the ground; but kissed the feet of him, Million & Line. and of those that sate in Councell with him.

Answerable to this base adoration was their speech that followed. They con-Bbbbbb 2

fessed themselues to have vniustly broken the Peace between them and Rome; and to have deserved what soever punishment it should please the Romans to inflict yp-on them. Yet they humbly befought Scipio and the rest, that, in common regard of those misfortunes, whereto all men are subject, they would show mercie vnto the Citie of Carthage, and let it remaine, as a Monument of their elemencie; which, by the follie of her Citizens, had now twice deferred to be overthrowne. Herewithall they did not forget, to lay the blame vpon Hannibal: who without their appointment had begunne the warre; and was maintained in his doings by a Faction, without the good liking of the whole Citie. By this it appeares, that these Embassadors were no Barchines: but rather, that they were Hanno and the choice of his companie; 10 who had now their long defired worke in hand, of fuing vnto the Romans for peace.

Whatfocuer they were, it must needes be that they were most infolent men ouer those that were subject vnto their power; for they would not have made such adoration vnto the Romans, in their owne necessitie; vnlesse they themselves had expe-

It was not vnknowne to Scipio, or to his assistants, in what poore case the Citie of Rome then was; and how vnable to defraie the charges of continuing the warre.

Neither were the Carthaginians, notwithstanding the losse of so many Armies, in fuch ill case, as the Romans themselves had very lately been. For they had monie e-and they had the Sea free. But they wanted the Roman resolution: and therefore distrusted the walls of Carthage; though Viica, a weaker Citie, had all this while held out against Scipio, and could not yet be forced by him and his Armie, though so often victorious in the field. Scipio therefore accepted their fubmiffion, and told them That though he came into Africk, to make a Conquest, and not a Peace: yet having the Conquest as it were in his hand, hee would not denie to grant them the Peace, which they defired; for thereby should all Nations understand, that the people of Rome did follow the rule of justice, both in making warre, and in concluding it. The conditions which he imposed vpon them, were these: That they should render vp vnto him all prisoners that they had taken, together with all Renegado's and fugitive slaues: That they should withdraw their Armies out of Italie and Gaule: That they should not meddle in Spaine, nor yet in any Iland between Italie & Africk: That they should deliuer up all their ships of warre, saue twentie; and T hat they should pay a great summe of monie, with certaine hundred thousand bushels of Wheat and Barlie. To consider of these Articles, hee gaue them three dayes : and when they had approved them, he granted a Truce; that they might fend Embaffadours vnto

the long endured miseries would be shortly at an end. Wherefore all the Temples were let open, and an holy day appointed for thank fgining and supplication to their

Gods. Lalius was accompanied with Embassadors from King Masanista: who gra-tulating the happie successe of the Romans in their African Warre, and giving thanks vnto the Senate for the benefits done by Scipio vnto their Master, made request for the Numidians, fuch as were now his subjects and prisoners in Rome, that they might be bestowed vpon him; who by rendring them to libertie, should doe an act verie plaulible, that would make him gracious among his people in the beginning of his reigne. The Roman Senate were not behinde with Majaniffa in complement : but doe for him; they called him King againe; released his Numidians that were cap-tiues; and fent him two purple Cassocks, that had each of them one gold button;

with fuch other Presents, as in time of their pouerty might serue to testific their good will. Scarcely were these and Lelius gone from Rome; when the newes came, that Embaffadours from Carthage were arrived to desire peace. These Embaffadours were not admitted into the Citie, but were lodged without : vntill Lalius being Ent for, came backe from ofia, to be present when their demands were to be heard. Then was audience given them in the Temple of Bellona; that flood in the fuburbs. The errand of these Embassadours, was Peace: but the meaning of them and of their Citie, was onely to winne time, and get respite from warre; vntill Hannibal and Mago should come out of Italia, either to chace the Romans out of Africk, or to obtain peace for Carthage, by terror of their great names and Armies, vpon more calleconoditions. Wherefore they made an idle difcourfe of the League, that was concluded betweene them and Luctatius Catulus, at the end of the former warre. This League they faid, all things well confidered, did ftill remaine in force: neither had there fince beene any warre at all, betweenerhe people of Rome and the Carthaginians. For it was onely Hannibal, that, without any leave from Carthage, had of his owne head belieged and razed the Towne of Saguntum: and after that aduentured in like fort, without Commission, to palle the Apes, and trouble (as he had done) the quiet of Italie. This being fo: their Message was none other, than to desire, that the League before spoken of made in the time of Catulus, might hereafter stand in sorce; as indeed it hitherto did, and ought to doc. The Senators had cause to wonder at this tale; hearing thefe Embaffadours make (as it were) a jeft of a warre, that had beene fo terrible. Wherefore they asked them a great many questions, concerning that Peace made by Luttatius, and other passages following between the two Cities. But they excused themselues by their age: (for they were all yong men) and said, That those things were beyond their knowledge and remembrance. Forthwith it appeared, That all was but collusion, and that they fought no other than to gain etime; untill they might repaire the warre. Wherefore they were sent home in companie of Lalius; without any conclusion at all of peace; and, in effect, without answere. This not with flanding, we find in Palyhius, That the Senate receiving advertisment Except Paylo from Scipio, of that which had passed betweene him and the Carthaginians in this his.

30 Treatie of peace, approved the conditions by him propounded; and gaue him licence thereupon, to proceede vitto conclusion. This may with good reason be beleeued: fince it was not vnknowne, that if the warre continued, all these goodly hopes must rest vpon the most vncertaine issue of one battaile betweene Hannibal and Scipio wherein if fortune strould be auerse to them, their forces in Africk were no better than quite loft.

Matters thus hanging in suspense, before the Carthaginian Embassadours came backe from e Rome: a Flect out of Sicil, wherein were two hundred ships of burden, and thirtie Gallies, being bound for Africk to victualle the Roman Campe, was ouertaken by foule weather at Sea 3 and hardly escaping wracke, was dispersed, and driuen aground in diuers parts of the Bay of Carthage, euen in view, and vnder command of the Citie. There was at that time, as we finde in Appian, and may gather App debello out of Polybius, a great dearth of victuails in Carthage: which caused the people to panie. crie out vpon their Magistrates, that they should not let such a bootic escape them; faying, that the danger of famine was greater and worse, than of breaking Truce. Whether it were so that hunger vrged them, or that they yeelded to their owne greedie desires: the multitude in Carthage vnderstood (as it seemes) that all this discourse of peace in hand, was no better than meere mockerie; and therefore cared not for observation of particular points, when they meant descrit in the whole. It was Exemplify Public the manner in Carthage, as likewise in Alexandria, for all the Rascalitie, together with  $L_{15}$ . 50 women and boyes, to be medling in vprores: the clamours of the boyes being in such tumults no lesse violent, than of the men. Wherefore it is no matualle, if little regard were had of reason, or of honour, in any such commotion. A Fleet was sent out under Afdrubal, to gather up the dispersed Roman ships of burden (for the Gallies, by force of Oares, reconcred the flation whereto their Campe adioyned) and bring them into Carthage: which was done. Scipio was hereat much offended: not only for the loife, and for that the Towne was thereby relected; but for that by this breach of truce, he forefaw the intention of the Carthaginians to renew the war. and put him to more trouble. Where for chee fent Embassadours vnto them; both to require fatisfaction for the injurie done; and to deterre them from entertaining anic other hope, than in the peace which they had so much desired. These gaue the Carthaginians to understand, That Letters were come from Rome unto Scipio, with allowance to conclude the peace; vpon those conditions which hee had propounded. But (faid they) we hold it ftrange, That yee, who fo lately have cast your felnes to the ground before vs, and kiffed our feet, after an unufuall manner of humilitie, confessing your 10 Jelues to have perfidiously broken the league that was betweene ws, and thereby to have deferned such punishment as is due wato Rebels; should so some forget what yee then wittered, and runne headlong againe into the same crimes, for which yee acknowledged your selies worthic to be destroyed, having only recourse onto our mercie. We are not ignorant, that it is the confilence which ye repose in HANNIBAL that thus emboldens you. Tet were it not amisse. that yee should consider, how long he hath beene pent up in a corner of Italie, among the Brutians; where he is in a manner befreged, and unable to flire: fo that yee are like to finde his helpe wanting in your greatest need. Or let it be supposed, that he were now in Africke. and readie to give vs battaile yet should it well agree with your wildome, to doubt what might befall, remembring that he is aman, and not invincible. Now if it should happen that he were 20 ouercome, what refuge have yeleft onto your felues against hereafter ? What gods will yee eyther sweare by to bee beleened, or call upon in jour miserie? What wordes, and lamentable gesture willyee henceforth wife , to move compassion? Surely yee have alreadie wafled all your forces of personssion, and shall not againe deceine vs, if ye refuse the grace, whereof at the present ye are capable. It is no maruell though the Carthaginians were angric, when they heard themselues upbraided with the base demeanour of their Embassadours. For it was not the generall opinion of the Citie, that the Truce was broken by themselves: though it had pleased Hanno, or such as were of his Faction, to grarific the Romans with all manner of fubmiffion; and to renounce not onely their hope of the future, but all instification of matters past. And indeed it seemes, that 30 the Roman Embassadours were verie much delighted, in the rehearfall of that point which was yeelded vnto them; as knowing that thereon depended the justice of the quarrell. But the Carthaginians tooke this in foill part, that hardly they could refraine from doing violence vnto the men, who had vsed vnto them such insolent speeches. Yet the furic of the multitude was in some sort appeased; eyther by Hanno, whom Appian (I know not why) cals Hanno the great; or by the verie reuerence, due vnto the place of those that had vttered such liberall words. So they were dismissed infriendly fort; though it were without answere to their Proposition. There were also two Gallies appointed for their safe Convoy home; though with little intent of good unto their persons. Asarubal was then in the mid-way; as men sailed from 40 Carthage towards Viica. Hee, whether onely desirous to please the Multitude, of whose disposition he was informed; or whether directed by publike order, to cut off these Embassadours in their way homeward: lay waiting for them behinde a Cape, that was a little beyond the mouth of the River Bagradas. Their Conuoy hauing brought them on the way, as farre as to the mouth of Bagradas, wished them a good Voyage; and so tooke leave of them, as if they had been ethen in safetie; fince the Roman Campe was even in fight. The Embaffadours tooke this in ill part : not as fearing any danger toward; but thinking themselues too much neglected, for a fmuch as their attendants did so abruptly leave them. But no sooner had they doubled the Cape, than Ashrubal fell vpon them in such manner, as they might well discerne his purpose; which was, to have stemmed them. They rowed hard therefore: and being in a Quinquereme, that had more bankes of Oares, than had any Gallie of Afdrubal; they flipt away, and made him ouer-shoot himselfe. Yet hee gaue them chace; and had well neare surprised them. But they discouered some Roman Companies on the shore over against them, and therefore adventured to run their vessell aground: whereby they faued their owne lives; though a great part of their companie were slaine, or hurt. This practife of the Carthagmians was inexcusable: and for the same cause perhaps were the Citizens heartned in such a dishonourable attempt, by those that were desirous to continue the warre; that thereby they might be driven to stude nothing else, than how to get the victoric; as a having none other hope remaining. Yet likely it is, that the same fare, which had caused them, to make such earnest suit for peace, would also have caused them to be better adulted, than thus to abandon all hope of Treatie: had they not been egiven to vnderstand, that Hamnbal was alreadie landed in Africk, in whom they reposed no small considence; but verily perswaded themselves, that he would change their fortune, and teach the Romans to hold themselves contented with more easie conditions, than were those that Session in the pride of his fortune, had of late propounded.

. XX.

In what fort HANNIBAL spent the time after the battaile of Metaurus. The doings of Maco in Italie. HANNIBAL and MACO called out of Italie.

How the Romans were diversly affected by HANNIBALS departure.

Ver fince the losse of that battaile at Metaurus, Hunnibal remained in the Countrey of the Brutians; waiting for another supplies from Carthage. The Reman Consuls that succeeded vnto Claudius and Linius, by whom Astrubal was outerome and flaine, were contented to bee ought worthie of remembrance against Hunnibal. Seing bindred by the pestilence that was in his Armie. Sempronius the Colleast the Colleast of Consultation of the Miller Capio, who followed Sempronius, were carnelly bear to haue done som what: but their diligence was in a manner fruitesse. In some skirmisse with Hunnibal, they had the better; in some, the worse: and a few poore Townes they got from him, as it were by stealth, shis care being more to preserve his Armie, than to keepe those places that were weake.

The Romans had at this time to manie great pieces of worke in hand, that their chiefe enemie was become, not the chiefe part of their care. Their thoughts were mainly bent yop a Africk, wherein they were at no final charges to maintaine the Armie, which (as was hoped) thould bring the warre to a floort and happie conclution. They flood neuertheleffe in much feare of Assag, the brother of Hannibal: who 40 tooke exceeding paine among the Ligarians and Gaules to raife an Armie, wherein to kindle anew the warre in Italie, that beganne to waxe colde. Mago folicited alfo the Hetrarians; and found them foreadie to fittre in his behalfe, that if he could have entred their Country fitrong, it might haue proued no lefte needful for Scipio to return home out of Africk, than thortly it was for Hannibal, to make speed vinco the defence of Caribage. These dangers caused the Romans to employ one of their Confuls or Proconfuls, with an Armie, among the Hetrurians; another among the Gaules; and a third among the Ligarians: storasmother as was vincertaine, ypon which side Mago would breakeout. Being thus busied, it is no wonder though they forbore to our charge Hannibal with any great power.

As for Mago, when things were in some readines for his setting forwards, he met in the Countrie of the Infubrians, which is about Milas, with M. Cornelius the Roman Proconsul, and P. Quintilius Varus one of the Prætors. With these he sought a battaile, wherein though his vertue shewed it selle worthie of his father and brethren; yet his fortune was Carthaginian. The sight continued along while doubtfulls in fuch fort that the Roman Commanders beganne to distrust the iffue. Wherefore Quintilius the Prator, taking vnto him all the Roman Horse, thought to have shaken the Enemies to peeces. The Legions at the same time gave a loud shout; and frained themselves hards as if at that brunt the victorie should have beene carried before them But Mago opposed his Elephants to the Horse: the service of those beafts being fitter for such vie, than against the Squadrons of Foot. The figure, sent. and braving of these Elephants, did so affright the Horse, that they started aside, and were feattered ouer the field; their Riders being vnable to mannage them. Hereby the Numidians got advantage upon them : whole manner of fight was more availeable against those that were loose, than against the Troups that were close and thick. 10 Then felthe Elephants upon the Legions: which entertained them after the accustomed manner, with a showre of darts, and killed foure of them; causing all the rest ro gine backe. This notwithstanding, the same Legions were so vehemently pressed by the Enemie; that more for shame of running away, than by any great force to make relistance, they held their ground. The Proconful therefore brought vo those forces, which he had kept vnto the laft, to fuccour where need should most require. Against these Mago employed some of his Gaules, whom hee had in readinesse for the like occasion. But these Gaules discharged their parts very ill. They were some beaten off; and recoiled so hastily, that they brought feare upon all the rest. When Mago faw that his men beganne to shrinke , Hee put himselfe in the head of his 20 Armie; and held them so well to it, that keeping their order, they made a faire Retrait, with their faces toward the Enemie. But at length he received a grewous wound in his thigh; whereof shortly after hee dyed. Hee was taken vp, and carried out of danger by some of his owne men; the rest of them, after little further resiflance, prouided every one for him felfe: So the Romans obtained victoric, not without areat cost; as purchasing the death of about five thousand enemies, with the loffe of two thousand and three hundred of the Prætors Armie, besides those that dved of the Proconfuls Legions; also besides divers Colonells, Captaines, and Gentlemen of marke, that fell in this hote peece of service. Neyther were there any prisoners taken ; whereby it may seeme that the Enemies did not fall to rout, be- 20 fore they had recoursed some ground that might affure them from pursuit. How cuer it were, this victorie would have much imported for the affurance of Italie, if the State of Carthage could longer have permitted these valiant sonnes of Amilear to abide therein. But Mago with-drawing himselfe (by easie iournies, because of his wound) into Liguria, found there Embaffadours from Carthage attending him: who gaue him to vinderstand the pleasure of their Citie, which was. That both hee and Hannibal should presently repaire home with all their forces; not staying any longer to thinke vpon the conquest of Italie, since Carthage it selfe was readie to bee loft. He obeyed this Commandement, and embarqued shortly his Armic; but dyed of his wound about Sardinia, in the way homewards,

About the same time Hannibal received the like command from Carthage to returne into Africk. He heard it with great impatience; gnashing his teeth, and groning, and hardly keeping in the teares, that were readie to burst out, whilest the Embassadours were delivering their errand. When their message was done; Hee Embassadours were delivering their errand. When their message was done; Hee told them, That this was yet plaine dealing. For, said He, They that now directly bid mee come home, hunelong agoe done their best to hade mee ut of Italics, though more closely and crookedy they went to worke, by slepping the sapps, that should have enabled mee to manmage the Ware here. So I wo to herefore fall not need to brages, that hee hash drawne me home by the heelessit is HANNO, that hath wrought this noble fest, and our whetmed the Hasle of the Eurobines, for lacke of other meanes to doe it, with the ruine of Cartage. He had before prepared a Flect in readines (le, doubting that, which after came to passes when the embarqued, besides his ownemen, as many of the Italians, as were content to be partakers of his fortune. Many there were that shrunke backe from him, and refused to doe feruice in this Expedition; of whom site, has hee could take he flew; not sparing those that sted into the Temple of Iumo Lacmia, which had been held an inviolable Sanctuarie vnto that day. He was indeed then wholly transported with rage; and departed out of Italie no less passificante, than men are wont to bee, when they leaue their owne Countries to goeinto exile. Hee looked backe wnto the shore: accussing both gods and men; and cursing his owne dulnesse; in that he had not led his Armie from Canne, botte and bloudied as it was, directly vnto the wals of Rome. With such vastion of spirit Hee quitted the possession of Italie 5 wherein he had lived almost halfe his time.

If it could have been foretold vnto the Romans, in the first beginning of this war, with what exceeding joy in times following they should entertaine the newes of Hannibathis departure out of Italie: they would (I thinke) leffe carnefly have preffed the Carthaginians to fend him over thither. When fure advertisement was brought vnto the Citie, that Hannibal was gone with all his Armie; an Holiday was appointed for thankfgining vnto their gods; & extraordinarie great facrifices publikely made, for joy of fuch happie tidings. Yet old Q. Fabius was of opinion. That the danger did ftill remaine the same, though the place were changed: for that Hannibal, at his comming into Africk, would finde P. Scipio other manner of worke, than he had beene troubled with at any time before; and would doe greater matters in his owne Countrie, than ever he was able to performe abroad in a land of strangers. The remoue of the warre from their owne dores, and the conceit of that victorie for which they hoped; was enough to make them prefume further, than at other times they would have done. When therefore the Saguntine Embaffadors brought vato them a great maffe of Golde and Silver, together with fome Agents of the Carthaginians taken by them in Spaine: onely the Carthaginian prifoners were accepted; the treasure was rendred backe vnto the Saguntines that had surprised it. Vpon like confidence of the future, a little before this, order was taken for the repayment of those monies, that had beene borrowed in time of more necessitie from primate men. Hence also proceeded the seuere chastisement, laid vpon those twelve Colonies, that for want cytherof meanes, or of good will, had refused to give aid to the 20 Romans. They were commanded, and enforced to give double the number of Foot to that which they had beene wont to fet out for the warres, with a proportion of Horse answerable to the verie most of their abilitie. So consident were the Romans growne (though their wealth were not as yet futeable to the greatnesse of their spirit) upon the good successe of the Battaile at Metaurus; and the hopes which they reposed in Scipio. All this notwithstanding, when they considered more nearly of that which might happen; and were informed, that the terrible Armie, whereof Italie had beene few dayes fince discharged, was landed fafe in Africk: they began to revolue a thousand fearefull matters in their heads, and to stand in doubt, lest Q. Fabius (who died about the fame time) would bee found a true Prophet. For be-40 thinking themselves of that which might comfort them in their hopes: they found in the victories against Syphax and Afdrubal no specialtie of such great worth, as might promife the like fuccesse against another manner of Generall, followed by other manner of men, than were eyther of those two. The Numidian King had beene wont to bring into the field a rafcall multitude of halfe fcullions, that were good for nothing; being himfelfe a fit Captaine for fuch fouldiors. Likewife Afdrubal, the fonne of Gifeo, was a Commander well thought of by the Carthan ginian Senate, but otherwise one, that in the field was onely good at saving himfelfe by a fwift retrait. But now there came an Armie, of men hardened from their child-hood with incredible patience, fleshed many hundred times in Roman bloud. 50 and wearing the spoiles not onely of good fouldiors, but of braue Captaines, by them flaine. Such talke vied the people of Rome, faying, That Scipio was like to meet in battaile, with many that had flaine Roman Prætors, yea and Confuls, with their owne hands, with many, that had beene first in getting over the Trenches of seucrall Roman Campes, or in winning the tops of wals at the feige of Townes, breifly, that he should now bee opposed by an Armie, as good as had cuer served in warre. and following the dreadfull Name of Hannibal.

d. XXI.

HANNIBAL in Africke prepares to fight with SCIPIO: treates with him about peace in vaine; loofeth a battaile at Nadagara, and perswades the Carthaginians to (ne for peace. Of the peace granted from Rome to Carthage.

ANNIBAL difembarqued his Armic at Leptis, almost an hundred miles from Carthage, Eastward from the Headland of Mercurie, and fomewhat more than one degree to the South. He was ill prouided of Horse; which it was not easie for him to transport out of Italie. Therefore it behoued him to land, as he did, fomewhat farre from the Ene-mie; that he might furnish himselfe with this and the like needfull helpes, against the day of battaile. From Leptis he passed on to Adrumetum, and so along through the in-land Countrie; gathering friends vnto him by the way. Tychaus a Numidian Prince, and familiar friend of Syphax, was faid to have in those dayes the best Horfes of service, that were to be found in Africk, Him therefore did Hannibal allure vnto his partie: making him understand, that if the Romans got the victorie, it should bee easie for Masaniss, by their countenance and helpe to oppresse both him, and as manie other of the neighbour Princes as hindred his prospect. This Argument, and the fame of him that vied it, prevailed with Tychau, who shortly after brought vnto the Carthaginian two thousand Horse. Appear further addes, That Mezetullus. (the fame who had made himfelfe Protectour over Mafaniffa his Cofens; and was Head of a Family, and adverse to the Numidian Kings of that race) brought vnto Elamibal another thousand Horse: as likewise that Vermina the some of Syphax, holding a great part of his Fathers Kingdome, began at the same time to assail the places that yeelded obedience to Mafanissa. This Vermina, as we finde in Liuie, came with more than fixteene thousand men (for he lost more than so manie) to succour Hannibal when it was too late.

The Carthaginians were at this time in fuch hard effate, or (at least) so impatient of the flate wherein they were; that they could not attend the leifure of those preparations, which would have made the victorie affured. When they confidered the worth of Hannibal, and the greatnesse of his Acts: it offended them to thinke. that they had beene so base, as to make humble suit vnto the Romans for Peace; whileft they had fuch a brane Champion aline, to maintaine their cause by warre. But when they bethought themselves of their owne sufferings, which, for want of Roman magnanimitie to endure them, appeared greater than indeede they were: then cried they out earneftly, that it was no time to linger, but prefently to fight; that so they might see an end of these troubles, eyther good or bad. And to this purpole, they lent their Mandatesto Hannibal: requiring him, without any further protraction, to doe what he could doe out of hand. Hannibal made answere, That they were his good Lords, and had power to dispose of him and his Armie: but since hee was General of their forces, He thought it resonable, that they should suffer him to doc as a Generall ought to doe; and to choose his owne times. Neuerthelesse, to giue them satisfaction, Hee made great marches to Zama; and there encamped.

The breach of Truce, made by the Carthaginians: The violence, done to his 52 Embaffadours: and the newes of Hannibal his being landed in Africk; made Scipio to vnderstand the resolution of the Carthaginians, which was, not to yeeld vnto any conditions unprofitable for themselves, as long as they were able to make resistance. Wherefore hee fent vnto Masanisa: and informed him of all that was fallen out; praying him to come away with speed, and lay all other businesse a-part. Ten Reman Companies, of Horse and Foot together, Masanissa had with him; that were lent vnto him by Scipio, to doe him service in the establishing and enlarging of his Kingdome. But he well vnderstood, that those and many more besides all his owne forces would little availe him; if Hannibal should drive the Romans out of Africke. Wherefore taking fuch order as he could vpon the fudden, for the fafetic of his owne Kingdome , with foure thousand Horse, and fixethousand Foot, hee made all haft vnto Scipio.

Soone after the beginning of these new troubles, the Carthaginian Embassadours 10 that had been at Rome, returned backe under the conduct of Lelius and Fuluius: who brought them safeinto the Roman Campe. There when they arrived, and understood what had lately passed, especially how their Citizens had behaued themfelues towards the Roman Embassadours: they made little doubt, how their owne heads should answere for such notorious outrage. To cofirme them in this opinion.

M. Babius one of the late Embassadours that had beene in Carthage, being left by Scitio to take charge of the Campe, laid hands upon them, and detained them; fending word vnto his Generall, who was gone abroad to make warre in the Countrie, that he had them in his power, and that now the Cartheginians might bee repaid in their owne Coyne, for the injurie by them lately done. Scipio was very glad to 20 heare of this; and commanded Bebius to vie them with all poffible courtelle, and fend them fafe home. By thus doing He brake the hearts of his Enemies; and caufed them to acknowledge themselves, (which was a great victorie) farre lesse honourable than the Romans. This not withflanding, He made more cruell warre vpon them than before: taking their Townes by force; and putting them to facke, withouthearkning to any Composition. It was the manner of the Romans, as often as they tooke a Towneby affault, to put all that came in their way to the fword, whatfocuer they were, without regard, This they did, to make themselves terrible: and the better to worke such impression in the mindes of those, with whom they had to doe, they vied oftentimes to kil the verie Dogges and other Beafts, that ranne Execut. 670. 30 athwart them in the fireets; hewing their bodies a funder, as men delighted in fled 196.116.10.

ding of bloud. This being their practife at other times: it is likely, that now they omitted no peece of crueltie, when they meant to give proofe of their vehement indignation, and renengefull mindes, for the injuries received. Hence it partly grew. that the Carthaginians were fo earnest in pressing Hannibal to fight.

Hannibal being encamped at Zama, sent forth his Scowts and Spies, to discouer where the Romanslay; what they were doing; and as much as might be of their demeanour. Some of these were taken, and brought vnto Scipie : who in stead of trusfing them vp, gaue them free leave to view his Campe at pleasure; appointing one to conduct them up and downe, and shew them whatsoever they desired. This done, He gaue them libertie to depart; and fent them away fafe vnto their Generals Hannibal understanding this, admired the brauerie and courage of his Enemie: with whom on the fudden he grew defirous to have an Enter-view, and personall conference; and fignified so much vnto him, by a messenger sent of purpose. Of this motion the Roman liked well: and returned answere, that Hee would meet him shortly in place convenient. The next day Malaniffs came with his Armie : whom Scipia taking with him removed vnto a Towne called Nadagara; neare vnto which hee fat downe, in a place otherwise commodious, and close by a water that might opportunely seruchis Campe. Thence he sent word vnto the Carthaginian, That the time and place did fitly serve, if He had ought to say to him. Hannibal thereupon remo-50 ued from Zama, and came within foure miles of the Enemie: where hee cricamped well to his owe good liking in all things elfe; excepting that his men were driven to take much paines, in fetching their water somewhat farre off. Then was order taken for their meeting: and the two Generals, each of them with a troupe of Horse, rode forth of their Campes, till they came vnto a peece of ground; which was before well fearched, for feare of ambush. There they will their followers to fland off : and themselves, with each of them one Interpreter, encountred each other in the mid-way betweene their Companies. They remained a while filent. viewing one the other with mutuall admiration. Then beganne the Carthaginian Saluting the Roman, to deliuer his minde to this effect: That it had beene better both for Carthage and for Rome, if they could have limited and contained their ambition within the shores of Africk and of Italie; for that the Countries of Sicil and of Spaine, about which their fathers and themselues had striuen, were no sufficient recompence for so manie Fleets as had beene lost, and of so much bloud as had beene fhed, in making those costly purchases. But since things past could not bee recalled: He faid, That it was meet for them to confider, vnto what extreme dangers their owne Gities had beene exposed, by the greedie desire of extending their Empires abroad; and that it was cuentime for them now at length, to make an end of their obstinate contention, and pray the gods to endue them with greater wisedome hereafter. And to such peaceable disposition He affirmed that his owne yeares, and long triall of Fortune both good and cuill, had made him inclinable. But much he feared, that Scipio, by want of the like experience might rather fixe his mind your vncertaine hopes, than vpon the contemplation of that mutabilitie, whereto all humane affaires are subject. Tet (said He) mine owne example may peraduenture suffice to teach thee moderation. For I am that same HANNIBAL, who after my victoric at Canna wanne the greatest part of Italie: and deuised with my selfe, what I should doe with your Citie of Rome, which I hoped verily to have taken. Once I brought mine Armie to your walles. as thou half lince brought thine to ours of Carthage : but now, fee the change! I flandhere entreating thee to grant vs peace. This may serue as a document of Fortunes instabilitie, I fought with thy Father, Scipio: He was the first of the Roman Generals, that ever met mee in the field. I did then little thinke; that the time would come, that I should have such businesse, as now at the present, with his sonne. But this is even one of Fortunes Pageants, whereof flee hath many. And thou maist have experience of the like in thy selfe, who knowes how some? Thinke upon M. ATILIVS If hee would have hearkened unto such 30 perswassons, as I now ofe to thee; he might have returned home to Rome an happie man. And so maist thou doe now, if any reasonable offer will give thee satisfaction. How saift thou? Canst thou be contented, that all Spaine, Sicil, Sardinia, and what soener ilands else are situate betweene Italie and Africk, be abandoned by the Carthaginians for ever; and left unto the Romans, to beare Dominion therein? Thou shalt have glorie enough by effecting thus much : and the Romans may well be glad of such a bargaine. As for vs: our owne quiet shall henceforth give vs contentment. And the same contentment of ours, shall make vs faithfully observe the Peace with you. But if thou thinkest all too listle; I must desire thee to ponder well how great an hazzardthou must undergoe, for the obtaining of a verielittle more, than that which thou maift have without contention. It is now in thine owne power, to lay hold upon 40 good Fortune, if it please thee: stay but till to morrow night; and thou must take such fertune, as it shall please the gods. The ssue of battaile is uncertaine, and many times beguileth expettation. Men and steele we shall each of vs bring into the field: but of the victorie, neither of ushath assurance. Let us therefore without more a doc. make peace. And doe not tellme, that some false-hearted Crizens of ours dealt fraudulently of late in the like Treatie: It is I HANNIBAL that now desire peace with thee; which I would never doe, If I thought it not expedient for my Countrie. And thinking it expedient, I will alwayes maintaine it: like as I have maintained unto my power, as long as the gods did not envie mee, the Warre by meebegunne. Hercunto Scipio made answere, That it was no ambitious desire of ruling in Stell and in Spaine, which had moved the Romans to enter into this or the former Warre: but that the defence of the Mamertines, and afterwards of the Saguntines, their confederates, had caused them to put on those armes; which the gods by the finall iffue of the Warres had approved, and would approve to be most inst. As for the mutabilitie of Fortune: he faid, that he was not thereofignorant; and that without any note of infolence, or ouer-weening, he might well refuse the conditions of fered. For was it not plaine, that all these Countries, with which the Carthaginians now fo willingly departed, were alreadie wonne from them by the Romans? If, faid Hcc, thefe Conditions had beene propounded whileft as yet yee detained some part of Italie; they might peraduenture not have beene rejected. But as the case now stands, I see no reason, why I should remit unto you any one peece of those my former demands; to which the Carthaginians have neelded alreadie, and thought meeto deale graciously in being so moderate. Rather I say that the iniuries which they have done me fince, have made them unworthic of obtaining peace woon fo friendly termes. But I cannot blame thee, HANNIBAL, though then wouldelt be ogladto makethy Citizensunderstand, from how much of their burden they are by the meanes eafed Onely thou must thinke, that in like fort it concernes me in honour, not to let them bee gainers or fauers by the wrongs which they have done of late. Thou knowest well, that, befides tho (e offers which thou here hast made, they were well contented to restore unto us ransome-free all prisoners that they have of ours; to pay us five thousand Talents; to deliver up their Gallies; and to deliver hoftages for affurance of faire dealing. And must they now be discharged of allthis, by their breach of Truce, their spoiling of our Fleet, and their violating our Emballadours? Not fo. But if they can be contented, befides all this, to make fuch amends as Ishallrequire, for these inturies newly done: then will I take aduice with my Councell what answere to give you, otherwise, you may even prepare for warre, and blame your 20 owne felues , for that I have denied you peace. Hereupon they brake off: and returned each to his owne Campe, with no other newes than warre; bidding their Souldiors prepare for a battaile, wherein should be decided the quarrell betweene Rome and Carthage. The next morning at breake of day they issued into the field: a notable Match, and such as bath very seldome beene found; whether we regard the Generals; their Armies; the two Cities that contended; or the great importance of the battaile at hand. Scipio ordered his men. after the Roman manner : placing first the Hastati, divided into their Maniples , or finall Battalions, with a reasonable distance betweene them: Not farre behind these followed the Principes, likewise divided; and so after them the Triaris. But herein 30 Scipio altered alittle the ordinarie custome of the Romans: He placed not the Maniples of his Principes opposite vnto the void spaces betweene the Hastati, that so the Hastati, as was vivall, might fall backe betweene the Principes; but hee placed them directly one behind another, as it were in File. This Hee did because of the Elephants, wherof Hannibal had many. For of those beastes the danger was leffe, whilest there was open way to let them through. Therefore hee tooke such order, that when they had paffed through the spaces betweene the first Battalions, they should not come vpon the Principes in Front. Vnto his Velites or those of the light armature, that were to beginne the fight, Hee gaue direction, that when they found themselues ouer-charged, eyther by the Enemies, or (which was most to bee seared by the Elephants, they should runne backe through those lanes that were betweene the Maniples and that those which were swiftest, or otherwise best able. should continue on their flight, vntill they were got behind all their owne Armie, thereby leaving roome enough vnto those that were wounded, or cast behinde, to faue themselues on the void ground, that was betwixt the first and second, or the fecond and third Battailes, without cloying vp the way betweene the Maniples, which he defired to kepe open. His Italian Horse he placed in the left wing vnder C. Lelius. In the right wing was Mafanissa with his Numidians. He himselfe riding vp and downe, exhorted his men to doe valiantly; vling words not many, but verie forcible. He bade them remember what they had atchieued, fince their comming into Africke. He told them, That if this day were theirs, the warre was at an end: and that their victorie in this warre, should make them Lords of all the World; for and their victories in this war better that afterwards, none would be found able to resist them. On the contrarie, if they were bearen, he asked them whither they would fly. They were farre from home, were bearen, he asked them whither they would fly. They were farre from home yea and farre from their owne standing Campe: neyther was there any place in Africk.

Africk, that would giue them shelter; if they fell into the Carthoginian hands, they knew what to expect. And therefore there was none other way, but Death or Victory: vnlesse they would liue like wretched slaues vnder most mercilesse Enemies. In such needsley, he said, that they which consider themselves to be, and take resolution answerable thereunto, have neuer beene knowne to faile of getting victory.

Hannibal on the other side placed his Elephants, that were more than fourescore, in Front of his Battaile. Next behinde these, he made his Vantguard all of Mercinaries, Ligurians, Gaules, Baleares, and Moores. Then followed his Battaile : which was of Carthaginians and Africans, more interessed in the quarrell than were those Mercinaries; though not fo good fouldiers: but to helpe (ifit might be) their want of courage, they had with them foure thousand Macedonians, lately sent from King Philip. More than the space of a furlong behinde these came his Rereward, consisting of those braue Souldiers which had served him in his Italian warres; and were the onely men, in whom he reposed any confidence. Opposite to Lalius, in his own right wing he bestowed the Carthaginian Horse. Tycheus and the Numidians he placed in his left wing against Masanissa. He was indeede farre too weake for the linemie in Horse, both in number and in goodnesse. For Tychaus and Mezetullus had no more than three thousand; and those not so well exercised, as were the source thousand of Masanissa. The Carthaginians also were no more, nor none other than such as could be levied in the hast of a few daies; and the remainder of those, that 20 had of late beene often vanquished, and accustomed to flie. But it was no time for Hannibal, neither had he perhaps authoritie, to make these his companions alight and serue on foot, setting better men in their saddles. All that he could have done, was to flay a little longer, and expect more helpe. Had Vermina the fonne of Syphax come thither, as he did in few dayes after, with fixteene thousand and vowards, the most of them Horse: the advantage of number might have served wel to supplie all other defect. Yet since the Lords of Carthage would brooke no delay : Hannibal must be faine to comfort himselfe, with the hope that he reposed in his old Italian Souldiers; whose vertue had wrought greater wonders, when it was more strongly opposed. He encouraged therefore his men, with words agreeable to their seuerall conditions: promising vnto the Mercinaries bountifull rewards; threatning the Carthaginians with incuitable servitude, if they lost that day; but especially animating his old fellow-fouldiers, by the many victories which they had obtained against farre greater numbers. He bade them to looke vpon the Enemies; and make an estimate, whether they were any thing like so many, as that huge Armie which they had flaughtered at Canna. He willed them to remember, That it was one P. Scipie, euen the father of this man, whom they had first of all compelled to runne away. He told them, that these Legions which they yonder beheld, were, for the most part of them, the very worst of the Roman Souldiers; even such, as for their dastardly flight out of sundric battailes, could no longer be trusted to beare Armes in their owne 40 Countrie. As for the rest: they were yong men, the sonnes of Cowards, and bred vp in the continual feare of those weapons, by which their fathers were daily slaine or chaced. Wherefore he entreated these his old companions, vpon whose vertue he meant wholly to repose himselfe, that they would this day striue to make good their honour; and to purchase the fame of men inuincible.

Such exhortations vsed the two Generalls before the fight. When they drew neare together: the Numidian Horsemen on both sides beganne to skirmiss. The Trumpets, and other instruments of warre, sounded to battaile: and Hamibalcommanded his Elephants to breake you the Romans. Of these Elephants (as they were alwayes an vncertaine kinde of helpe) those that shood neare vnto the point of the less thing, turned backe for seare: and ranne you their owne Numidian Horse which they affrighted and disordered. Massach principles of the Roman Fritter, whom the same variations, and not suffering them to re-allie themselves, draue them quite out of the side of the Roman Fritter, whom they followed into the spaces betweene the Maniples: but without any harme to the Battalions themselues; which gaue them open way, accordingly as Scipio had well prouided. Divers of them receiving many wounds, and growing therewith furious, could no longer be gouerned : but ranne backe vpon the right point of their owne battaile, and beyond that into the open field. Herewithall they disordered the Carthaginian Horse which were in that wing : against whom they gaue to Lalius the fame advantage, that Mafaniffa had against the Numidians; which he vsed in like fort. In the meane while, the Battels of foote advanced, and drew neere together with a flow and flately pace, till they were almost within a weapons cast : at what time they gaue a shout, and ran one at the other. The Mercinaries for a time secmed both in audacitic, and in quickneffe, to haue the better of the Romans, wounding many, and doing more harme, than they tooke. But the Roman discipline after a while, pregailed against the boisterous violence of these vntrained Barbarians. Whereunto it helped not a little, that the battell of the Principes, following Comewhat neere after the Hastai, encouraged their fellowes; and shewed themselves readie, if neede were, to relieue them. Contrariwise, the Mercinaties received no manner of helpe or comfort, from those that should have seconded them. For the newleuied Carthaginians and Africans, when they faw their hired fouldiours give backe, did also themselues retire. This caused the Ligarians, Gaules, and the rest, to thinke themselues betraied: whereupon they inclined vnto slight. The Carthaginian Battaile was herewith more terrified than before, so as it refused to give way vnto the Mercinaries for their fafe retrait; and yet withall forbore to make head against the enemies, that pursued them. It was no time to aske them what they meant by this: Feare and Indignation caused those that were at once chaced by the Romans, and betrayed, as they thought, by their owne fellowes, to turne their armes with an heedleffe furie against both the one and the other. Thus were many of the Carthaginians beaten downe and slaine, through their owne indiscretion, by their owne Mercinaries. The Roman Haffate in like fort, fighting with desperate menina throng, had their hands fo full of worke; that the Principes were faine to come vp 20 vnto them, and helpe to ouer-beare this great medley of enemies, that were together by the cares among themselues. In this place was made a great slaughter, both of the Mercinaries and of the Carthaginians: which hindering one another, could neither fight, nor easily flie. Such of them as escaped, ran towards Hannibal: who kept his ground, and would not stirre one foote, to helpe or faue these Runne awaies. He caused his men to bend their Pikes at those of his owne side, that would have rushed woon him: whom he thereby compelled to turne afide beyond his Battaile, and faue themselues in the open field. The ground, ouer which the Romans were now to march, erethey could meete with Hannibal, was couered with fuch thicke heapes of dead bodies and weapons, and so slippery with bloud : that Scipio began to stand 40 in great doubt, left the orders of his Battalions should be disfoluted in passing that way. In such case, if hee should fight with that warlike Armie, which he saw before him, remayning yet entire, and without feare expecting him; He might be well affured to receiue a notable ouerthrow. He caused therefore the Hastati to make a stand there where they were, opposite vnto the maine battaile of the Hannibalians. Then drawing up his Principes and Triarij : He placed them, when they had ouercome the bad way, all in one Front with the Haftati, and made of them his two Cornets. This done, he advanced towards Hannibal: who entertayned him after another manner, than euer he had beene received in his life befor e. All the daies worke till now, seemed to have beene onely a matter of passime; in regard of the sharpe 50 Conflict, that was maintained betweene these notable souldiours. The Romans were encouraged, by their having prevailed all the day before: They were also farre the more in number. But these old souldiours of Hannibal were fresh; and (perhaps) the better men. They fought with fuch obslinate resolution, that no man gaue backe one foote; but rather chose to die vpon the ground, whereon he stood. So that, af-

after a long time, it was vncertaine which part had the worfe; vnleffe it may feeme. that the Romans were beginning to shrinke; forasmuch as the returne of Malanilla and Lelius from pursuit of the Enemies Horse, is said to have beene most happie and in a needfull time. These vpon the sudden charged the Hannibalians in Rere; and ouer-bearing them by meere violence, compelled them to fall to Rout.

In this Battaile there dved of the Romans fifteene hundred and vowards on the Carthaginian fide, about twentie thousand, besides as many that were taken; of whom, Sopater Captaine of the Macedonians, was one. The fingular skill that Hanwibal shewed in this his last fight, is highly commended by Polybius; and was acknowledged, as Liniereports, by Scipio himselfe. But the Enemies were too strong 10 for him in Horse; and being enjoyned, as hee was, by the state of Carthage to take barraile with fuch disaduantage, he could worke no maruels. He saued himselfe with à few Horse; and staid not in his journie, till he came to Adrumetum. Thence was he fent for to Carthage; from which he had been abfent fixe and thirtie yeares. At his comming into the Senate He faid plainly, That there was none other way left, than to take such peace as could be gotten. Wherefore the Carthaginians, not knowing what other course to take, resolue to send Embassadours againe; and trie the fanour of Scipio, whose armes they could not now resist.

Scipio having spoiled the Enemies Campe, returned backe to Vica: where hee found P. Lentulus newly arrived, with fiftie Gallies and an hundred Shippes of burden. With this Fleet, and that which hee had before, Hee thought it best to make towards Carthage: rather of purpole to terrific the Citie, than with any hope to take it. His Legions he committed vato Cn. Octavius, whom he willed to meet him there by land. Then fending Lelius away to Rome with newes of the victorie, He fet faile from Vica towards Carthage. Hee was encountred on the way by ten Embaffadours from the Citic: who bearing vp with the Admirall Gallie, beganne to vie the pittifull gesture of suppliants. But they received none other answere, than that they should meet him at Tunes, where He would give them audience. So rowing along before the Citic: and viewing it more in brauerie, than with meaning to attemptit; He returned backe to Ptica, and called backe Oftanius thither, with whom in person Hee set forwards to Tunes. As they were in their journie thither, they heard the newes, that Vermina the sonne of Syphax, was comming with an Armie of more Horse than Foot, to the succour of those that were alreadie vanquished. This Vermina seemes to have beene both carelesse of getting intelligence how things pasfed, and very defective in all other duties requilite in the Commander of an Armie. Part of the Roman Foot, with all their power of Horse, was sent against him: which did not onely beat him, but so compasse him in, that hee hardly escaped himselfe with a few, leaning fifteene thousand of his followers dead behinde him, and twelve hundred taken priloners. If this good companie had beene with Hannibal at Nada 40 gara, they should have beene farre better conducted, and might well have changed the Fortune of the day; which the Carthaginian loft, by default of Horse. But God had otherwise determined. It is not to bee doubted, that this victorie, thoughit were no great accesse vnto the former; yet served well to daunt the Carthaginians. and imprint in them the greater feare of Scipio. When he came to Tunes, there met him thirtic Embassadours from Carthage: whose behaviour though it was more pitifull than it had beene before, yet procured it leffe commiseration, by reason of their late false dealing, after they had in like fort humbled themselves. Neverthelesse it was confidered, what a long and laborious worke it would proue, to beliege the mightie Citie of Carthage. And particularly Scipio stood in great doubt, lest the honor of this warre, if it were protracted, should be taken out of his hands; and given to 50 one of the Confuls. Cn. Seruilius Capio, that Conful who had charge of the warre against Hannibal, at such time as he departed out of Italie: was bold to passe ouer into the Ile of Sicil(as it were in chace of Hannibal by him terrified and driven away) with a purpose thence to have proceeded into Africke, and taken from Scipio the Com-

CHAP.2. \ . 21. of the Historie of the World. mand of the Armie there. But a Dictator was chosen of purpose to restraine the ambition of this Conful Servilius, After him followed Tiberius Claudius, who made fuit for the same Province of Africk and was therein so earnest, that though neyther the Senate, nor People, would grant him his defire, yet he needes would be going, procuring onely leave of the Senate, that he being Conful might joyne with Scipio, were it with no more than equall authoritie. But ere Hee could have his Fleet and all things in a readinesse for the journie, wherein no man cared to further him: Winter came on and he was only toft at Sea with foule weather, first ypon the Goast of Hetruria, and afterwards by Sardinia; where his Confulship expired, and so he returned home a private man. Then came the joyfull newes to Rome, of the victorie obtained against Hannibal, and that the warre was now even at an end. Yet was Lentulus the new Conful fo paffionate, in defiring Africk for his Prouince, That he faid he would fuffer nothing to paffe in the Senate, vntill he had first his wil. Much adoe there was about this; and after many contentions, both in the Senate, and before the People, at latt it was ordered, That if Peace were granted, it should be granted by Scipie; if the warre continued, Scipio should have command therein by Land, and the Conful at Sea. The ambition of these men, caused Scipio to give the more favourable answerel vnto the Carthaeinian Embassadours. Hee willed them to consider what they had deserved and in regard thereof to thinke themselves wel dealt withall, in that he was contented to leave vnto them their libertie and their own Lawes, without appointing any Gouernour ouer them, or Garrison to hold them in subjection; leauing also vnto them their possessions in Africk, such as they were at the beginning of this warre. As touching the rest hee was at a point, That, before he eyther granted them Peace or truce, they should make satisfaction for wrongs which they had done, whillt the late Treatie was in dependence. Hereunto if they would yeild then required He That immediatly they (bould deliner up unto the Romans all Priforers, Fugitives, and Renegados, that they had of theirsalikewife all their Gallies, excepting tenne: and all their Elephants: That they should make no warre at all thenceforth out of Africk, neither yet within Africke, without licence of the Rumans: That the Countries, Towness 30 goods what soener, belonging any wife unto MASANISSA or to any of his Ancesters, which were in their possession, should bee all by them restored unto him: That they should finde corne for the Roman Armie, and wages for their Auxiliaries, during the time of Truce, untill the Peace were fully concluded : That they should pay tenne thousand Talents of Siquer, in the terme of fiftie yeares, by two hundred Talents a yeare : and that for observance of Conditions, they should give an hundred hostages. fuch as Scieno would choose, being none of them under foureteene yeares of age, nor a-

With these conditions the Embassadors returned home; and reported them vnto the Citic. They were verie unpleasing; and therefore one Gifco stood up to speake. 40 against them: and exhorted the People, who gaue good attention, that they should not condificend ynto such intolerable demands. But Hannibal perceiping this. and noting withall what fauourable audience was given to this uaine Oratour, by the viquiet yet vinwarlike Multitude; was bold to pull him downe from his flanding, by plaine force. Hereat all the people murmured; as if their common libertie were too much wronged, by fuch infolence of this prefumptuous Captaine. Which Hannibal perceiuing, role vp and spake vnto them : saying, That they ought to pardon him if he had done otherwise than the customes of the Citie would allow fora fmuch as he had been thence abfent over fince he was a Boy of nine yeares old, vntill he was now a man offine and fortic. Having thus excused himselfe of the difor-70 der, He discoursed vnto them concerning the Peace : and perswaded them to accept it, as wanting abilitie to defend themselves; had the demands of the Enemie beene yet more rigorous. Finally vpon good aduice, they refolued to yeeld vnto the Conditions propounded by Scipio : to whom they payed out of hand fine and twentie thouland pound weight of Silver, in recompence of damages, and injuries by them Cccccc 3 done to his Fleet and Embassadiadours. Scipio granted them Truce for three moneths; in which time they might negotiate with the State of Rome, about confirmation of the League. But herewithall Heegaue injunction, that they should neyther in the meane while send Embassadiadours any whithereste, nor yet disfinisse any Embassadours to them sens, without first making him acquainted what they were, and what their errand was.

At this time Hanno, and they of his Faction, were become wife and honourable men, by the miferies wherinto Carthage was fallen through their malicious Counfailes. A/drubal, furnamed the Kid, a venerable man, and great friend of Hanne, was chiefe of the Embassages which they sent to Rome for obtaining peace. They to went thither in companie of Scipio his Embaffadours; who related vnto the Senate and People these joyfull newes. About the same time arrived at Rome Embassadours from Philip King of Macedon: who, together with the Carthaginians, were faine to wait awhile for audience, till the election of new Confuls then in hand was finished; and order taken, for the Provinces of them, and the new Prætors. Then were the Macedonian Embassadors called into the Senate: who first answering vinto some points, wherein the Romans had lately fignified vnto their King that they found themselves grieved; returned the blame vpon those Greekes themselves, that had made their complaint at Rome. Then accused they M. Aurelius: who being one of the three Embassadours, that had lately beene sent from Rome vnto King Philip, 20 tarried in Greece behind his fellowes; and there lenging men, made warre youn the King, without any regard at all of the League, that was betweene him and the Romans. Further they defired of the Senate, That one Sopater, a Macedonian Gentleman, with other of their Countrimen, that had lately ferued Hannibal for Pay, and being taken Prisoners in Africk were kept in bonds by Scipio; might bee released, and delivered vnto them. Vnto all this M. Furius, whom Aurelius had fent to Rome for that purpofe, made a sharpe answere. He said, that the Greekes which were confederate with Rome, endured fo many injuries at the hands of Philip, that M. Aurelius was faine to stay behinde, to helpe them as hee might; which else were like to be brought under the Kings subjection. As for Sopater : He affirmed him to be one 20 of the Kings Counsaile, and verie inward with him; one that served not for monie, but carried monie with him, and foure thousand men, sent from the King to the aide of Hannibal. About these points when the Macedonian Embassadours could make vnto the Senate no good answere: they were willed to returne, and tell their Master, That warre hee fought, and warre hee should finde, if hee proceeded as he had begunne. For in two maine pointes He had broken the League, that was betweene him and the Romans : first , in that hee had wronged their Confederates; and secondly, in that hee had aided their Enemies against them with men and monic.

These quarrels with Philip, that promised to open a way into Greece and the Ea-40 series of the Countries, helped well the Carthaginian Embassadours in their sollicitation of Peace. They appeared a verie reuerend companie, when they entred into the Senate: and Astarbal about the rest was much respected, as one, whose good offices had kept the Romans from necessition feeding Embassadours to Carthage, youn the like errand. He liberally granted, that the justice of the quarrell shad been wholly on the Romans side; saying that it was the fault of some violent men, through which the Peace was broken. Yet could hee not altogether excuse the Citic; that had been too vehement in the prosecution of bad counsale. But it Hamas and himselfe might have had their wils: the Carthaginians, euen at the best of their Fortune, should have granted the peace which they now defired. Herewithall hee commended the moderation of the Romans, as no small argument of their valour, by which alwaies so they had beene victorious. To the same effect spake the rest of the Embassadours: all of them entreating to haue the Peace ratified; though some with more lamentable words than others, according to the discrimination of their site. They had patience enough to endure fuch reproofe of Perjurie, as they themselves might have laid vpon the Romans; if their diligence and sottune had beene such as the Romans was. Among the relt, when one of the Senators demanded, by what gods they would sweate to keep the peace hereaster: As a what made answere; Euen by the same gods, that are so Guerrowno those that violate their Leagues.

Lentulus the Conful interpoling the authoritie of his Office, would have hindred the Senate from proceeding vnto conclution of peace; for that hereby Hee was like to loofe the honour, which he purposed to get by making warre in Africke But the matter was propounded vnto the people, in whom rested the Soueraigne Comto mand of Rome; and by them referred wholly vnto pleasure of the Senate. So it was decreed. That Scipio with tenne Delegates fent vnto him from Rome of purpose. should make a League with the Carthaginians, vpon such Conditions as seemed belt : which were none other, than the same which hee had alreadie propounded. For this fauour, the Carthaginian Embaffadours humbly thanked the Senate and craued licence, that they might visite their Countrimen, which were prisoners in Rome : afterwardes, that they might ransome and carrie home with them some, that were their especiall friends; of whom they gaue in writing almost two hundred names. Whereupon the Senate ordained, that two hundred of those Prisoners, which the Embassadors would choose, should 20 be fent oner into Africk, and be freely restored to libertie by Scipio, when the peace was fully concluded. So they tooke leave, and returned home, in companie of the tenne Delegates, that were appointed by the Senate to joyne with Scipio in Com-

At their comming into Africke, the Peace was given, and accepted, without anic controversion of diplotation. The Prisoners, Fugitives, and Renegados, were delivered by to Scipio: likewise the Gallies, and the Elephants. Scipio tooke more vengeance upon the Renegados, than upon the Fugitives; and upon those of the Romans, than upon the Latines or other Italium. The Latines the beheaded: the Romans he crucified. About the sirrly payment of their monic, the Carinaginum were

But the lone of the Romans, and triendship of Wherefore the Romans embarqued themselves for Sicil: where when they arrived at Lilybeum, Scioio with some part of his Armie tooke his way home to Rome by land; and sent the rest before him thither by Sea. His journy through Italie was no leffe glorious than any Triumph : all the people thronging out of the Townes and Villages, to doe him honour as he passed along. He entered the city in Triumph: neither was there euer before, or after, any Triumph celebrated with fogreat ioy of the people, as was this of Scipio; though, in brauery of the pompe, there were others in time fhortly following, that exceeded this. Whether Syphan were carried through the to Citie in this Triumph, and died foone after in prison : or whether he were dead awhile before; it cannot be affirmed. Thus much may be anowed. vertue vnto Scipio the African.

the great similitude found in worldly cuents, the limitation of matter hath beene affigned as a probable cause. For fince Nature is confined vnto a subicet that is not vnbounded; the workes of Nature must needes be finite, and many of them resemble one the other. Now in those actions, that seeme to haue their whole dependence vpon the wil of man, 50 we are leffe to wonder, if we find leffe variety: fince it is no great portion of things which is obnoxious vnto humane power; and fince they are the fame affections, by which the wils of fundry men are o-

ner-ruled, in mannaging the affaires of our daily life. It may be observed in the change of Empires, before those times whereof we now write, how the Allyrians or Chaldeans invaded the kingdome of the Medes, with two hundred thousand foote and threescore thousand horse; but fayling in their intended conquest, they became Subject within a while themselves vnto the Medes and Persians. In like manner Darius, and after him Xerxes, fell voon the Greekes with fuch numbers of men, as might have feemed reliftlesse. But after that the Persians were beaten home, their Empire was never fecure of the Greekes: who at all times of leafure from inteffine war deuised vpon that conquest thereof, which finally they made vnder the great Alexander. If Nabuchodonofor with his rough old fouldiours, had undertaken the Medes : or Cyrus with his well trayned Armic, had made the attempt vpon Greece; the iffue might, in humane reason, have beene farre different. Yet would it then hane beene expedient for them, to employ the trauelland vertue of their men, rather than the greatnesse of their names, against those people; that were no lesse valiant, though leffe renowned, than their owne . For the menacing words vfed by Cyrus, and some small displeasures done to the Greekes (in which kind it may bee, that Nabuchodonofor likewise offended the Medes and Persians ) were not so availeable to victory, as to draw on reuenge in the future. Great Kingdomes, when they decay in strength, suffer as did the old Lyon, for the oppression done in his youth; being pinched by the Wolfe, gored by the Bull, yea and kickt by the Aife. But Princes are often carried away from reason, by misse-vinderstanding the language of Fame: and despising the vertue that makes little noise, aduenture to protoke it against themselves; as if it were not possible that their own glory should be foyled by any of leffe-noted excellence. Against the same stone, whereat Xerwes, and before him (as I take it) Euilmerodath, had itumbled; Pyrrhus the Epirot hath dallit his foot. Hee was not indeed the King of all Greece; though most of marke, and a better fouldiour than any other Greekilh King, when he entred into war against the Romans. This war he vindertooke as it were for his mindes fake : hatting received no initirie; but hoping by the glory of his name, and of the Greekes that ferued vnder him, to prenaile so easily against the barbarous Remans, that they should onely serue as a step to his further intended conquests, of Siciland Africk. But when the Romans, by their victory against Pyrrhus, had found their owne vertue to be of richer mettall, than was the more shining valour of the Greekes : then did all the brauery of the Epirot (his Elephants and what socuer else had ferued to make him terrible) serue onely to make the Romans, in time following, to thinke more highly of themselness * For fince they had ouercome the best Warriour in Greece, euen Him, that, being thus beaten by them, could in a yeere after make himselfe Lord of Greece and Mace- Spaines predon: what should hinder them from the conquest of all those vinwarlike Provinces, tended in uinwhich in compasse of twelve yeeres a Macedonian King of late memory had won? cible Natic, Certainly there was hereunto requifite no more, than to bring to their owne deuo- out or the Biltion, by fome good meanes, the whole Country of Greece: all the rest, this done, till leas, inuiwould follow of it felfe. When therefore the first Punick war was ended, which followed soone after the the Spaniards wars of Pyrrhus and of the Tarentines: then were the Romans at good leifure to hear- Bathered tokenafter newes in Greece; and to entertaine any good occasion, that should be on getter made that fide presented. They had also then a strong Fleet : and were become though account of any nototherwisevery skilfull Mariners, yet good fighters at Sea. Into this quarrell if the Romans were defirous to enter; the Queene was not flow to give them cause. And their happy accomplishing of that war which they made with $.7.

Her, was, in their owne opinion, a matter not vnworthy to make their Patronage to be defired by the Greekes. But no fuch thing happened: though they fent Embaffadours, as it were to offer themfelues; by fignifying, that for the loue of Greece they had vndertaken this Illyrian war. Thus began the first acquaintance betwit the Greekes and Romans: which afterwards increased very hashly, through the indiference of our flory, it is meet that we should relate (though somewhat briefly) the beginning of his reigne, and his first Actions.

It was like to proue a busic time in the world, when, within the space of soure yeares, new Kings began to reigne in the most of all Countries knowne; and three of them youg boyes, in three of the greatest kingdomes. This happened from the third yeere of the hundred thirtie ninth Olympiad, vnto the third of the Olympiad following. For in this time died Seleucus Ceraunus King of Alia and Syria, in whose roome succeeded his brother Antiochus, afterwards called the great. Ptolemic Philopater succeeded in the Kingdome of Agypt vnto his father Euergetes. And Philip the fonne of Demetrius, being lixteene or feuenteene yeeres old, received the Kingdome of Macedon, together with the Patronage of the Achaans and most of the Greekes; by the decease of his Vncle Antigonus Doson, that was called the Tutor or Protector. About the same time also was the like change in Cappadocia, Lacedamon, and the Countries about Mount Taurus. For Ariarathes then began his reigne in Cappadocia, 20 Lyourgus found meanes to make himfelf King ouer the Lacedemonians, whose Common-weale, fince the flight of Cleomenes, had continued in a manner headleffe; and Achaus, a kinfman of Antiochus, but a Robell vnto him, occupied the Rogions neare vnto Mount Taurus, and kept a while the state of a mighty King. Lastly, in the second and third yeeres of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad it was, that open warre brake out betweene Rome and Carthage; and that Hannibal began his great Invalion vpon Italie. Those troubles of the Westerne world, which were indeed the greatest, we have already followed vnto an end : Of Antiochus, Ptolemie, and the rest, we shall speake hereafter, when the Romans finde them out.

Philip, soone after the beginning of his reigne, came into Peloponnesus; greatly defired of the Acheans, and many others his dependants. That Country, having freed it felfe by the helpe of Antigonus from the danger (accounted great) of an eafie fubiection vnto Cleomenes: was now become no leffe obnoxious to the Macedonian, than it should have beene to the Spartan; and therewith all it lay open vnto the violence of the Atolians, who despised even the Maccdonian Kings, that were Patrons therof. These Atolians were no men to be idle; nor were much addicted to any other Art, than war. Therefore wanting employment, they fell vpon the Meffenians that were their owne Clients, and (excepting the Eleans, that were anciently of their confanguinity) the onely good friends which they had at the present in Peloponnefus. Their invalion was no leffe vnexpected, then it was vniult; whereby with greater case they made spoile of the Country; finding none prepared to make resistance. The Acheans were called by the Messenians to helpe: which they did the more willingly; because the Etolians, passing without leave through their Territory, had (as was their manner ) done what harme they lifted. Old Aratus could ill abide these Atolians; as both knowing well their nature, and remembring the injuries, wherewith most vngratefully they had requited no small benefits done to them by the Acheans. He was therefore so hasty to fall vpon this their Armie, that he could hardly endure to flay a few daies untill the time of hisowne Office came; being chosen Prator of the Acheans for the yeare following. But his anger was greater than his courage: and he shewed himselfe a man fitter (as hath beene already noted of him ) for any other feruice, than leading of an Armie. He suffered them to passe quietly along with their bootie, through a great part of the Countrie, wherein he might easily have distressed them; and afterwards pressed them so neare, when they had recourred ground of aduantage, that they eafily defeated all his Armie.

So they departed homerich, and well animated to returne againe. As for the Achaans, they got hereby onely the friendship of the Messenians : with whom, by licence of King Philip, they made confederacie. Shortly after, the Atolians inuaded Peloponnes againe; having no more to doe, than to passe over the narrow Streights of the Corinthian Bay, called now the Gulfe of Lepanto, where they might land in the Country of the Eleans. There ioyned with them in this their fecond Inualion a great number of the Illyrians: who neglecting that condition imposed vpon them by the Romans, of fetting out no ships of war vnto the Coast of Greece; made bold to sceke aduentures againe, and did great mischiefe. Demetrius Pharius, a creature of the Romans, commanded a part of these Illyrians: who shortly repented him of this his voyage; which caused him to lose his kingdome, as is shewed before. But this Demetrius went another way, and fell vpon the Ilands of the Cyclades in the Ægean Sea: whence returning, he did some good offices for King Philip or his friends. The rest of the Illyrians under Scerdilaidas, or Scerdiletus, having gotten what they could else where by rouing at Sea, accompanied the Ætolians into Peloponnesus: who made greater hauocke in the Countrie now, than in their former Expedition; and returned home, without finding any relistance.

Of these things great complaint was made vnto Philip, when he came to Corinth. And because men were desirous to satisfic themselues with some speedy reuenge:

20 there were that vrged to have some grieuous punishmental alyon the Leedenmonians: who were thought under-hand to have saucured the Etolians, in meere despight of the Acheans and Macedonians; by whom themselues had lately been subdued. It is true, that the Leedenmonians had beene of affected: and (which was worse) at the arrivall of Philip, they slue such friends of his, as having checked their inclination, seemed likely to appeach them of the intended rebellion. Neither durft they wel commit themselues to indepenent: but entreated the King, that he would abstaine from comming to them with an Armie: since their towne was lately much disquieted with civil discord, which they hoped soone to appeace, and meant alwais to remaine at his deuotion. Philip was castily fatisfied with this: not for that

30 he (or rather old Aratus, who then wholly gouerned him ) did misse-vndersland the Lacedemonians: but for that a greater worke was in hand, which ought not to be interrupted. There met at Corinth, in presence of the King, the Embassadours of the Acheans, Baotians, Phocians, Epirots, and Acarnanians: all complaying vpon the Atolians: and desiring to have war decreed against them, by common assent. Philip fent his letters vnto the Ætolians : requiring them to make ready theiranswer in some convenient time : if they could alleadge any thing in excuse of that which they had done. They returned word, that a Diet should be holden at Rhium for that purpose: whither if it pleased him to come or send, hee should be well informed of them and their whole meaning. The King prepared to have beene there at the day. 40 But when the Ætolians vnderstood this for certainty, they adjourned the Councell vnto a further time: faying, That fuch weighty matters ought not to be handled, faue in the great Parliament of all Ætolia. This tricke of Law notwithstanding, open war was proclaimed against them. And they, as it were to shew how well they had descrued it, made election of Scopas to be their Prætor, that was Author of these inualions made on Peloponnes w ; and the onely man, in a fort, vpon whom they must have laied the blame of these actions, if they would have shifted it from the publick After this, Philip went into Macedon; where he prepared bufily for the warrea-

After this, Philip went into OMateeans, Wene re in preparations with faire words and promifes: whom he callly won from the Lielian lide, for a function that the Lielian lide, for a function of the Mateer with them in their later copose and had coulened him of his share, when he was partner with them in their later coberies. In like for the Mehann, who had first of all others proclaimed the war in their owne Country, sent vnto the Mehanns, Epirets, Messenians, and Lacedamonians: requesting them for this with to declare them clauses, &to denounce war vnto the Mehanns; without staying (as it were) to await the enent, Hereunto they received disciple.

Lib. 5.ch. 1. S. 6. Ibid. diverse answeres, according to the qualities of those with whom they dealt. The Acarnanians, a free-harted and valiant, though a fmall Nation, and bordering your the . Atolians, of whom they stood in continuall danger; said, that they could not honeftly refule to shew their faithfull meaning in that war, which was concluded by generall affent. The Epirots that were more mighty, were neuertheleffe more cunning and referred : so that they stood vpon a needlesse point; and desired to be beld excused, vntill Philip (of whose meaning they needed not to have made any doubt) should first proclaime the war. The Meffenians, for whose cause the warre was undertaken, excused themselves, by reason of a Towne which the Atolians held vpon their borders; and faid, that they durst not be ouer-bold, vntil that bridle to were taken out of their mouthes. As for the Lacedamonians; the chiefe of them fludied onely how to mannage that treason, for which their City had beene so lately pardoned : and therefore dismissed the Embassadours of the Confederates, without any answer at all. They had three yeares together continued subject against their wils to the Macedonians, expecting still when Cleomenes should returne out of &. gypt to raigne ouer them againe; and maintaine, as he was wont, the honour of their City. In this regard they chose not any Kings; but were contented with the rule of Ephori. Of these there were some, that thought the publicke safety to consist, in holding their faith with the Macedonian that had preserved them: And hereto they referred all their counsailes; being perhaps not a little moued with respect of the 20 benefit, which might redound vnto themselues, byadhering firmely to those which at the present bore rule ouer them. Others, and those the greater part, were still deuising, how to make all ready for Cleamenes against his returne; and therefore fought to joyne with the Atolians, which were the most likely to give him strong affiltance. The Macedonian faction had the more authority, and durst more freely speake their mindes: but the contrary side was the more pallionate; and spared not by murders, or any other violent courses, to set forward their desire. Neither did it fuffice, that about these times there came certaine report of Cleomenes his death. For it was the liberty and honour of Sparta, which these intended: fancying vnto themfelues the glory of their Ancestors in such Ages past, as were not like to come again, 30 Cleamens was, they knew, the most able man to restore them vnto their greatnesse and lustre; which once he had in a manner performed: But since he was dead, and that, without injury to his well-deferring vertue, they might proceed to the election of new Kings: Kings they would have, and those of the race of Hercules, as in former times; for that without such helpes, they must continue little better than fubiects unto the Micedonian, and far leffe by him respected, than were the Achaans. Thus were they transported, by contemplation of their old Nobility and fame. Some of the most working spirits among them, procured the Etolians to send an Embaffie to Sparta: which propounded the matter openly vnto the people; whereof no one of the Citizens durst have made himselfe the Author. Much disputation 40 and hot there was, betweene those of the Macedonian partie and these their oppofites: in such wise that nothing could be concluded; vntill by massacre or banishment of all, or the chiefe, that spake against the Ætolians, the diversitie of opinion was taken quite away. Then forthwith a League was concluded betweene the Lacedamonians and Etolians: without all regard of the Macedonians or Achaans; who had spared the Citie, when they might have destroicd it. Then also they went in hand with the election of new Kings: wherein their diligence was so nice, and so regardfull of their ancient Lawes, as touching the choosing of the one King; that we may justlie wonder, how they grew so carelesse in making choice of the other. In the one of their Royall families they found Agespolis the sonne of Agespolis the for. 10 of King Cleombrotus: and him they admitted to reigne ouer them, as heire apparant to his Grandfather. This Agesipolis was a yong boy, standing in neede of a Guardian; and had an Vncle, his fathers brother, that was fit for the Gouernment. Yet because the Law required, that the sonne, how yong soener, should have his fathers whole right and title: the Lacedamonians, though flanding in neede of a man, were fo punctuall in obferuation of the Law; that they made this childe their King,, and appointed his Vinde Clemenes to bee his Protector. But in the other branch of the Royall family, though there was no want of heires: yet would not the people trouble themselues about any of them, to examine the goodnesse of his Claime, but made election of one Lourgus, who having no manner of title to the kingdome, bestowed vpon each of the Ephoria Talent, and thereby made himselse be saluted King of Sparta, and a Cendeman of the race of Harotals. This Lyeungus, to gratish the Partissan, and to approve his worth by Action; insuded the Countrie of the Argines: which lay open and vngarded, as in a time of peace. There hee did great spoile, and wanne duers Townes; whereof two hee retained, and annexed vnto the State of Lacedamon. After such open hostilitie; the Lacedamonian declared themselues on the Letolian side; and proclaimed warre against the A-

Thus the beginnings of the warre fell out much otherwise, than the Achaans and their Confederates had expected, when they first made preparation. Philip was not readic; the Epirots gave vncertaine answere: the Messenians would not firre: all the burden must lie vpon themselues and the poore Acarnanians, whom the Atolians, by favour of the Eleans, could invade at pleasure, as they were like to doe; and by helpe of the Lacedamonians, could affaile on all parts at once. It was not long ere the Ætolians, passing ouer the Bay of Corinth, surprised the Towns of Ægira: which if they could have held, they should thereby grieuously have molested the Acheans; for that it flood in the mid-way betweene Agium and Siegon two of their principall Cities, and gaue open way into the heart of all their Gountrie. But as £gira was taken by furprise : so was it presently lost againe, through greedinesse of spoile, whilest they that should have made it their first care to assure the place vnto themselves, by occupying the Cittadell and other peeces of strength, fel heedleffely to ranfack private houses, and thereby gave the Citizens leave to make head, by whom they were driven with great flaughter backe vnto their Fleet. About the same time, another Lielian Armie landing among the Eleans, fell vpon the Westerne Coast of Achaia; wasting all the Territoric of the Dymans and other people, that were first beginners of the Achean Confederacie. The Dymaans and their neighbours made head against these Inuaders; but were so wel beaten that the enemie grew bolder with them than before. They fent for helpe vnto their Pretor, and to all the Townes of their Societie. In vaine. For the Acheans having lately beene much weakened by Cleomenes, were now able to doe little of themselves: neither could they get any strength of Mercinaries; for a smuch as at the end of Cleomenes his war, they had couctoufly with-held part of their due from those that serued them therein. So through this disabilitie of the Acheans, and insufficiencie of their Pretor; the Dymeans, with others, were driven to with hold their contribution heretofore made for the publike feruice, and to concert the monie to their own defence. Lycurgus also with his Lacedamonians, began to winne upon the Arcadians; that were confederate with Philip and the Acheans.

Philip came to the borders of the £talians, whilft their Armie was thus employed a farre off in Pelopoma(us. The Epirots ioyned all their forces with him: and by fuch their willing readines, drew him to the feige of a Frontier pecce, which they defired to get into their own hands, for that, by commoditie thereof, they hoped fhortly to make themseluse Masters of £mbrata. There he spent fortic dayes, ere he could end the busines, which tended onely to the benefit of the Epirots. Had he entred into the part of £toliaat his sirft coming; it was thought that the might haue made an end of the war. But it happens oft, that the violence of great Armies is broken upon simal Townes or Forts: and not feldome, that the importunitie of Associates, to haue their own desires fulfilled, converts the preparations of great Kings to those vies for which they never were intended, thereby hindering the prosecution of their maine Dddddd deffignes.

deffignes. Thus was our King Henrie the eight led afide, and quite out of his waie. by Maximilian the Emperour to the fiege of Tournay; at fuch time as the French King Lewes the twelfth, hearing that the strong Citic of Termin was loft, and that of his Cauellerie, wherein rested his chiefe confidence, two thousand were beaten by the Earle of Effex with feuen hundred English; was thinking to withdraw himselse into Brittaine, in feare that Henrie would have come to Paris.

The flay that Philip made at Ambracus, did wondroufly embolden the Etolians: in such fort, as their Prætor Scopes adventured to lead all their forces out of the Countrie; and therewith not onely to ouer runne Thessalie, but to make impression into Macedon. Hee ranne as farre as to Dium, a Citie of Macedon vpon the Agean 10 Sea: which, being for faken by the Inhabitants at his comming, Hee tooke, and razed to the ground. Hee spared neyther Temple, nor any other of the goodly buildings therein, but ouerturned all: and among the rest, he threw downe the Statua's that were there erected, of the Macedonian Kings. For this he was highly hononred by his Countrimen at his returne; for a fmuch as hereby they thought their Nation to be growne terrible, not onely (as before) vnto Peloponnesus, but euen to Macedon it selfe. But this their pride was soone abated; and they rewarded shortly at home in their owne Countrie, for their paines taken at Dium. Philip having difpatched his worke at Ambraeus, made a strong inuasion vpon £tolia. Hee tooke Phoetia, Metropolis, Oeniade, Paanium, Elaus, and divers other Townes and Castles 20 of theirs: of which hee burnt some, and fortified others. Hee also beat the . Ftolians in fundric skirmishes; and wasted all the Countrie ouer, without receiving any harme. This done, while he was about to make a cut over the Streights into Peloponnesus, and to doc the like spoile in the Countrie of the Eleans, whereto he was vehemently follicited by the Achean Embaffadours : newes came out of Macedon, that the Dardanians were readie with a great Armie to fal youn the Countrie. These Dardanians were a barbarous people, divided by Mount Hamus from the Northerne part of Macedon; and were accustomed to seeke bootie in that wealthie Kingdome, when they found their owne times. Hauing therefore intelligence, that Philip was about to make a journic into Peloponne fus: they purposed in his absence, which they 20 thought would be long, to get what they could for themselues in his Countrie; as had beene their manner upon the like aduantages. This made the King to difmiffe the Achean Embassadours, (whom hee should have accompanied home with his Armie) and to bid them have patience vntill another yeare. So Hee tooke his way home : and as he was palling out of Acarnania into Epirus, there came to him Demetrius Pharius with no more than one Ship; that was newly chaced out of his Kingdome by the Romans. This Demetrius had lately shewed himselfe a friend to Antigonus Doson, in the warres of Cleomenes : and returning in his last Voyage from the Cyclades, was readic, at their first request, to take part with Philips Captaines. These, or the like confiderations, made him welcome vnto the Macedonian King: whose 40 Counsailor he was euer after. The Dardanians hearing of the Kings returne, brake vp their Armie; and gaue over for the present their invasion of Macedon, towardes which they were alreadie on their way.

All that Sommer following the King rested at Larissa in Thessale, whilest his people gathered in their Haruest. But the Ltolians rested not. They auenged themfelues upon the Epirots: whom for the harmes by them and Philip done in Etolia, they requited with all extremities of warre, among which, the most notable was the ruine of the famous Temple of Dodons. When Winter grew on, and all thought of warre untill another yeare was laid afide : Philip stole a journie into Peloponne sus, with flue thousand Foot, and about four hundred Horse. As soone as hee was 50 within Corinth; He commanded the Gates to be shut, that no word might be carried forth of his arrivall. He fent privily for old Aratus to come thither vnto him : with whom he tooke order, when, and in what places, he would have the Achean Souldiors readie to meet him. The Enemies were then abroad in the Countrie, with fomewhat more than two thousand Foot and an hundred Horse; little thinking to meete with such opposition. Indeed they had little cause to scare: since the Acheans themselves were not aware that the King was in their Land with his Macedonians; untill they heard, that these two thousand Eleans, Atolians, and their fellowes, were by him surprised, and all made prisoners, or slaine. By this exploit which hee did at his first comming, Philip got verie much reputation : as likewise hee purchased both reputation and love, by divers actions immediatly following. He wanne P/ophis, an exceeding frong Towne, in the borders of Arcadia; which the Eleans and Ætolians then held. Hee wanne it by affault at his first comming : wherein it much availed him, that the Enemie, not believing that he would vindertake fuch a peece of worke at such an vnseasonable time of the yeare, was carelesse of prouiding euen fuch store of weapons, as might have served to defend it. The Towne was preserned by the King from fack; and given to the deheans, of his owne meere motion, before they requested it. Thence went he to Lasion, which yeelded for verie feare; hearing how easily he had taken Plophis. This Towns also he gaus to the Acheans. The like liberalitie he yied towards others; that had ancient title vnto places by him recovered. Then fell he vpon the Countrie of Elis, where was much wealth to bee gotten: for that the people were addicted to hufbandrie, and liued abroad in Villages; euen fuch as were of the wealthier fort among them. So hee came to the Citie of Olympia: where having done facrifice to Iupiter, feasted his Captaines, and refreshed his Armie three dayes; Hee proceeded on to the spoile of those, that had taken pleasure to share with the Atolians, in the spoiles of their other-wise-deseruing neighbours. Great abundance of Cattaile hee tooke, with great numbers of flaues, and much wealth of all forts; fuch as could bee found in rich villages. Then fell he in hand with the Townes whereinto a great multitude of the Countrie-people were fled. Some of these were taken at the first assault. Some yeelded for scare. Some preuented the labour of his journie, by sending Embassadours to yeeld before hee came. And some that were held with Garrisons against their wils, tooke courage to fet themselves at libertic, by seeing the King so neare; to whose Patro-30 nage thenceforth they betooke themselves. And many places were spoiled by the Esolian Gaptaines; because they distrusted their abilitie to hold them. So the King wanne more Townes in the Countrie, than the sharpnesse of Winter would suffer him to flav there dayes. Faine he would have fought with the Atolians: but they made fuch hast from him, that he could not overtake them, vntill they had covered themselves within the Towne of Samicum; where they thought to have beene safe. But Philip affaulted them therein fo forcibly, that hee made them glad to yeeld the place; obtaining licence to depart, with their lines and armes. Hauing performed so much in this Expedition, the King reposed himselfe a while in Megalopolis; and then removed to Argos, where he spent all the rest of the Winter. Before the Kings arrivall in Peloponnesus, the Lacedemonians with Lyeurgus their new King, had gotten somewhat in Arcadia; and threatned to doe great matters. But when they were admonished, by the calamitie that fell vpon the Eleans, of the danger hanging ouer their owne heads; they quitted their winnings, and withdrew themselves home. This Lyourgus, as hee had no other right to the Kingdome of Sparta, than that which he could buy with monie : fo was hee neither free from danger of conspiracies made against him; nor from those jealousies, with which Vsurpers are commonly perplexed. There was one Chilon, of their Royall bloud, that thinking himselfe to have best right vnto the Kingdome, purposed to make way thereunto, by massacre of his opposites; and afterwards to confirme himselfe, by 50 propounding vnto the Multitude such reformation of the State as was most popular: namely, by making an equall distribution of all the Lands among the whole number of the Citizens, according to the ancient institution of that Commonwealth. He wanne to his partie some two hundred men; with whom hee fell vpon the Ephori as they were together at supper, and slew them all. Then went he to Ly-estreus his house; who perceining the danger, stole away and fled. It remained that he should give account of these doings to the people, and procure them to take part with him. But their mindes being not hereto prædisposed; they so little regarded his goodly offers, as euen whilft he was vling his best perswasions, they were consulting how to apprehend him. Chilon perceived whereabout they went, and shifted presently away. So hee lived afterwards among the Achaans a banished man, and hated of his own people. As for Lycurgus, he returned home : and fulpecting thenceforth all those of Hercules his race, found meanes to drive out his fellow-King your Agelipolis; whereby he made himselfe Lord alone. His doings grew to be suspected. in such fort as once he should have beene apprehended by the Ephori, But though his actions hitherto might have beene defended; yet rather than to adventure himfelfe into judgement, he chose to flie for a time, and sojourne among his friendes the Atolians. His wel-knowne velocmencie in opposition to the Macedonians, had procured vnto him fuch good liking among the people, that in his absence they beganne to consider the weaknesse of their owne surmises against him; and pronouncing him innocent, recalled him home to his Estate. But in time following, Hee tooke better heed vnto himselfe: not by amending his condition (for he grew a Tyrant, and was fo acknowledged) but by taking order, that it should not bee in the power of the Citizens to expell him when they lifted. By what actions hee got the name of a Tyrant : or at what time it was, that hee chaced Agelipalis out of the Ci-20 tie; I doe not certainly finde. Like enough it is, That his being the first of three vsurpers, which followed in order one after another, made him to bee placed in the ranke of Tyrants; which the last of the three verie justly deserved. What soeuer hee was towards some private Citizens: in the war against Philip, He behaved himselfe as a prouident man, and carefull of his Countries good.

Hileft the King lay at Argos, denifing upon his bufineffe for the years following; some ambitious men that were about him, studied so diligently their own greatnesse, as they were like to have spoiled all that he tooke in hand. Antigonus Doson had left unto Philip such Counsailors, as to him did feeme the fitteft men for governing of his youth. 40

The cheife of these was Apelles, that had the charge of of his person, and ordering of his Treasures. This man, seeming to himselfe a great Polititian, thought that he should do a notable peece of service to his Prince; if he could reduce the Acheans ynto the same degree of subjection, wherein the Macedonians lived. To bring this to passe; during the late Expedition hee had caused some of the Macedonians to thrust the Achesms out of their lodgings, and to strip them of the bootic that they had gotten. Proceeding further, as occasion fell out, He was bold to chastice some of that Nation; causing his Ministers to take and whippe them. If any of them offered (as there were some of them that could not refraine) to helpe their fellowes; them hee laid by the heeles, and punished as Mutiners. Hereby hee thought to bring it to 50 passe by little and little, that they should bee qualified with an habite of blind obedience; and thinke nothing vniust that pleased the King. But these Achaans were tenderly sensible in matter of libertie: whereof if they could have been contented to fuffer any little diminution, they needed not have troubled the Macedonians to helpe them in the warre against Cleomenes: They bemoned themselues vnto old Aratus: and befought him to thinke vpon fome good order, that they might not bee oppressed by degrees. Aratus forthwith dealt carnelly with the King; as in a matter more weightie, than at first it might seeme. The King be stowed gracious words upon those that had beene wronged; and forbad Apelles to follow the course begunne. Hereat Apelles was inwardly vexed, though he diffembled his choller for a time. He thought fo well of his owne Proiect, that he could not endure to lavit aside; being perhaps vnable to doe the King any valuable service, in businesse of other nature. Hee purposed therefore hereafter to beginne at the head; since, in biting at the taile, the fish had shot away from his mouth. It could not otherwise bee than that among the Acheans there were some, who bore no heartic affection to Aratus. These he enquired out : and sending for them, entertained them with wordes of Court; promiling to become their especiall friend, and commend them vnto the King. Then brake he his purpose with the King himselfe: letting him know, that as long as he continued to make much of Aratus, He must be faine to deale precisely with the Acheans, and, as it were by Indenture, according to the letter of the Contract: whereas if he would be pleafed to give countenance vnto those others whom he himselfe commended, then should the Acheans, and all other Peloponnesians, bee quickly brought to conforme themselues, vnto the dutie of obedient Subiects. By fuch perswasions, He drew the King to be present at Agium, where the Acheans were to hold election of a new Prætor. There with much more labour, than would haue beene needfull in a businesse of more importance; the King, by faire words and threatnings together, obtained fo much, That Eperatus, a verie infufficient man, but one of Apelles his new Fauorites, was chosen Prætor, instead of one more worthie for whom Aratus had laboured. This was thought a good introduction vnto greater matters that should follow. The King from thence passed along by Patras and Dyma, to a verie firong Castle held by the Eleans, which was called Tichos. The Garrison yeilded it up for feare, at his first comming : whereof hee was glad;

20 fently did. The King thought it strange, that all this while he hard of no messingers from the Eleans, to fue for peace. For at his departure out of their Countrie the last Winter, hee had let loofe one Amphidamus a Captaine of theirs, that was his Prisoner; because hee found him an intelligent man, and one that undertooke to make them forfake their alliance with the Æiolians, and joyne with him vpon reasonable termes. This if they could be cotented to do, He willed Amphidamus to let them understand, That he would render vnto them freely all prisoners which he had of theirs; That he would defend them from all forrein invalion; and that they should hold their libertic entire, liuing after their owne Lawes, without paying any manner of Tri-for that hee had an earnest defire to bestow it vpon the Dymaans, as hee pre-

40 bute, or being kept under by any Garrison. These Conditions were not to be defpised, if they had found credit as they might have done. But when Philip came to the Castle of Tichos, and made a new invasion vpon their Countrie: then beganne the Eleans, (that were not before over-haftie to beleeve fuch faire promifes ) to fufpect Amphidamus as a Traitour, and one that was fet on worke for no other end, than to breed a mutuall diffidence betweene them and the Atolians. Wherefore they purposed to lay hands upon him, and send him Prisoner into Atolia. But he perceived their intent, and got away to Dyma: in good time for himselfe; in better for Aratus. For the King (as was faid) maruailing what should be the cause, that he heard no news from the Eleans, concerning the offers which he had made vnto them 50 by Amphidamus: Apelles, his Counfailor, thereby tooke occasion to supplant Aratus, He said that old Aratus, and his sonne together, had such deuices in their heads, as tended little to the Kings good; And long of them he faid it was, that the Eleans did thus hold out; For when Amphidamus was difmissed home, the two Matis (the father and the sonne) had taken him aside and given him to understand, that it would Dddddd 3

be verie præjudiciall to all Peloponnesus, if the Eleans once became at the deuotion of the Macedonian; And this was the true cause, why neyther Amphidamus was verie carefull in doing this meffage, nor the Eleans in hearkning to the Kines offers. All this was a false lie; denised by Apelles himselfe, upon no other ground than his owne malice. Philip had no sooner heard his tale, but in a great rage hee sent for the two Arati; and bad Apelles rehearse it ouer agains to their faces. Apelles did so, and with a bold countenance, talking to them as to men alreadie conuicted. And when hee had faid all the reft, ere eyther Philip or they spake any word; He added this clause as it were in the Kings name: Since the King bath found you fuch vngratefull wretches; it is his meaning to hold a Parliament of the Acheans; and therein having made it 10 knowne what yee are, to depart into Macedon, and leave you to your selves. Olde Aratusgrauely admonished the King, That whensoener hee heard any accusation, especially against a friend of his owne or a man of worth; He should forbeare awhile to give credit, vntill he had diligently examined the bufinesse. For such deliberarion was Kingly, and hee should neuer thereof repent him. At the present hee said there needed no more, than to call in those that had heard his talke with Amphidamus; and especially him that had brought this goodly tale to Apelles. For it would be a verie abfurd thing, That the King should make himselfe Authour of a report in the open Parliament of Achaia, whereof there was none other euidence, than one mans yes, and anothers no. Hereof the King liked well; and faid that he would make 20 fufficient inquirie. So passed a few dayes : wherein whilest Apelles delaied to bring in the proofe, which indeed he wanted; Amphidamus came from Elis, and told what had befallen him there. The King was not forgetfull, to examine him about the conspiracie of the Arati: which when hee found no better than a meere device against his honourable friends; Hee entertained them in louing manner as before. As for his loue to Apelles, though it was hereby somewhat cooled; yet by meanes of long acquaintance and daily employment, no remiffion therein could be discerned.

The varestfull temper of Apelles, having with much vehemencie brought nothing to passe; began (as commonly Ambition vseth) to swell and grow venomous 30 for want of his free motion. Hee betakes himselfe to his cunning againe: and as before, being checkt in his doings with those of the vulgar, hee had prepared a snare for the Arati; fo fayling of them he thinkes it wisedome to lay for the King himfelfe, and for all at once which were about him. In fuch manner fometime, the Spider thought to have taken the Swallow which draue away Flies out of the chimnie; but was carried (net and all) into the A yre by the bird, that was too strong to be caught and held by the fubtile workmanship of a Cob-web. Of the foure that next vnto Apelles were left by Antigonus in chiefe place about Philip; Taurion, his Lieutenant in Peloponnesus, and Alexander Captaine of the Guard, were faithful men, and such as would not bee corrupted. The other two, Leontius Captaine of the 40 Tarquetiers, and Megaleas chiefe of the Secretaries, were casily wonne to bee at Apelles his disposition. This Polititian therefore studied how to remoue the other two from their places, and put some Greatures of his owne into their roomes. Against Alexander He went to worke the ordinarie way, by calumniation and priuie detraction. But for the supplanting of Taurion hee vsed more finenesse; loading him with daily commendations, as a notable man of warre, and one, whom for his many vertues, the King might ill spare from being alwayes in his presence. By such art he thought to have removed him, as wee fay, Out of Gods blefing into a warme Sunne. In the meane feafon Aratus retired him felfe; and fought to avoid the dangerous friendship of the King, by forbearing to meddle in affaires of State. As for the new Prætor of Achaia, lately chosen by such vehement instance of the King; He was a man of no dispatch, and one that had no grace with the People. Wherefore a great deale of time was loft, whilest Philip wanted both the monie and the Corne, wherewith he should have beene furnished by the Acheans. This made the King understand his owne errour, which he wisely lought to reforme betimes. Hee perfixed the Achaens to rejourne their Parliament from Agimm, to Suyon the Towne of Arains. There he dealt with the old man and his some: persuading them to forget what was past 3k laying all the blame upon Apelles, on whom thenceforth he intended to keepe a more diligent eye. So by the trauell of these worthie men, Hee cassilie obtained what he would of the Achaens. Fiftet alents they gave him out of hand, with great flore of Corne: and further decreed, That so long as he himselfe in person followed the warres in Pelopomosius, he should receive ten talents a moneth. Being thus enabled, he began to provide shipping, that so he might into take the Altiolium, Eleans, and Lacedemoniams, that were maritime people, at his pleafure, and binder their exerctions by See

It vexed Apelies beyond meafure, to fee things goe forward fo well without his helpe; euen by the miniferrie of those whom he most hated. Wherefore he entred into conspiracie with Leontius and Megaless: binding himselfer and them by oath, to crosse and bring to nought, as well as they were able, all that the King should take in hand. By 6 doing they thought to bring it to passed, that everie want of abilities to doe any thing without them, should make him speake them faire; and be glad to submit himselfero their directions. The King it is like had shood in some awe of them whiles the was a child; and therefore these wise men persuaded them—and the submit himselfero their directions. The king it so like had shood in some save of them whiles the was a child; and therefore these wint on him all that fell out ill through their ownem singouernment of his affaires, they might rule him as a child still. Apelles would needes goe to Chaleis, there to take order for the provisions, which were to come that way out of Macedon: The other two shaid behind with the King, to play their parts; all more mindfull of their wicked oath, than of their dutie.

His fleet and Armie being in a readines: Philip made countenance, as if he would haue bent all his forces against the Eleans; to whose aid therefore the Etolians sent men, little fearing that the mischiefe would have fallen, as soone after it did, vpon themselues. But against the Eleans and those that came to help them, Philip thought it enough to leave the Acheans, with some part of his and their Mercinaries. Hee 30 himselfe with the body of his Armie putting to Sea, landed in the Isle of Cephallemia: whence the Etolians, dwelling ouer against it, vsed to furnish themselves of shipping, when they went to roue abroad. There he belieged the Towne of Palas, that had beene very scruiccable to the Enemie against him and his Confederats; and might be very vie full to him, if hee could get it. Whilest hee lay before this Towne, there came vnto him fifteene ships of war from Scerdilaidas; and many good fouldiers, from the Epirots, Acarnanians, and Messenians. But the Towne was obstinate; and would not be terrified with numbers. It was naturally fenced on all parts faue one, on which fide Philip carried a Mine to the wall, wherewith he ouerthrew two hundred foot thereof. Leonteus Captaine of the Targettiers, was ap-40 pointed by the King to make the affault. But he, remembring his couenant with Apelles, did both willfully forbeare to doe his best; and caused others to doe the like. So the Macedonians were put to foile, and many flaine; not of the worst fouldiers. but such as had gotten ouer the breach, and would have carried the Towne, if the Treason of their Captaine, and some by him corrupted, had not hindered the victory. The King was angrie with this: but there was no remedie; and therefore he thought vpon breaking vp the fiege. For it was eafier vnto the Townef-men to make vp the gap in their wall, than for him to make it wider. Whilest he stood thus perplexed, and vncertaine what course to take : the Messenians and Acarnanians lay hard vpon him, each of them delirous to draw him into their owne Countrie. The 50 Messenians alleadged, that Lyeurgus was busic in washing their Countrie: vpon whom the King might come vnawares in one day; the Etelian windes which then blew, serving fitly for his Nauigation. Hereto also Leontius perswaded; who confidered that those windes, as they would easily carrie him thither, so would they detaine him there perforce (blowing all the Dog-daies) and make him spend the Sommer to small purpose. But Aratus gaue better counsaile, and prevailed. Hee showed how unfitting it were, to let the Etolians ouer-run all Theffaire againe, and some part of Macedon, whilest the King withdrew his Armie farre off to seeke small aduentures. Rather, he faid, that the time now ferued well to carry the war into Aetolia; fince the Prætor was gone thence abroad on rouing, with the one halfe of their strength. As for Lyeurgus; hee was not strong enough to doe much harme in Peloponnesus: and it might suffice, if the Acheans were appointed to make head against him. According to this aduice, the King fets faile for Actolia; and enters the Bay of Ambracia, which divided the Actolians from Acarnania. The Acarnanians were glad to fee him on their borders; and joyned with him as many of them as 10 could beare armes, to helpe in taking vengeance vpon their bad neighbours. Hee marched vp into the in-land Countrie: and taking some places by the way, which he filled with Garrisons to affure his Retrait; He passed on to Thermum; which was the Receptacle of the Atolians, and furest place of defence in all extremities. The Country round about was a great Fastnesse, enuironed with rockie Mountains of very narrow, steepe, and difficult ascent. There did the Etolians vseto hold all their chiefe meetings, their Faires, their election of Magistrates, and their folemne games. There also they vsed to bestow the most precious of their goods, as in a place of greatest securitie. This opinion of the naturall strength, had made them carelesse in looking vnto it. When Philip therefore had ouercome the bad way, there 20 was nothing elfe to doe than to take spoile: whereof hee found such plentie, that he thought the paines of his journie well recompenced. So he loaded his Armie: and consuming all that could not be carried away, forgot not to raze a goodly Temple, the chief of all belonging vnto the Ltolians; in remembrance of the like their courtelle, shewed upon the Temples of Dium and Dodona. This burning of the Temple, might (questionlesse) more for the Kings honour haue beene forborne. But perhaps he thought, as Monfieur du Gourgues the French Captaine told the Spaniar ds in Florida, That they which had no faith, needed no Church. At his returne from Thermum, the Ætolians laid for him: which that they would doe, he beleeved before and therefore was not taken vnawares. Three thousand of them there were 20 that lying in ambush fell vpon his skirts: but hee had laid a Counter-ambush for them of his Illyrians; who flaving behind the reft, did fet vpon the backes of the Aetolians, whilest they were busily charging in Rere the Armie that went before. So with flaughter of the enemic, he returned the fame way that he came : and burning downe those places that he had taken before, as also wasting the Country round about him, Hee fafely carried all that hee had gotten aboord his Fleet. Once the Actolians made countenance of fight, iffuing out of Stratus in great brauerie. But they were beaten home faster than they came, and followed to their verie gates.

The ioy of this victorious Expedition being euerie way complete, and not deformed (as commonly happens) by any finister accident; it pleased the King to 40 make a great feast vnto all his friends and Captaines. Thither were inuited among the rest Leontius, with his fellow Megaleas. They came, because they could not choose: but their heavie lookes argued, what little pleasure they tooke in the Kings profperitie. It greened them to thinke, that they should be able to give no better account vnto Apelles, of their hindering the Kings businesse; fince Apelles himfelfe, as will be shewed anon, had plaied his owne part with a most mischieuous dexteritie. The forrow and indignation, which they could ill dissemble in their faces, brake out after supper, when they had warmed themselves with drinke, into open riot. Finding dratus on the way home to his Tent : they fell to reuiling him, throwing flones at him, fo that they caused a great vprore; many running in (as to happens in fuch cases) to take part with the one or the other. The King sending to inquire of the matter, was truly informed of all that had paffed. Which made him fend for Leontins and his fellowes. But Leontins was gotten out of the way: Megaleas, and another with him, came. The King began to rate them for their diforder; and they, to give him froward answers; insomuch as they faid at length. That they would neuer give ouer, till they had rewarded Aratus with a mischiefe as he deferued. Hecreupon the King committed them to ward. Leontius hearing of this, comes boldly to the King, with his Targettiers at his heeles : and with a proud grace demanded, who it was that had dared to lay hands upon Megaleas, yea and to cast him into prison? Why, said the King, It was even I. This resolute anfwer, which Leontius had not expected, made him depart both fad and angrie; feeing himselfe out-frowned, and not knowing how to remedie the matter. Shortly after Megaleas was called forth to his answer, and was charged by Aratus with many great crimes. Among which were, The hinderance of the Kings victorie at Pales, and the Compact made with Apelles: matters no leffe touching Leontius, that flood by as a looker on, than Megaleas that was accused. In conclusion, the presumptions against him were so strong, and his answers thereto so weake; that he, and Crinon one of his fellowes, were condemned in twentie Talents: Crinon being remanded backe to prison; and Leontius becomming Bayle for Megaleas. This was done vpon the way home-ward, as the King was returning to Corenth.

Philip dispatched well a great deale of businesse this yeere. For as soone as he was at Corinth, he tooke in hand an Expedition against the Lacedemonions. These and the Eleans had done what harmethey could in Peloponnesus, whilest the King was 20 absent. The Acheans had opposed them as wel as they could; with ill successe: vet fo, as they hindered them from doing fuch harme as elfe they would have done. But when Philip came, hee ouer-ran the Countrie about Lacedamon : and was in a manner at the gates of Sparta, ere men could well believe that he was returned out of Etolia. He tooke not in this expedition any Cities, but made great wast in the fields: and haning beaten the enemie in some skirmishes, carried backe with him to Corinth a rich bootie of Cattell, flaues, and other Countrie-spoile. At Corinth hee found attending him, Embaffadors from the Rhodians & Chians: that requested him to fet Greece at quiet, by granting peace vnto the Actolians. They had gracious audience : and he willed them to deale first with the Actolians ; who, if they would make the same request, should not finde him vnreasonable. The Metolians had fped ill that yeere; neither faw they any likelie hopes for the yeeres following. The Armie that they had fent forth to wast The falle and Macedon, found fuch opposition on the way; that not daring to proceed, it returned home without bringing any thing to effect. In the meane feafon they had been greinoufly afflicted, as before is shewed, by Philip in the center of their owne Countrie. All Greece and Macedon was vp in armes against them, and their weake Allies the Eleans and Lacedamonians, Neither was it certaine, how long the one or other of these their Peloponnesian friends should be able to hold out; fince they were not strong enough to keepe the feild, but had alreadie suffered those miseries of war, which by a little continuance would make them glad, each, to feeke their owne peace, without regard of their Confederates. Wherefore the Ætolians readilie entertained this Negotiation of peace: and taking truce for thirtie dayes with the King, dealt with him by intercession of the fame Embaffadours, to entreat his prefence at a Diet of their Nation, that should bee held at Rhium; whither if he would vouchfafe to come, they promifed that hee fhould finde them conformable to any good reason.

Whilest these things were in hand; Leontius and Megaleus thought to have terrified the King, by raifing fedition against him in the Armie. But this device forted to no good effect. The fouldiours were easily and quickly incenfed against many of the Kings friends; who were faid to be the cause, why they were not rewarded 50 with fo much of the bootie, as they thought to belong of right vnto them . But their anger spent it selfe in a noise, and breaking open of dores; without further harmedone. This was enough to informe the king (who calille pacified his men with gentle words) that some about him were verie false. Yea the souldiours themfelues, repenting of their infolence, defired to have the Authors of the tumult foughtout, and punished according to their deserts. The King made shew as if hee had not cared to make such inquistion . But Leontius and Megaleas were fore afraid, left the matter would foone come out of it selfe to their extreme danger. Wherefore they fent vnto Apelles, the Headand Archetect of their treason; requesting him speedilie to repaire to Corinth, where he might stand betweene them and the kings displeasure. Apelles had not all this while beene wanting to the busineffe, undertaken by him and his treacherous companions. He had taken voon him. as a man that had the Kings heart in his owne hand : and thereby was he growne into such credit, that all the Kings Officers in Macedon and Theffalie addressed themfelues vnto him; and received from him their dispatch in everie busines. Likewise 10 the Greekes in all their flattering Decrees, tooke occasion to magnific the vertue of Apelles : making flight mention (onely for falbion fake ) of the king : who feemed no better than the Minister and Executioner of Apelles his will and pleasure. Such was the arrogancie of this great man, in fetting himfelfe out vnto the people : but in mannaging the kings affaires, he made it his especiall care, that monie, and all things needfull for the publicke service, should be wanting. Yea he enforced the king for verie neede, to sell his owne Plate and houshold vessels : thinking to resolue these and all other difficulties, by onely faying, Sir, beruled wholly by mee, and all shall be as rouwould with Hereto if the king would give affent; then had this Politician obtained his hearts defire. Now taking his journic from Chaleis in the Isle of Eubar, to 20 the Citic of Corinth where Philip then lay : he was fetcht in with great pompe and royaltic, by a great number of the Captaines and fouldiours; which Leontins and Megaleas drew forth to meete him on the way. So entering the Citie with a goodly traine; he went directly to the Court, and towards the Kings Chamber. But Philip was well aware of his pride; and had vehement suspition of his falshood. Wherfore one was fent to tell him, that he should waite awhile, or come another time; for the king was not now at leifure to be spoken with. It was a pretie thing, that such a check as this made all his attendants for lake him, as a man in difgrace; in fuch fort that going thence to his lodging, he had none to follow him faue his owne Pages. After this. the King youch afed him now and then some slender graces; but in consultations, 30 or other matters of privacie, he vsed him not at all. This taught Megalem to looke vnto himfelfe, and runne away betimes. Hereupon the King fent forth Taurion his Lieutenant of Peloponnel w, with all the Targettiers, as it were to doe some peece of feruice; but indeed of purpose to apprehend Leontius in the absence of his followers. Leontius being taken, dispatched away a messenger presently to his Targettiers, to fignifie what was befallen him : and they forthwith fent vnto the King in Lis behalfe. They made request, That if any other thing were objected against him, he might not be called forth to triall before their returne; as for the debt of Megaleas, if that were all the matter, they faid that they were readie to make a purse for his discharge. This affection of the fouldiours, made Philip more hastic than else 40

owne life; and flew himfelfe about the fame time. The £tolian:, as they had begun this warre upon hope of accomplishing what they lifted in the Nonnage of Philip: fo finding that the vigour of this yong Prince. tempered with the cold aduice of Aratus, wrought verie effectually toward their ouerthrow:

he would have beene, to take away the Traitors life. Neither was it long, ere letters of Megaleas were intercepted, which he wrote vnto the Atolians; vilifying the king with opprobrious words; and bidding them not to hearken after peace, but to hold out awhile, for that Philip was even readic to linke vnder the burden of his owne pouertie. By this the king vnderstood more perfectly the falshood, not one-ly of Megaleas, but of Apelles; whose cunning head had laboured all this while to keepe him so poore. Wherefore hee sent one to pursue Megaless, that was fled to Thebes. As for Apelles, he committed both him, his sonne, and another that was inward with him, to prison; wherein all of them shortly ended their lines. Megaleas alfo, neither daring to fland to triall, nor knowing whither to file, was wearie of his ouerthrow; they grew verie desirous to make an end of it. Neuerthelesse being a turbulent Nation, and readie to lay hold vpon all advantages : when they heard what was happened in the Court, the death of Apelles, Leonius, and Magaleus, together with some indignation thereupon conceiued by the Kings Targettiers, they began to hope anew, that these troubles would be long lasting, and thereupon brake the day appointed for the meeting at Rhium. Of this was Philip nothing foric. For being in good hope throughly to tame this viquiet Nation; He thought it much to concerne his owne honour, that all the blame of the beginning and continuing the warre should rest voon themselues. Wherefore he willed his Confederates, to lav a fideall thought of peace, and to prepare for war against the yeere following; wherin he hoped to bring it to an end. Then gratified he his Macedonian fouldiors, by yeelding to let them winter in their owne Countrie. In his returne homeward, he called into judgement one Ptolemie, a companion with Apelles and Leontius in their Treasons: who was therefore condemned by the Macedonians; and suffered death. These were the same Macedonians, that lately could not endure to heare of Leontius his imprisonment : yet now they thinke the man worthie to die, that was but his adherent. So vaine is the confidence, on which Rebels vse to build, in their fauour with the Multitude.

CHAP.4. S.2. of the Historie of the World.

During his abode in Macedon, Philip wan some bordering Townes; from which on the Dardanians, Etolians, and other his ill neighbours, were accustomed to make rodes into his kingdome when hee had thus prouided for fafetic of his owne; the Ætolians might well know what they were to expect. But there came againe Embassadours from the Rhodians and Chians, withothers from Ptolemic King of Agypt, and from the Citie of Byzantium, recontinuing the former follicitation about the Peace. This fashion had beene taken vp in matters of Greece, euer since the Kings that raigned after Alexander, had taken upon them to fet the whole Countrie at libertie: No sooner was any Prouince or Citie in danger to be oppressed, and subdued by force of war, but prefently there were found intercessours, who pittying the effusion of Greekish bloud, would importune the stronger to relinquish his aduan-30 tage. By doing fuch friendly offices in time of neede, the Princes and States abroad fought to binde vnto them those people; that were, howsoener weake in numbers; yet verie good fouldiours. But hereby it came to passe, that the more froward fort, especiallie the Atolians, whose whole Nation was addicted to falshood and robberie, durst enter boldly into quarrels with all their neighbours : being well affured, that if they had the worft, The love of Greece would be fufficient to redeeme their quiet. They had, fince the late Treatie of peac, done what harme they could in Peloponnesus: but being beaten by the Acheans, and standing in feare to be more foundlie beaten at home, they defired now, more earnefilie than before to make an end of the warre as soone as they might. Philip made such answer to the 40 Embassadours, as he had done the former yeere; That he gaue not occasion to the beginning of this warre, nor was at the present either afraid to continue it, or vinwilling to end it : but that the Etolians, if they had a defire to live in rest, must first be dealt withall, to lignific plainly their determination, whereto himselfe would returne fuch answer as he should thinke fit.

Philip had at this time no great liking vnto the Peace, being a yong Prince, and in hope to increase the honour which he dailie got by the warre. But it happened in the middest of this Negotiation, that he was advertised by letters out of Macedon. what a notable victorie Hannibal had obtained against the Romans in the battaile at Thrasymene. These letters he communicated vnto Demetrius Pharius : who greatly so encouraged him to take part with Hannibal: and not to fit fill, as an idle beholder of the Italian warre. Hereby be grew more inclinable than before vnto Peace with the Etolians: which was concluded fortly in a meeting at Naupactus. There did Agelaus an Ætolium make a great Oration: telling, how happie it was for the Greekes. that they might at their owne pleasure dispute about finishing war between them-felues: without being molefled by the Barbarians. For when once either the Romans, or the Carthaginians, had subdued one the other; it was not to be doubted. that they would forthwith looke Eaftward, and feeke by all meanes to fet footing in Greece. For this cause he said it were good, that their Countrie should be at peace within it felfe : and that Philip, if he were defirous of war, should lay hold on the opportunitie, now fitly feruing, to enlarge his dominion, by winning fomewhat in Italie. Such advice could the Ætolians then give, when they flood in feare of danger threatning them at hand : but being soone after wearie of rest, as accustomed to enrich themselues by pillage, they were so farre from observing and following their ownegood counsel, that they invited the Romans into Greece, whereby they brought 10 themselues and the whole Countrie, (but themselues before any other part of the Countrie) vnder seruitude of strangers. The Condition of this Peace was simple, That every one should keepe what they held at the present, without making restitution, or any amends for damages paft.

ð. III.

PHILIP, at the persuasion of DEMETRIVS PHARIVS, enters into League with HANNIBAL, against the Romans. The Tenour of the League betweene HANNIBAL, and PHILLS.

His being agreed vpon: the Greekes betooke themselues to quiet courfes of life; and Philip, to prepare for the bufineffe of Italie, about which hee confulted with Demetrius Pharius. And thus passed the time away, till the great battaile of Canne: after which he joyned in League with Hannibal, as hath beene shewed before. Demetrius Pha-rius bore great malice vnto the Romans; and knew no other way to be auenged vpon them, or to recouer his owne loft Kingdome, than by procuring the Macedonian, 30 that was in a manner wholly guided by his counfaile, to take part with their enemies. It had otherwise been farre more expedient for Philip, to have supported the weaker of these two great Cities against the more mightie. For by so doing, hee should perhaps have brought them to peace upon some equal termes; and thereby, as did Hiero a farre weaker Prince, have both secured his owne Estate, and caufed each of them to be defirous of cheife place in his freindship. The issue of the counfaile which he followed, will appeare soone after this. His first quarrell withthe Romans; the trouble which they and the Atolians did put him to in Greece; and the Peace which they made with him for a time, vpon Conditions that might eafily be broken : have beene related in another place as belonging vnto the fecond 40 Punick warre. Wherefore I will onely here fet downe the tenour of the League betweene Him and Carthage: which may feeme not vnworthie to be read, if onely in regard of the forme it selfe then vsed; though it had beene ouer-long to have been inserted into a more busic peece.

δ. IIII.

How PHILIP reelded to his naturall vices, being therein loothed by DEMETRIVS P. HARIVS. His desire to tyrannize upon the free States his Affociates : With the troubles, into which he thereby fell, whileft he bore a part in the Second Punicke warre. He poisoneth ARATVS: and growes hatefull to the Itherto Philip had carried himfelfe as a vertuous Prince. And though with more commendation of his wisdome, he might have offered his freindship to the Romans, that were like to be oppressed, than to the Carthaginians who had the better hand : yet this his medling in the Punicke warre, proceeded from a royall greatnesse of minde, with a defire to fecure and increase his owne chate, adding therewithall reputation to his Countrie. But in this businesse he was guided (as hath beene said) by Dememetrius Pharius: who, looking throughly into his nature, did accommodate him seife to his delires: and thereby thortly gouerned him, euen as he lifted. For the vertues of Philip were not indeed such as they seemed. He was lust full, bloudie, and tyrannicall: desirous of power to doe what he listed, and not otherwise listing to doe what hee ought, than so farre forth, as by making a faire shew he might breede in 30 men such a good opinion of him, as should helpe to serue his turne in all that hee tooke in hand. Before he should busic himselfe in Italie, bee thought it requisite in good pollicie, to bring the Greekes that were his Affociates under a more absolute forme of subjection. Heercunto Apelles had aduised him before : and hee had liked reasonably well of the course. But Apelles was a boisterous Counsellor, and one that referring all to his owne glory, thought himselfe deeply wronged if hee might not wholy have his owne way, but were driven to await the Kings opportunitie at better times. Demetrius Pharius could well be contented to observe the Kings humours : and guided, like a Coach-man with the reines in his hand, those affections which himselfe did onely seeme to follow. Therefore hee grew daily more and 40 more in credit : fo as, without any manner of contention , hee supplanted Aratus: which the violence of Apelles could never doe.

There arose about these times a verie hote Faction among the Messenians, betweene the Nobilitie and Commons: their vehement thoughts being rather diverted (as happens often after a forrein war) vnto domesticall obiects: than allaved and reduced vnto a more quiet temper. In processe of no long time, the contention among them grew so violent, that Philip was entreated to compound the differences. Hee was glad of this : resoluing so to end the matter, that they should not henceforth strine any more about their Gouernment: for that he would assume it wholly to himselfe. At his comming thither, hee found Aratus busie among them to make all friends, after a better manner than agreed with his owne secret purpose.

Wherfore he consulted not with this reuerend old man: but talked in private with fuch of the Messenians as repaired vnto him. He asked the Gouernours, what they meant to fland thus disputing : and whether they had not Lawes, to bridle the infolence of the vnruly Rabble: Contrariwife, in talking with the heades of the po-Ecccc 2 pular pular Faction, He faid it was strange, that they being so many, would suffer themfelues to be oppressed by a few; as if they had not hands to defend themselues from Tyrants. Thus whilelt each of them prefumed on the Kings affiftance; they thought it best to goe roundly to worke, ere he were gone that should countenance their doings. The Gouernours therefore would have apprehended fome leditious Oratours, that were, they faid, the stirrers up of the multitude unto sedition. Vpon this occasion the People tooke Armes: and running vpon the Nobilitie and Magifirates, killed of them in a rage almost two hundred. Philip thought, it seemes, that it would be casie to worrie the sheep, when the Dogges their guardians were slaine. But his falshood and double dealing was immediatly found out. Neyther did the 10 vonger Aratus forbeare, to tell him of it in publick, with verie bitter and difgraceful words. The King was angrie at this. But having alreadie done more than was commendable, or excusable: and yet further intending to take other thinges in hand wherein hee should need the helpe and countenance of his best friends; Hee was content to smother his displeasure, and make as faire weather as he could. He led old Aratus afide by the hand; and went up into the Castle of Ithome, that was ouer Mellene. There he pretended to doe facrifice: and facrifice he did. But it was his purpose to keepe the place to his owne vse; for that it was of notable strength. and would ferue to command the further parts of Pelaponnesius, as the Citadell of Corinth, whith hee had alreadie, commaunded the entrance into that Countrie. 20 Whilest hee was therefore sacrificing, and had the entrailes of the beast deliuered into his hands, as was the manner; Hee shewed them to Aratus, and gently asked him, whether the tokens that he faw therein did fignifie, That being now in poffeffion of this place, hee should quietly goe out of it, or rather keepe it to himselfe. He thought perhaps, that the old man would have foothed him a little; were it onely for defire to make amends, for the angrie words newly spoken by his sonne. But as Aratus flood doubtfull what to answere, Demetrius Pharius gaue this verdict: If thou bee a South fayer, thou maift goe thy wayes, and let slippe this good advantage; if thou to the case a sensing consuming section ways, some configuration by the case of the case o Yet would Philip needes heare the opinion of Aratus: who told him plainly, That it were well done to keep the place, if it might be kept without breach of his faith vnto the Messenians: But if, by seizing vpon Ithome, Hee must loose all the other Castels that hee held, and especially the strongest Castle of all that was left vnto him by Antigonus, which was his credit; then were it farre better to depart with his fouldiers, and keepe men in dutie, as hee had done hitherto, by their owne good wils, than by fortifying any strong places against them, to make them of his friends become his Enemies.

To this good aduice Philip yelded at the present: but not without some dislike. thenceforth growing betweene Him and the Arati; whom hee thought more froward than beformed them, in contradicting his will. Neyther was the old man defirous at all, to deale any longer in the Kings affaires, or be inward with him. For as he plainly discourred his Tyrannous purposes: so likewise he perceived, that in resorting to his house, He had beene dishonest with his sonnes wife. Hee therefore staid at home: where at good leifure he might repent, that in despight of Cleomenes, his owne Countriman, and a temperate Prince, hee had brought the Macedonians

Philip made a Voyage out of Peloponnessu into Epirus, wherein Aratus refused to beare him companie. In this journie He found by experience what Aratus had lately told him; That vnhonest counsailes are not so profitable in deed, as in appearance. The Epirots were his followers and dependants; and so they purposed to continue. But He would needes have them foto remaine, whether they purposed it or not. Wherefore to make them the more obnoxious vnto his will, Hee feized vpon their Towne of Orienm and laid fiege to Apollonia; having no good colour of these doings: but thinking himselfe strong enough to doe what hee listed, and not feeing whence they should procure friends to helpe them. Thus in stead of feeling the countrie, as his intended Voyage into Italie required: He kindled a fire in it which he could ne uer quench; vntill it had laid hold on his owne Palace. Whileft he was thus labouring to bind the hands that should have fought for him in Italie: M. Valeriss the Roman came into those parts; who not onely maintained the Epirots against him, but procured the Ætolians to breake the Peace, which they had lately made

Thus began that warre; the occurrents whereof wee have related before, in place whereto it belonged. In mannaging whereof though Philip did the offices of agood Captaine: yet when leifure ferued, Hee made it apparant that hee was a vicious King. Hee had not quite left his former defire, of oppressing the libertie of the Messeniaus; but made another journie into their Countrie, with hope to deceive them, as before. They understood him better now ahan before; and therefore were not hastieto trust him too farre. When he saw that his cunning would not ferue, He went to worke by force; and calling them his Enemies, inuaded them with open warre. But in that warre hee could doe little good; perhaps, because none of his Confederates were desirous to helpe him in such an enterprise. In this attempt vpon Messenehec lost Demetrica Pharius; that was his Counfailor, and Flatterer, not his peruerter; as appeares by his growing daily more naught in following times. The worse that he sped, the more angrie he wexed against those, that seemed not to fauour his injurious doings. Wherefore by the Ministerie of Taurion, his Leintenant, he poyfoned old Aratus; and shortly after that, hee povfoned also the yonger Aratus: hoping that these thinges would never have beene knowne, because they were done secretly, and the poysons themselues were more fure, than manifest in operation. The Sieyonians, and all the people of Achaia, decreed vnto Aratus more than humane honours, as Sacrifices, Hymmes, and Proceffions, to be celebrated eneric yeare twice, with a Priest ordained vnto him for that purpose; as was accustomed vnto the Heroes, or men, whom they thought to bee 30 translated into the number of the Gods. Hereunto they are faid to have beene encouraged by an Oracle of Apollo: which is like enough to have beene true; fince the helpe of the Deuill is neuer failing to the increase of Idolatrie.

The louing memorie of Aratus their Patron, and fingular Benefactor, could not but worke in the Achesns a maruailous dislike, of that wicked King which had made him thus away. He shall therefore heare of this hereafter, when they better dare to take counfaile for themselues. At the present, the murder was not generally knowne or beleiued:neither were they in case to subsist, without his help that had committed it. The Ætolians were a most outragious people, great darers, and shamelesse robbers. With these the Romans had madea League: whereof the Condtions were soone 40 divulged, especially that maine point, concerning the division of the purchase which they should make; namely, That the Atolians should have the countrie and townes: but the Romans the spoile, and carrie away the people to fell for slaves. The Acheans, who in times of greater quiet could not endure to make streight alliance with the Ætolians, as knowing their vnciuill disposition; were much the more auerse from them, when they perceived how they had called in the Barbarians (for fuch did the Greekes account all other Nations except their owne) to make hauock of the Countrie. The same consideration moued also the Lacedemonians, to stand off awhile, before they would declare themselues for the Atolians; whose friendship they had embraced in the late warre. The industrie therefore of Philip, and the great care 50 which he seemed to take of the Achaans his Confederates, sufficed to retaine them: especially at such time, as their owne necessitie was thereto concurrent. More particularly he obliged vnto himselfe the Dymans, by an inestimable benefit : recougring their Towne, after it had been etaken by the Romans and Ætolians, and redeeming their people wherefoeuer they might bee found, that had beene carried away Captine,

Captine, and fold abroad for flaues. Thus might he have blotted out the memorie of offences past; if the malignitie of his naturall condition had not otherwhiles broken out, and given men to vnderstand; that it was the Time, and not his Vertue, which caused him to make such a shew of goodnesse. Among other foule acts. whereof he was not alhamed; He tooke Polycratia the wife of the yonger Aratus, and carried her into Macedon: little regarding how this might ferue to confirme in the people their opinion, that he was guiltie of the old mans death. But of fuch faults he shall be told, when the Romans make warre upon him the second time: for of that which happened in this their first Inuasion, I holde it superfluous to make repetition.

Of PHILOPOEMEN Generall of the Achaens: and MACHANIDAS. Tyrant of Lacedamon. Abattaile betweene them, wheresn MACHANIDAS is flaine.

T happens often, that the decease of one eminent man discovers the vertue of another. In the place of Aratus there flood vp Philogamen : 20 whose notable valour, and great skill in Armes, made the Nation of the Acheans redoubtable among all the Greekes, and careleffe of fuch the Athans redoubtable among an the Oreset, and Chicago of their neighbours. This is that Philopamen: who being then a yong man, and having no command; did especiall service to Antigonus at the battaile of Sellasia against Cleamenes. Thence-forward untill now he had spent the most part of his time in the Ile of Crete: the Inhabitants whereof being a valiant people, and feldome or neuer at peace betweene themselues; Hee bettered among them his knowledge, and practise in the Art of warre At his returne home, Hee had charge of the Horse: wherein he carried himselfe so strictly, trauailing with all the Cities of the Confede- 30 racie to have his followers well mounted, and armed at all peeces: as also he so diligently trained them vp in all exercise of service, that hee made the Acheans verie strong in that part of their forces. Being after chosen Prætor or Generall of the Nation, Hee had no leffe care to reforme their militarie discipline throughout, whereby his Countrie might be strong enough to defend it selfe, and not any longer (as in former times) need to depend vpon the helpe of others. Hee perswaded the Acheans to cut off their vaine expence of brauerie, in apparrell, housholdstuffe, and curious fare, and to bestow that cost vpon their Armes, wherein by how much they were the more gallant, by so much were they like to proue the better Souldiors; and suteable in behauiour, vnto the pride of their furniture. They had serued hi- 40 therto with little light Bucklers, and flender Darts, to cast afarre off: that were vsefull in skirmilhing at some distance, or for Surprises, or sudden and hastie Expeditions; whereto Aratus had beene most accustomed. But when they came to handie strokes, they were good for nothing: so as they were wholly driven to relie vpon the courage of their Mercinaries. Philopamen altered this : causing them to arme themfelues more weightily, to vie a larger kind of sheild, with good swords, and strong pikes, fit for service at hand. He taught them also to fight in close order; and altered the forme of their embattailing: not making the Files fo deepe as had beene accustomed, but extending the Front, that he might vse the service of many hands.

Eight Moneths were spent of that yeere, in which hee first was Prætor of the 50 Achaans; when Machanidas the Tyrant of Lacedamon caused him to make triall, how his fouldiers had profited by his discipline. This Machanidas was the succesfor vnto Lycurgus; a man more violent than his fore-goer. He kept in pay a strong Armie of Mercinaries : and he kept them not onely to fight for Sparta; but to hold the Citie in obedience to himselfe perforce. Wherefore it behoued him not to take part with the Acheans, that were fauourers of libertie ; but to ftrengthen himselfe by freindship of the Atolians: who, in making Alliances, tooke no further notice of Vice or Vertue, than as it had reference to their owne profit. The people also of Lacedamon, through their inueterate hatred vnto the Argines, Acheans, and Macedonians ; were in like fort (all or most of them) inclinable to the Atolian Faction. Verie vnwisely. For in seeking to take reuenge vpon those, that had lately hindered them from getting the Lordship of Peloponnesus; they hindred themselves thereby from recouering the Mastrie of their owne Citie. This affection of the Spartans, to-10 gether with the regard of his owne securitie, and no small hope of good that would follow, suffered not Machanidas to be idle; but made him alwaies readie to fall vpon his neighbours backes, and take of theirs what he could, whilest they were enforced, by greater necessirie, to turne face another way. Thus had hee often done, especially in the absence of Philip: whose sudden comming into those parts, or some other opposition made against him, had vsually made him faile of his attempts. At the present He was stronger in men, than were the Achaans; and thought his owne men better fouldiours than were theirs.

Whilest Philip therefore was busied else-where, hee entred the Countrie of the Mantineans: being not without hope to doe as Cleomenes had done before him : yea 20 and perhaps to get the * Lordhip of Pelaponnessus, as having stronger freindes, * Except. 2 and weaker opposition, than Cleomenes had found. But Philopoemen was readie to Polyb. 1.11. entertaine him at Mantinea; where was fought betweene them a great battaile, Plat. in vita The Tyrant had brought into the fielde vpon Cartes a great many of Engines; wherewith to beate upon the Squadrons of his Enemies, and put them in disorder. To prevent this danger, Philopamen sent forth his light armature a good way before him; so as Machanidas was faine to doe the like. To second these, from the one and the other side came in continual supplie; till at length all the Mercinaries, both of the Acheans and of Machanidas, were drawne vp to the fight: being so far advanced, each before their owne Phalanx, that it could no 30 otherwise be discerned which pressed forward, or which recoyled, than by riling of the dust. Thus were Machanidas his Engines made vnseruiceable, by the interpolition of his owne men, in fuch manner as the Canon is hindered from doing execution, in most of the battailes fought in these our times. The Mercinaries of the Tyrant prevailed at length: not onely by their advantage of number, but (as Poly-Polybibid. bius well observeth) by surmounting their opposites in degree of courage; wherein viually the hired fouldiers of Tyrants exceed those that are waged by free States. For as it is true, that a free people are much more valiant, than they which live oppressed by Tyrannie, since the one, by doing their best in fight, have hope to acquire somewhat beneficiall to themselves, whereas the other doe fight (as it were)

40 to affure their owne seruitude: so the Mercinaries of a Tyrant, being made partakers with him in the fruites of his prosperitie, have good cause to maintaine his quarrell as their owne; whereas they that ferue vnder a free State, have no other motiue to doe manfully, than their bare stipend. Further than this, When a free State hath gotten the Victorie: many Companies (if not all) of forrein Auxiliaries are presently cast; and therefore such good fellowes, will not take much paines to bring the warre to an end. But the victorie of a Tyrant, makes him fland in neede of more such helpers: because that after it he doth wrong to more, as having more fubjects; and therefore stands in feare of more, that should seeke to take reuenge vpon him. The stipendiaries therefore of the Achaans, being forced to give ground, 50 were viged to violently in their retrait by those of Machanidas, that shortly they be-tooke themselues to flight; and could not be staid by any perswasions of Philopamen, but ranne away quite beyond the battaile of the Acheans. This disafter had beene sufficient to take from Philopamenthe honour of the day; had he not wisely observed the demeanour of Machanidas, and found in him that errour which might restore the victorie. The Tyrant with his Mercinaries gave chace vnto those that fled : leaving behind him in good order of battaile his Laced emonians; whom hee thought sufficient to deale with the Acheans, that were alreadie disheartned by the flight of their companions. But when this his rafhnesse had carried him out of fight; Philopamen advanced towards the Lacedamonians that flood before him. There lay between them athwart the Countrie a long ditch, without water at that time: and therefore passable (as it seemed) without much difficultie, especially for Foot. The Lacedamonians adventured over it, as thinking themselves better souldiers than the Acheans; who had in a manner alreadie loft the day. But hereby they greatly difordered their owne Battaile; and had no fooner the foremost of them reconcred the further banke, than they were floutly charged by the Achaens, who draue them headlong into the ditch againe. Their first rankes being broken, all the reft began to fhrinke; fo as Philopamen getting over the ditch, eafily chaced them out of the Field. Philopamen knew better how to vie his advantage, than Machanidas had done. He fuffered not all his Armie to difband and follow the chace : but retained with him a fufficient ftrength, for the custodie of a bridge that was over the ditch, by which he knew that the Tyrant must come backe. The Tyrant with his Mercinaries returning from the chace, looked verie heavily when he faw what was fallen out. Yet with a luftie Troupe of Horse about him Hee made towardes the bridge: hoping to find the Acheans in diforder; and to fet you their backes, as they 20 were careleffely pursuing their Victorie. But when he and his Companie faw Philopamen readic to make good the bridge against them; then beganne eueric one to looke, which way he might shift for himselse. The Tyrant, with no more than two in his companie, rode along the ditch fide; and fearched for an easie passage ouer. He was eafily discourred by his purple Cassocke, and the costly trappings of his Horfe. Philopamen therefore leaving the charge of the bridge vnto another, coasted him all the way as he rode; and falling upon him at length in the ditch it selfe, as he was getting ouer it, flew him there with his owne hand. There died in this Battaile on the Lacedamonians side about foure thousand: and more than foure thousand were taken Prisoners. Of the Achean Mercinaries, probable it is that the losse was 20 not greatly cared for; fince that War was at an end, and for their monie they might hire more when they should have need.

PHILIP having peace with Rome, and with all Greece, prepares against Alia. Of the Kings of Pergamus, Cappadocia, Pontus, Paphlagona, Bithynia; and their Linages. Of the Y this victorie the Acheans learned to thinke well of themselues. Nevther needed they indeed after awhile (fuch was their discipline, and continual exercise) to account themselves in matter of warre inseriour to any, that should have brought against them no great oddes of number. As for the Macedonian, Hee made no great vie of them : But when he had once concluded peace with the Romans and Atolians, He studied how to enlarge his Dominion Eastward; fince the fortune of his friends the Carthaginians declined in the West. He tooke in hand many matters together, or verie nearely together, and some of them not honest: wherein if the Acheans would have done him feruice; they must, by helping him to oppresse others that neuer had wronged him, have taught him the way how to deale with themselves. He greatly hated 41talus King of Pergamus, who had joyned with the Romans and Etolians in warre against him.

CHAP.4.S.6. of the Historie of the World.

This Attalus, though a King, was scarce yet a Noble man, otherwise than as he was ennobled by his owne, and by his Fathers vertue. His fortune beganne in Phileterus his Vncle: who being guelded, by reason of a mishap which he had when he was a child, grew afterwards thereby to be the more effecmed: as great men in those times reposed much confidence in Eunuches, whose affections could not be obliged vnto wines or children. He was entertained into the familie of Docimus, a Captaine following Antigonus the first; and after the death of Antigonus, he accompanied his Master, that betooke himselfe to Lysimachus King of Thrace, Lysimachus had good opinion of him; and put him in trust with his monie and accompts. But when at length he flood in feare of this King, that grew a bloudie Tyrant : Hee fled into Afia, where he feized upon the Towne of Pergamus, and nine thousand talents belonging to Lysimachus. The towne and monie, together with his owne seruice, He offered vnto Seleneus the first, that then was readie to give Lysimachus battela His offer was kindly accepted, but never performed, for that Seleucus having flaine Lysimachus, died shortly after himselfe, before he made vse of Phileterus or his monic. So this Eunuch still retained Pergamus with the Countrie about it; and reigned therein twentie yeeres as an absolute King. Hee had two brethren: of which the elder is faid to have been a poore Carter; and the yonger perhaps was not much better ; before such time as they were raised by the fortune of this Eunuch. Phileta-20 rus left his Kingdome to the elder of these, or to the sonne of the elder called Eumenes. This Eumenes enlarged his kingdome, making his advantage of the diffention. betweene Seleucus Callinicus and Antiochus Hierax, the fonnes of the fecond Antiochus. He fought a battaile with Hierax, neere vnto Sardes; and wan the victorie. At which time, to animate his men against the Gaules that served under his Enemie, he ysed a pretic denice. He wrote the word*VICTORIE vpon the hand of his Sooth fayer, in *Interiore fuch colours as would eafily come off: and when the hoteliner of the beaft that was small a case facrificed, had cleanly taken the print of the letters, He published this vnto his Armic as a Miracle, plainely fore-shewing that the gods would be affiftant in that

After this victorie, he grew a dreadfull enemie to Seleucus: who never durft attempt to recouer from him, by warre, the Territorie that hee had gotten and held. Finally when he had reigned two and twentie yeeres, hee died by a furfet of ouermuch drinke; and left his Kingdome to Attalus, of whom wee now entreat, that was sonne vnto Attalus the yongest brother of Philetarus. Attalus was an undertaking Prince, verie bountifull, and no lesse valiant. By his owne proper forces He reflored his friend Ariarathes the Cappadocian into his Kingdome, whence he had been expelled. He was greiuously molested by Acheus: who setting up himselfe, as King against Antiochus the great, reigned in the leffer Afia. He was besieged in his owne Citic of Pergamus: but by helpe of the Tectofaga, a Nation of the Gaules, whom hee called ouer out of Thrace, He reconcred all that he had loft. When thefe Gaules had once gotten footing in Asia, they never wanted employment: but were either entertained by some of the Princes reigning in those quarters; or interposed themsclues, without inuitation, and found themselves worke in quarrels of their owne making. They caused Prusias King of Bithynia to cease from his warre against Brzantium. Whereunto when he had condescended; they neverthelesse within awhile after inuaded his Kingdome. Hee obtained against them a great victorie; and vsed it with great crueltie, sparing neither age nor sexe. But the swarme of them increating; they occupied the R egion about Hellefont: where, in feating themselves. they were much beholding vnto Attalus. Neuertheleffe, prefuming afterwards 50 vpon their frength; they forced their neighbour Princes and Cities to pay them tribute. In the sharpe exaction whereof, they had no more respect vnto Attalus than to any that had worse descrued of them. By this they compelled him to fight against them: and Hee being victorious, compelled them to containe themselves within the bounds of that Province, which tooke name from them in time follow-

The Kings reigning in those parts, were the posteritie of such, as had saued themfelues and their Prouinces, in the flothful reigne of the Persians, or in the bulie times of Alexander, and his Macedonian followers. The Cappadocians were vericancient. For the first of their line had married with Atossa, fifter vnto the great King Cyrus. Their Countrie was taken from them by Perdiceas, as is shewed before. But the son of that King, whom Perdice as crucified, espying his time while the Macedonians were at civill warres among themselves; recovered his dominion, and passed it over to his of-spring. The Kings of Pontus had also their beginning from the Persian 10 Empire; and are faid to have iffued from the royall house of Achamenes The Paphlagonians derived themselves from Pylamenes, a King that affilted Priamus at the warre of Trey. These, applying themselues vnto the times, were alwaies conformable vnto the strongest. The Ancestors of Prustas had begun to reigne in Bithynia. fome few generations before that of the great Alexander. They lay fomewhat out of the Mscedonians way : by whom therfore, having other employment, they were the leffe molefled. Calantus, one of Alexanders Captaines, made an Expedition into their Countrie; where hee was vanquished. They had afterwards to doc with a Licutenant of Antigonus, that made them somewhat more humble. And thus they shuffled, as did the rest, vntill the reigne of Prusses, whom wee have alreadie some- 20 times mentioned.

ð. VII.

The Towne of Cios taken by PHILIP, at theinstance of PRVSIAS King of Bythynia, and cruelly destroyed. By this and like actions, PHILIP growes hatefull to many of the Greekes: and is warred upon by ATTALVS King of Pergamus, and by the Rhodians.

R v s 1 A s as a neighbour King, had many quarrels with Attalus; whose greatnesse he suspected. He therefore strengthned himselfe, by taking to wife the daughter of Philip; as Attalus, on the contrarie fide, entred into a strict Confederacie with the Ætolians, Rhodians, and other of the Greekes. But when Philip had ended his Ætolian warre, and was deuising with Antiochus about sharing betweene them two the Kingdome of Egypt, wherein Ptolomie Philopater a friend vnto them both was newly dead, and had left his sonne Ptol. Epiphanes a yong child his heire; the Bithynian entreated this his Father-in-law to come ouer into Asia, there to winne the Towns of the Ciani, and beflowit vpon him. Prufas had no right vnto the Towne, nor just matter of quarrell against it : but it was fitly feated for him; and therewithall rich. Philip came; as one that could not well denie to helpe his Sonne-in-law. But hereby hee mightily offended no small part of Greece. Embassadours came to him whilest heelay at the feige, from the Rhodians, and diversother States: entreating him to forfake the Enterprise. He gaue dilatoric, but otherwise gentle answeres: making shew as if he would condiffee d to their request; when he intended nothing leffe. At length hee got the Towne: where, cuen in presence of the Embassadours, of whose sollicitation he had semmed so regardfull, He omitted no part of crueltie. Hereby hee rendred himfelfe odious to his neighbours, as a perfidious and cruell Prince. Especially his Fact was detected of the Rhodians: who had made vehement intercession for the poore Ciani; and were aduertifed by Embassadours of purpose sent vnto them from Philip, That, howfocuer it were in his power to winne the Towne as foone as he lifted: yet in regard of his love to the Rhodians, Hee was contented to gurit ouer. And by this his clemencie the Embassadours said, that he would manifest vnto the World, what slanderous tongues they were; which noysed abroad fuch reports, as went of his fallhood and oppressions. Whilest the Embassadours were declaiming at Rhodes in the Theater to this effect; there came fome that made a true relation of what had hapned: shewing that Philip had sacked and destroyed the Towns of Cios, and, after a cruell flaughter of the Inhabitants, had made flaues of all that escaped the sword. If the Rhodians tooke this in great despight, no lesse were the Atolians inflamed against him : fince they had fent a Captaine to take charge of the Towne; being warned before by his doings at Lysimachia and Chalcedon (which he had withdrawne from their Confederacie to his owne) what little trust was to be reposed in the faith of this King. But most of all others was Attalus moued, with confideration of the Macedonians violent ambition, and of his owne cflate. He had much to loofe; and was not without hope of getting much, if he could make a strong Partie in Greece. He had alreadie, as a new King, followed the example of Alexanders Captaines, in purchasing with much liberalitie the louc of the Athenians; which were notable Trumpetters of other mens vertue, having loft their owne. On the freindship of the Etolians he had cause to presume; having bound them vnto him by good offices, many and great, in their late warre with Philip. The Rhodians that were mightie at Sea, and held verie good intelligence with the Agyptians, Syrians, and many other Princes and States, Hee casily drew into a streight Alliance with him; by their hatred newly conceiued against Philip.

Vpon confidence in these his friends, but most of all in the readic affishance of the Rhodians, Attalus prepared to deale with the Macedonian by open warre. It had beene vnfeafonable to procrastinate, and expect whereto the doings of the Enemie tended; fince his defire to fasten vpon Asia was manifest, and his fallhood no leffe manifest, than was fuch his desire. They met with him shortly not farre from Chies, and fought with him a battaile at Sea: wherein though Attalus was driven to runne his owne shippe on ground, hardly escaping to land: though the Admiral of the Rhodians tooke his deaths wound : and though Philip after the battaile tooke harbour vnder a Promontorie, by which they had fought, fo 30 that he had the gathering of the Wracks vpon the shore : Yet for a smuch as He had fuffered farre greater loffe of ships and men, than had the Enemie : and since Hee durst not in few dayes after put forth to Sea, when Attalus and the Rhodians came to braue him in his Port; the honour of the victoric was adjudged to his Enemies. This notwithstanding, Philip afterwardes besieged and wanne some Townes in Caria: whether onely in a brauerie, and to despight his opposites; or whether vpon any hopefull delire of conquest; it is vncertaine. The stratageme, by which hee wonne Prinassiu, is worthie of noting. Hee attempted it by a Myne : and finding the Earth fo stonie, that it relisted his worke, Hee neuerthelesse commaunded the Pyonersto make a noyfe vnder ground; and fecretly in the night-time Hee rayfed great Mounts about the entrance of the Myne, to breed an opinion in the befeiged, that the work went meruailously forward. At length he sent word to the Townesmen, that by his vnder-myning, two acres of their wall flood onely vpon woodden props: to which if he gaue fire, and entred by a breach, they should expect no mercie. The Prinassans little thought, that hee had fetcht all his earth and rubbish by night a great way off, to raife up those heapes which they faw; but rather that all had beene extracted out of the Myne. Wherefore they suffered themselues to be outfaced; and gaue up the Towne as loft, which the Enemie had no hope to winne by force. But Philip could not state to settle himselfe in those parts. Attalus and the Rho-50 dians were too ftrong for him at Sea, and compelled him to make hast back into Macedon; whither they followed him all the way in manner of pursuit.

δ. VIII.

The Romans, after their Carthaginian warre, feeke matter of quarrellagainst PHILIP. The Athenians. upon flight cause, proclaime warre against PHILIP; moved thereto by ATTALYS; whom they flatter. PHILIP winnes divers Townes: and makes peremptorie answere to the Roman Embassadour. The furious refolution of the

Hele Alatique matters, which no way concerned the Romans, yet ferued well to make a novie in Rome; and fill the peoples heads, if nor with a defire of making warre in Macedon, at least with a conceint that it were expedient so to doe. The Roman Senate was perfectly informed of the state of those Easterne Countries; and knew, that there was none other Nation than the Greekes, which lay betweene them and the Lordship of Asa. These Greekes were factious, and seldome or neuer at peace. As for the Macedonian, though length of time, and continuall dealings in Greece euer fince the Reignes of Philip and Alexander, had left no difference betweene him and the Naturals : yet most of them abhorred his Dominion, because Hee was original- 20 ly for footh a Barbarian: many of them hated him vpon ancient quarrels: and they that had beene most beholding vnto him, were neuerthelesse wearie of him, by reafon of his personall faults. All this gaue hope, that the affaires of Greece would not long detaine the Roman Armies: especially since the divisions of the Countrie were fuch, that euerie pettie Estate was apt to take counsaile apart for it selfe; without much regarding the generalitie. But the poore Commonaltic of Rome, had no great affection to fuch a chargeable enterprife. They were alreadie quite exhausted, by that grieuous warre with Hannibal: wherein they had given by Loane to the Republike all their monie:neyther had they as yet receiued, neyther did they receiue vntill fifteene or fixteene yeares after this, their whole fumme backe againe. That part of paiment also which was alreadic made, being not in present monie, but much of it in Land : it behoued them to rest awhile; and bestow the more diligence in tilling their grounds, by how much they were the leffe able to bestow cost. Wherefore they tooke no pleasure to heare, that Attalus and the Rhodians had sent Embassadours to follicite them against Philip, with report of his bold attempts in Alia; or that M. Aurelius, their Agent in Greece, had fent letters of the same tenour to the Senate. and magnified his intelligence, by fetting out the preparations of this dangerous enemie, that follicited not onely the Townes vpon the Continent, but all the Ilands in those Seas, visiting them in person, or sending Embassadours, as one that meant thortly to hold warre with the Romans upon their owne ground. Philip had indeed 40 no fuch intent : neither was he much too firong, either of himfelfe, or by his alliance in Greece, to be refifted by Attalus and the Rhodians, especially with the helpe of the Ætolians their good friends, and (in a manner) his owne professed enemies. But such things must be published abroad, if onely to predispose men vnto the warre, and giue it the more honest colour.

Philip was a man of ill condition; and therefore could not thrive by intermedling in the affaires of those, that were more mightie than himselfe. Hee was too vnskilfull, or otherwise too vnapt, to retaine his old friends: yet would he needes bee seeking new enemics. And he found them fuch, as he deferued to have them: for hee offered his helpe to their destruction, when they were in miserie, and had done 50 him no harme. It behoued him therefore, either to have strained his forces to the vemost in making warre vpon them; or, in delisting from that injurious course, to have made amends for the wrongs past, by doing friendly offices of his owne accord. But He, having broken that League of peace which is of all other the most natural, binding all men to offer no violence willingly, valefle they think themselves iultly prouoked; was afterwards too fondly perfwaded, that he might wel be fecureof the Romans, because of the written Coucnants of peace between him & them. There is not any forme of oath, whereby fuch articles of peace can bee held inuiolable, faue onely by the water of Styx, that is, by Necessitie: which whilest it bindes one partie, or *SirFi.Bacon both vito performance, making it apparent that her fall be a loofer who flars from the Conditions, it may follong (and follong onely) bee prefumed, that there shall be no breach. Till Hannibal was vanquished, the Romans neuer hearkned after Philip: for necessitie made them let him alone. But when once they had peace with Carthage, then was this River of Styx dried vp: and then could they sweare, 15 * Mercurie did in the Comedie, by their owne selves, even by their good swords, * Plant. Ans. that they had good reason to make warre vpon him. The Voyage of Sopater into Africke, and the present warre against Attalus; were matter of quarrell as much as needed : or if this were not enough, the Athenians helped to furnish them with

The Athenians, being at this time Lords of no more than their owne barren Territorie, tooke state vpon them neuerthelesse, as in their ancient fortune. Two yong Gentlemen of Acarnania entring into the Temple of Ceres, in the dayes of Initiation, (wherein were delivered the mysteries of Religion, or rather of Idolatrous superno fittion, vainly faid to bee auaileable vnto felicitie after this life) discouered themselucs by some impertinent questions, to be none of those that were initiated. Herevpon they were brought before the Officers; and though it was apparent, that they came into the place by meere errour, not thinking to have therein done amisse; yet, as it had beene for some hainous crime, they were put to death. All their Countrimen at home tooke this in ill part; and fought to reuenge it as a publike injurie, by warre vpon the Athenians. Procuring therefore of Philip fome Macedonians to helpe them, they entred into Attica: who wasted it with fire and sword; and carried thence away with them a great bootie. This indignitic flirred vp the high-minded Athemians; and made them thinke vpon doing more, than they had abilitie to performe. All which at the present they could doe, was to send Embassadours to King Attalus; gratulating his happie successe against Philip, and entreating him to visit their Citie. Attalus was hereto the more willing; because He understood, that the Roman Embassadours, houering about Greece for matter of intelligence, had a purpose to bee there at the same time. So he went thither, accompanied, besides his own followers, with some of the Rhodians. Landing in the Piraus, he found the Romans there, with whom he had much friendly conference: they rejoycing that he continued enemie to Philip; and He being no leffe glad, when hecheard of their purpose to renew the warre. The Athenians came forth of their Citie, all the Magistrates, Priests, and Citizens, with their wives and children, in as folemne a pompe as they could devise, to meet and honour the King. They entertained the Romans that were with him, in verie louing manner: but towards Attalns himselfe they omitted no point of obferuance, which their flatterie could suggest. At his first comming into the Citie they called the people to Assembly: where they defired him to honour them with his presence, and let them bearehim speake. But he excused himselfe; saying. That with an euill grace he should recount vnto them those many benefits, by which he studied to make them know what love he bore them. Wherefore it was thought fit, that he should deliner in writing, what he would have to bee propounded. Hee did fo. The points of his Declaration were; first, what hee had willingly done for their fake: then, what had lately passed betweene him and Philip: lastly, an exhortation 50 vnto them to declare themselves against the Macedonian, whilest Hee with the Rhodians, and the Romans, were willing and readie to take their part : which if they now refused to doe, He protested, that afterwardes it would be vaine to craue his helpe. There needed little entreatie: for they were as willing to proclaime the warre, as He to delire it. As for other matters; they loaded him with immoderate honours:

and ordained, That vnto the ten Tribes, whereof the bodie of their Citizens conlifted, thould be added another, and called after his name; as if Hee were in part one of their Founders. To the Rhodians they also decreed a Crowne of Gold, in reward of their vertue; and made all the Rhodians free Citizens of Athen.

Thus beganne a great noyle of warre, wherein little was left vnto the Romans for their part; Attains and the Rhodians taking all yoon them. But while the Gwer vainly mispending the time, in seeking to draw the Achienato their partie: that contraire to their olde manner were glad to bee at quiet: Philip wanne the Townes of Masonea and Anna, with many other strong places about the Hellespont. Likewise passing ouer the Hellespont, Hee laid siege van Cabpalus; and wanne to it, though Hee was faine to state there long. The Towne held out, rather you an oblimate resolution, and hope of succour from Attains and the Rhodians, than any great abilitie to defend it selfe against so mightie an Ememie. But the Rhodians for thickness for the there oughed to make good the place. The Roman Embassiadours wondred much as this great negligence, of them that had taken so much you them.

These Embassadours C. Claudius, M. Emplius, and P. Sempronius, were fent vnto Ptolemic Epiphuns King of Ægpt, to acquaine him with their Victoric agains Hambid and the Carthaginius; as also to thanke him for his fa-10 nour vnto them shewed in that warre; and to desire the continuance thereof, if they should need e ragainst Philip. This Ægptim King, was now in the third or fourth yeare of his Reigne, which (as his Father Philippure had done before him) Hee beganne a verie young boy. The courtesse for which the Remans were to thanke him, was, That out of Ægpt they had lately beene supplied with Corne, in a time of extreme Dearth; when the misferies of Warre had madeall their owne Prouinces vnable to relieue them. This message of Warre had madeall their owne Prouinces vnable to relieue them. This message could not but be welcome to the Ægptim: since it was well knowne, how Philip and Antischus had combined themselues against him; conspiring to take away his Kingdome. And therefore it might in reason bee hoped, that Hee, or 30 his Councell for him, should offer to supplie the Remans with Corne; since this their Macedonian Expedition, concerned his Estate no lesse theirs.

But as the errand was for the most part complementall: so had the Embassadours both leifure, and direction from the Senate, to looke vnto the things of Greece by the way. Wherefore they agreed, that M. Amylius the youngest of them should steppe aside, and visit Philip, to trie if Hee could make him leane the feige of Abydus; which else Hee was like to carrie. Amylius, comming to Philip, telles him, that his doings are contrarie to the League that Hee had made with the Romans. For Attalus and the Rhodians, vpon whom Hee 40 made Warre, were Confederate with Rome : and the Towne of Abydus, which Hee was now beseiging, had a kind of dependancie vpon Attalus. Hereto Philip answered, That Attalus and the Rhodisns had made Warre vpon him: and that Hee did onely requite them with the like. Doe you also (fayd Emy. lius) requite thefe poore ABYDENI with fuch terrible Warre, for any the like Inuasion by them first made upon you? The King was angric to heare himselfe thus taken short: and therefore Hee roundly made answere to Amylius; It is your youth, Sir, and your beautie, and (about all, ) your being a Roman, that makes you thus prasumptuous. But I would wish yee to remember the League that yee base made with me, and to keepe it : if see doe otherwise, I will make see under-fland, that the Kingdome and Name of Macedon is in matter of Warre, polosse noble than the Roman. So Hee dismissed the Embassadour; and had the Towne immediatly yeelded to his discretion. The people had entertained a resolution, to have died euerie one of them and set their Towne on fire; binding themselues hereto

by a fearefull oath, when Philip denied to accept them upon reasonable Conditions, But having in desperate fight, oncerepelling him from the Breach, loft the greatest number of their Youth: it was thought meet by the Gouernours and Ancients of the Citie, to change this resolution, and take such peace as could be gotten. So they carried out their Gold and Siluer to Philip: about which whiled they were bulies, the memorie of their oath wrought so effectually in the yonger fort; that, by exhortation of their Priess, they fell to murdering their women, children, and themselues. Hereof the King had so little compassion, that He said, he would grant the Abydoni three dayes leisure to die: and to that end forbad his men to enter the Towns, or hazard themselues in interrupting the violence of those mad sooles.

δ. I X.

The Romans decreewwre against PHILIP, and send one of their Consuls into Greece, as it were in desence of the Athenians their Consederates. (
How poore the Athenians were at this time, both in qualitie and estate.)

His calamitic of the Abydeni, was likened by the Romans vnto that of the saguntines: which indeed it nearely refembled; though Rome was not alike interested in the quarrell. But to helpe themselues with pretence for the warre, they had found out another saguntines, cuen the Citie of Athens: which if the Macedonian should wanne, then rested there no more to doe, than that he should presently embarke himselfe for Italie, whither he would come, not as Hannibal from Saguntum in fine monethes, but in the fhort space of five dayes fayling. Thus P. Sulpicius the Conful tolde the Multitude, when he exhorted them to make warre vpon Philip, which at his first propounding they had denied. The example of Pyrrhus was by him alleadged; to shew, what 20 Philip, with the power of a greater kingdome, might dare to vndertake; as also the fortunate Voyage of Scipio into Africk, to show the difference of making warre abroad, and admitting it into the bowels of their owne Countrie. By such arguments was the Commonaltic of Rome induced to beloise, that this warre with the Macedonian was both just and necessarie. So it was decreed: and immediately the same Conful hasted away towards Macedon, having that Province allotted vnto him before, and all things in a readinesse, by order from the Senate; who followed other Motiues, than the people must be acquainted with. Great thankes were given to the Athenian Emballadours, for their constancie (as was faid) in not changing their faith at fuch time as they stood in danger of being besieged. And indeed great thankes were do due to them; though not vpon the same occasion. For the people of Rome had no cause to thinke it a benefit vnto themselves, that any Greeke Towne, refusing to sue vnto the Macedonian for peace, requested their helpe against him. But the Senate intending to take in hand the Conquest of the Easterne partes; had reason to give thankes vnto those, that ministred the occasion. Since therefore it was an vntrue fuggestion, That Philip was making readic for Italie: and since neyther Attalus, the Rhodians, nor any other State in those quarters, desired the Romans to give them protection: these busic-headed Athenians, who falling out with the Acarnanians, and consequently with Philip, about a matter of May.game, (as was shewed before) sent Embaffadours into all parts of the World, cuen to Ptelemie of Agypt, and to the 70 Romans, as wel as to Attalus and other their neighbours; must be accepted as cause of the warre, and Authours of the benefit thence redounding.

Neuertheless is loues to fall out where the meaning differs from the pretence: the doings of P. Subscius the Conful were such, as might have argued Athens to bee the least part of his care. Hee sailed not about Peloponness, but tooke the readie way to Macedon; and landing about the River of Apfus, between Dyrrachium and Apollonia, there beganne the warre. Soone vpon his comming the Athenian Embaffadours were with him, and craued his helpe: whereof they could make no benefit whilest he was so farre from them. They bemoaned themselues as men besieged, and entreated him to deliuer them. For which cause He sent vnto them G. Claudius with twentie Gallies, and a competent number of men: but the maine of his forces He retained with him, for the profequation of a greater designe. The Athenians were not indeed belieged; onely fome Rouers from Chaleis, in the Ile of Eubara; and fome bands of aduenturers out of Corinth, vied to take their shippes and spoile their fields, because they had declared themselves against King Philip, that was Lord of 10 these two Townes. The Robberies done by these Pyrats and free-booters, were by the more eloquent than warlike Athenians, in this declining Age of their Fortune and Vertue, called a Seige. From such detriment the arruall of Claudius, and shortly after of three Rhodian Gallies, eafily preserved them. As for the Athenians themselves: they that had beene wont, in ancient times, to vndertake the Conquests of Agypt, Cyprus, and Sicil; to make warre vpon the great Persian King; and to hold so much of Greece in Subjection, as made them redoubtable vnto all the rest: had now no more than three Shippes, and those open ones, not much better than long Boates. Yet thought they not themselves a whit the worse men; but stood as highly your the glorie and vertue of their Ancestors, as if it had beene still their owne.

Great labouring to draw the Letolians into the warre.

HILIP, returning home from Abydus, heard newes of the Roman Conful his being about Apollonia. But ere he stirred forth to give him entertainment; or perhaps before hee had well refolued, whether it were best awhile to sit still, and trie what might bee done for obtaining of peace, or whether to make opposition, and resist the site of the s ders with all his forces: Hee received advertisement from Chaleis of a gricuous 40 mishap there befallen him, by procurement of the Athenians. For C. Claudius with his Romans, finding no fuch worke at Athens as they had expected, or as was answerable to the fame that went abroad; purposed to doe somewhat that might quicken the Warre, and make his owne employment better. Hee grew soone wearie of sitting as a Scarre-Crowe, to faue the Athenians grounds from spoile; and therefore gladly tooke in hand a bufineffe of more importance. The Towne of Chalcis was negligently guarded by the Macedonian Souldiours therein, for that there was no enemie at hand; and more negligently by the Townsmen, who reposed themselves vpon their Garrison. Hereof Claudius having advertisement, failed thither by night for feare of being deferied; and, arriving there a little before breake of day, tooke it by Scalado. He yled no mercie, but flew all that came in his way: and wanting men to keepe it (vnlesse hee should have left the heartlesse Athenians to their owne defence) He fet it on fire; confuming the Kings Magazines of Corne, and all proui-fions for warre, which were plenteoufly filled. Neither were He and his Affociates contented with the great abundance of spoile which they carried abord their ships and with enlarging all those, whom Philip, as in a place of most securitie, kept there imprisoned; but to shew their despight and hatred vato the King, they ouerthrew and brake in peeces the Statuas vnto him there erected. This done, they hafted away towards Athens: where the newes of their exploit were like to be joyfully welcomed. The King lay then at Demetrias about some twentie miles thence: whither when these tidings, or part of them, were brought him, though he saw that it was too late to remedie the matter; yet hee made all haft to take reuenge. Hee thought to have taken the Athenians with their truftie friends, busie at worke in 10 ranfacking the Towne, and loading themselves with spoile: but they were gone before his comming. Five thousand light-armed foot hee had with him, and three hundered horse : whereof leaning at Chalcis onely a few to burie the dead, Hee marched thence away speedily towards Athens: thinking it not unpossible to take his enemies, in the joy of their victorie, as full of negligence, as they had taken Chaleis. Neither had he much failed of his expectation; if a Fooot-post, that stood Scout for the Citie vpon the borders, had not descried him a far off, and swiftly carried word of his approch to Athens. It was midnight when this Post came thither : who found all the Towns allegoe, as feareleffe of any danger. But the Magistrates, hearing his report, caused a trumpet out of their Citadell to sound the Alarme; and 20 with all speed made readie for defence. Within a few houres Philip was there who feeing the many lights, and other fignes of bulle preparation viuall in fuch a cafe, understood that they had newes of his comming; and therefore willed his men, to repose themselves till it were day. It is like, that the paucitie of his followers did helpe well to animate the Citizens, which beheld them from the wals. Wherefore though Claudius were not yet returned (who was to fetch a compasse about by Sea, and had no cause of hast) yet having in the Towne some mercinarie souldiours, which they kept, of their owne, besides the great multitude of Citizens; they aduentured to iffue forth at a gate, whereto they faw Philip make approch. The King was glad of this : reckoning all those his owne, that were thus hardie. He therefore 30 onely willed his men to follow his example; and prefently gaue charge vpon them. In that fight he gaue fingular proofe of his valour : and beating downe many of the Enemies with his owne hands, draue them with great flaughter backe into the Citie. The heat of his courage transported him further, than discretion would have allowed, eyen to the veriegate. But he retired without harme taken; for that they which were vpon the Towers ouer the gate, could not vsetheir casting weapons against him, without endangering their owne people that were thronging before him into the Citie. There was a Temple of Hereules, a place of exercise, with a Groue, and many goodly Monuments belides, necreadiovning vnto Athens: of which he spared none; but suffered the rage of his anger to extend, even vnto the 40 fepulchers of the dead. The next day came the Romans, and some Companies of Attalus his men from . Agina: too late, in regard of what was alreadic past; but in good time, to preuent him of fatisfying his anger to the full, which as yet he had not done. So he departed thence to Corinth : and hearing that the Acheans held a Parliament at Arges, He came thither to them ynexpecked.

The Achaesis were deutling you warre, which they intended to make again! Nais the Tyrant of Lacedomen: who being that day hin the roome of Machanidas, did greater milchiefe than any that went before him. This Tyrant relied wholly you his Mercinaries; and of his fubjects had no regard. He was a cruell opprefilor; a greedie extortioner you those that he of the many and one, that in his natural of condition similar than the same and the same are the same are the was a cruel of the same and the same are the same and the same are t and apparrelled it with fuch coftly garments as shee vied to weare. But it was indeede an engine, feruing to torment men. Hereof he made vie, when hee meant to trie the vertue of his Rhetorick. For calling vnto him some rich man, of whose monic hee was desirous; Hee would bring him into the roome where this counterfait

Apega stood, and there we all his art of perswasion, to get what hee desired, as it were by good will. If he could not fo speede, but was answered with excuses; then tooke he the refractorie denier by the hand, and told him, that perhaps his wife Apega (who sate by in a chaire) could perswade more effectually. So hee led him to the Image, that rose vp and opened the armes, as it were for embracement. Those armes were full of sharpe yron nailes, the like whereof were also sticking in the breafts, though bidden with her clothes; and herewith the griped the poore wretch: to the pleasure of the Tyrant, that laughed at his cruell death. Such and worse (for it were long to tell all here that is spoken of him) was Nabis in his Gouernement. In his dealings abroad hee combined with the Ltolians, as Machanidas and Lyour our had done before him. By these hee grew into acquaintance with the Romans; and was comprehended in the League which they made with Philip, at the end of their former warre. Of Philopamens vertue hee stood in feare; and therefore durft not prouoke the Acheans, as long as they had fuch an able Commander. But when Creliades, a farre worfe Captaine, was their Prator; and all or the greatest part of their Mercinaries were discharged; Philopamen being also gone into Crete, to follow his 20 beloued Occupation of warre: then did Nabis fall upon their Territorie; and wasting all the feilds, made them diffrust their owne safetie in the Townes.

Against this Tyrant the Acheans were preparing for warre, when Philip came among them; and had fet downe, what proportion of fouldiours cuerie Cittie of their Corporation should furnish out. But Philip willed them, not to trouble themfelues with the care of this businesse; for a smuch as he alone would ease them of this warre, and take the burden vpon himfelfe. With exceeding joy and thankes they accepted of this kind offer. But then he told them, That, whilest hee made warre upon Lacedemon, Hee ought not to leave his owne Townes virguarded. In which respect he thought they would be pleased, to send a few men to Corinth, and some 20 Companies into the Ile of Eubara; that so he might securely pursue the war against Nabis. Immediatly they found out his deuice : which was none other, than to engage their Nation in his war against the Romans. Wherefore their Prætor Cycliades made him answer, That their Lawes forbade them to conclude any other matters in their Patliament, than those for which it was affembled. So passing the Decree, vpon which they had agreed before, for preparing war against 20 abis; hee brake vp the Assemblie, with eueric mans good liking : whereas in former times, Hee had beene thought no better than one of the Kings Paralites.

It greined the King to have thus fayled in his purpose with the Acheans. Neuertheleffe he gathered vp among them a few Voluntaries; and fo returned by Co- 40 rinth backe into Atties. There he met with Philocles one of his Captaines, that with two thousand men had been doing what harme he might vnto the Countrie. With this addition of strength, he attempted the Castle of Eleusine, the Hauen of Pyraus, and even the Cittie of Athens. But the Romans made fuch haft after him by Sea, thrufting themselues into cuerie of these places; that he could no more than wreak his anger vpon those goodlie Temples, with which the Land of Attica was at that time fingularly beautified. So He destroyed all the workes of their notable Artificers, wrought in excellent Marble: which they had in plentic, of their owne; or, haming long agoe beene Masters of the Sea, had brought from other places, where best choice was found. Neither did he onely pull all downe: but caused his men to 50 breake the verie stones, that they might be unseruiceable to the reparation. His losse at Chalcis being thus reuenged vpon Athens, Hee went home into Macedon: and there made prouision, both against the Roman Consulthat lay about Apollonia; and against the Dardsnians, with other his bad neighbours, which were likely to infest him. Among his other cares he forgot not the Etolians: to whose Parliament. shortly to be held at Naupactus, he sent an Embassage : requesting them to continue in his friendship. Thus was Philip occupied.

CHAP.4. S.10. of the Historie of the World.

Sulpicius the Roman Conful encamped upon the River of Apfus. Thence he fent forth Apultius, his Lieutenant, with part of the Armie to walt the borders of Mace. don. Apullius tooke fundrie Castles and Townes; vsing such extremitie of sword and fire at Antipatria, the first good Towne which he wan by force, that none durst afterwards make refistance, vnlessethey knew themselves able to hold out. Returning towards the Conful with his spoile, He was charged in Rere, you the passage of a Brooke, by Athenagor as a Macedonian Captaine : but the Romans had the better; and killing many of these enemies, tooke prisoners many more, to the increase of their bootie, with which they arrived in safetie at their Campe. The fuccesse of this Expedition, though it were not great; yet ferued to draw into the Roman freindship, those that had formerly no good inclination to the Macedonian. These were Pleuratus, the sonne of Scerdilaidas the Illyrian; Aminander King of the Athamanians; and Bato, the sonne of Longarus, a Prince of the Dardanians. They offered their affiltance vnto the Conful, who thanked them : and faid. That hee would shortly make vse of Pleuratus and Bato, when hee entredinto Mazedon : but that the freindship of Aminander, whose Countrie lay betweene the Atolians and Theffalie, might be perhaps availeable with the Etolians, to firrethem vo against

So the present care, was wholy set vpon the Atolian Parliament at hand. This ther came Embassadours from the Macedonian, Romans, and Athenians, Of which, the Macedonian spake first; and faid, That as there was nothing fallen out, which should occasion the breach of peace between his Master and the Atolians: fo was it to be hoped, that they would not fuffer themselves without good cause, to be caried away after other mens fancies. He prayed them to confider, how the Romans heretofore had made shew, as if their warre in Greece tended onely to defence of the Atolians: and yet notwithstanding had been angric, that the Actolians, by making

20 peace with Philip, had no longer neede of fuch their Patronage. What might it be that made them so busie, in obtruding their protection upon those that needed it not? Surely it was cuch the generall hatred, which these Barbarians bore vnto the Greekes. For euen after the fame fort had they leant their helpe to the Mamertines: and afterwards delinered Syracufe, when it was oppressed by Carthaginian Tyrants: but now both Syracuse and Messana, were subject vnto the Rods and Axes of the Romans. To the fame effect he alleadged many examples, adding, That in like fort it would happen to the Etolians : who, if they drew fuch Masters into Greece. must not looke hereafter to hold, as now, free Parliaments of their owne, wherein to confult about Warre and Peace: the Romans would ease them of this care, and 40 fend them fuch a Moderator, as went cuerie yeere from Rome to Syracule; Wherefore he concluded, That it was best for them, whilest as yetthey might, and whilest one of them as yet could helpe the other, to continue in their League with Philip: with whom if at any time, vponlight occasion, they happened to fall out, they might as lightly be reconciled: and with whom they had three yeares agoe made the peace which stil continued; although the same Romans were then against it, who It would have troubled the Romans, to frame fought to breake it now.

a good answer to these objections. For the Macedonian had spoken the veric truth. in showing whereto this their Patronage, which they offered with such importunitie, did tend. Wherefore the Athenians were fet on by them to speake next; who had 50 store of eloquence, and matter of recrimination enough, to make Philip odious.

These affirmed, that it was a great impudence in the Macedonian Embassadour, to call the Romans by the name of Barbarians: knowing in what barbarous manner his owne King had, in few dayes past made war youn the gods themselves, by destroying all their Temples in Attiea. Herewithal they made a pitifull rehearfall of their owne calamities: and faid, that if Philip might haue his will: Ætolia, and all the reft of Greece, (hould feele the lame that Attuahad felt; yea that Athens it selfe, togener with Atherna, Inpiter, Ceres, and other of the gods, were like to haue selt, if the wals and the Roman armes had not defended them. Then spake the Romans: who excusing, as well as they could, their owne oppression of all those, in whose defence they had betretofore taken armes, wentroundly to the point in hand. They said, that they had of late made warre in the Ætolians behalfe, and that the Ætolians had without their consent made peace: whereof since the Ætolians must excuse themselbers, by alleaging that the Romans, being busseld with Carthage, wan, ted leisure to give them aid convenient: so this excuse being now taken away, and 10 the Romans wholy bent against their common selemic; it concerned the Ætolians to take part with them in their war and vistorie. valles they had rather periss with

It might easily be perceived, that they which were so we hement, in offering their helpe ere it was desired: were themselves carried who the war by more carried motives, than a simple desire to helpe those freinds, with whom they had no great acquaintance. This may have beene the cause, why Dorymachus the Estellan Prator shifted them off awhise with a dilatorie answer: though hee rold his Countrimen, That by referring themselves, till the matter were inclined one way or other, they might a ficerwards take part with those that had the better fortune. His answer 10 was, first, in general termes; That ouer-much half was an enemic to good counsel: for which cause they must further deliberate, ere they concluded. But comming nevert to the matter in hand, He passed an Decree, Thus the Prator might at any time east an Assemble of the States, and therein conclude upon this businesses, and the contra-rie notwiths summer, whereas otherwise it was unlawfull to treat of such asserts.

The meeting of Philip with the Romans, and skirmilhing with them on his borders. The Ætolians inuade his dominions, and are beaten home. Some doings of Attalys and the Roman Fleet.

HILLIP was glad to heare, that the Romans had fped no better in their folicitation of the Atolians. He thought them hereby disappointed, in the very beginning, of one great helpe; and meant himselfe to difappoint them of another. His sonne Perfeus, a very boy, was sent to keepe the streights of Pelagonia against the Dardamans; hauing with him some of the Kings Councell, to gouerne both him and his atmic. It was indeed, as may seeme, that the presence of the Kings sonne, how young source, would ged, as may seeme, that the presence of the Kings fonne, how young source, would see the second of the se him some of the Kings Councell, to gouerne both him and his armie. It was indged, as may seeme, that the presence of the Kings sonne, how young soener, would god, as may seeme, that the presence of the Kings sonne, how young soener, would both encourage his followers, and terrifie the enemies; by making them at least beleue, that he was not weakely attended. And this may have been the reason, why the same Persun, as we were selected, was in like manner left upon the borders of £10sta by his father; whome earnest businesse called thence another way. No danger of enemies being left on either hand: it was thought, that the Macedonian Fleet vnder sterastics, would serve to keepe Attalus, with the Rhodians and Romans, from doing harme by sea, when the Kings backe was turned; who tooke his journie Westward against Sabsium the Conful.

The Armies met in the countrey of the Dassarti, a people in the vtmost borders of Macedon towards sllyrit, about the mountaines of Candania; that running along from Hamm in the North will they ioyne in the South with Pindun; inclose the Westerne parts of Macedon. Two or three daies they lay in sight the one of the other, without making offer of battaile. The Conful was the first that is suffered forth of his Campe into the open feild. But Philip was not confident in the strength which he had then about him, and therefore thought it better to send forth some of hight-armed Mercinaries, and some part of his horse, to entertaine them with skirmish. These were easily vanquished by the Romans, and driven backe into their Campe. Now although it was so, that the King was vanvilling to hazard all as first youn a Cast, and therfore sent for Perseus with his Companies, to increase his owne forces: yet being no lesse with the sound of the word of the word of the same of the word of t

10 Go gaue charge to Albertagor.e., one of his Captaines, to prouoke out the Remant of fight; intructing both him and the Targettiers, how to behaue themselues respectively, as opportunitie should fall out. The Romant had no mistrust of any ambush; having sought vpon the same ground a day before. Wherefore perhaps they might have sustained some notable detriment, if the Kings directions had been well followed. For when Albertagoras began to fall backe, they charged him so hody, that they drawe him to an haltic slight, and pursued him as hard as they were able. But the Captaines of the Targettiers, not slaying to let them runne into the danger, discovered themselves before it was time; and thereby made frustrate the worke, to which they were appointed. The Conful hereby gathered, that the 3º greater needeto fight, than Hee. Sulptitus was vnwilling to loofe time: neither could he without great danger, lying fo neere the Enemie, that was firong in horfe, fend his men to fetch in corne out of the feilds. Wherefore he remoued eight miles off: prefuming that Philip would not aduenture to meet him on even ground; and fo the more boldly he fuffered his Forragers to over-run the Countrie. The King was nothing forrie of this: but permitted the Romanto take their good pleafure: even illtheir prefumption, and his owne fuppofed feare, should make them carelesse. When this was cometo passe, he tooke all his borie and light-armed foote, with which hee occupied a place in the midway, between the Forragers and their Campe. There he stayed in Couert with part of his forces; to keepe the passages.

22 King had fome delire to trie the fortune of a battalic; which are therefore predicted the fector time; leading forth his Armie, and fetting it in order, with Elephants in front: a kind of helpe which the Romans had neuer yield before, but had taken the fe of late from the Carthaginians. Such are the alterations wrought by Time. It was fearce about fourefeore yeeres crethis, that Pyrthus carried Elephants out of Greece into Halie, to affitight the Romans, who had neuer feene any of those beatls before. But now the fame Romans, 5 (whileft possibly fome were yet aline, which had knowen that Expedition of Pyrthus Jeome into Macedon, bringing Elephants with them; whereof the CMacedonius and Greeks thau enone. Philip had patience to let the Conful braue him at his Trenches: wherein he did wisely: for the Roman had

40 that none should ceape. The rest hee sent abroad the Countrie, to fall you the straglers: willing them to put all to the sword, and let none run home with newes to the Campe. The slaughter was great: and those which scaped the hands of them that were sent abroad to scoure the faileds, lighted all or most of them you the King and his companies in their slight: so as they were cut off by the way. Long it was cret the Campe had newes of this. Bur in the end there ceaped some who though they could not make any perfect relation how the matter went; yet by telling what had happened to themselines, raised a great tumult. Subjetion hereuponsends sorth all his horse, and bids them helpe their fellowes where they saw it medfull! He himselise with the Legions followed. The companies of Horse duits to ded themselines, accordingly as they were with aduertissments upon the way, into

O ded themfelues, accordingly as they met with aduertitements upon the way, into many parts: not knowing where was moft of the danger. Such of them as lighted upon Philips Troupes, that were canualling the feild, tooke their taske where they found it. But the maine bulke of them fell upon the King himfelfe. They had the difaduantase: as comming fewer, and upprepared, to one that was readie for them.

So they were beaten away : as their fellowes also might have beene, if the King had well bethought himfelfe, and given over in time. But while, not contented with fuch an harnest, he was too greedie about a poore gleaning: the Roman Legions appeared in light : which emboldened their horse to make a re-charge. Then the danger apparant, enforced the Macedonians to looke to their owne fafetie. They ranne which way they could; and (as men that lie in wait for others, are foldome heedfull of that which may befall themselves) to escape the Enemie, they declined the fairest way; so as they were plunged in Marishes and Bogges, wherein many of them were loft. The Kings horse was slaine under him: and there had be beene cast away, if a louing subject of his had not alighted; mounted him vpon his owne horse; and deliuered him out of perill, at the expence of his owne life, that running on foot was ouertaken, and killed.

In the common opinion Philip was charged with improvident rallineffe; and the Conful, with as much dulneffe; for this daies feruse. A little longer flay would have delivered the King from these enemies without any blow; since when all the feilds about them were wasted, they must needes have retired backe to the Sca. On the other fide it was not thought valikely, That if the Romans following the King, had fet you his Campe, at fuch time as he fled thither halfe amazed with feare of being either flaine or taken; they might have won it. But that noble Historian Linie, (as is commonly his manner) bath judiciously observed, That neither the one, 20 nor the other, were much too blame in this daics worke. For the maine bodie of the Kings Armie laie safe in his Campe; and could not be so assonished with the loffe of two or three hundred Horfe, that it should therefore have abandoned the defence of the Trenches. And as for the King himfelfe; He was advertised, that Pleuratus the Illyrian, and the Dardamans, were fallen voon his Countrie; when they found the passage thereinto open, after Per/eus was called away from custodie of the Streights. This was it which made him adventure to doe fomewhat betimes that he might fet the Romans going the fooner, and afterwards looke vnto his troublefome neighbours. In confideration of this, Philip was defirous to cleere himselfe of the Romans, as foone as he might. And to that purpe fe he fent vnto the Conful; re- 30 questing a day of truce for buriall of the dead. But in stead of so doing, he marched away by night; and left fires in his Campe to beguile the Enemie, as if he had not stirred out of the place. Sulpicius, when he heard of the Kings departure, was not flow to follow him. He ouertooke the Macedonians in a place of firength, which they had fenced (for it was a woodie ground) by cutting downe trees, and laving them athwart the way where it was most open. In making of such places good, the Macedonian Phalans was of little vie; being a fquare battaile of pikes, not fit for cueric ground. The Archers of Crete were judged, and were indeed, more feruiceable in that case. But they were few; and their arrowes were of small force against the Roman sheild. The Macedanians therefore helped them by flinging of stones. 40 But to no purpose. For the Romans got within them; and forced them to quit the place. This victorie (fuch as it was) laid open vnto the Conful some poore Townes there about; which partly were taken by ftrong hand; partly yeelded for feare. But the spoile of these, and of the feilds adjoyning, was not sufficient to maintaine his Armie; and therefore he returned backe to Apollonia.

The Dardanians, hearing that Philip was come backe, withdrew themselves apace out of the Countrie. The King fent Athenagoras to wait vpon them home; whileft he himselse went against the Etelians. For Damocritus the Prætor of the Aetolians, who had referued himfelfe and his Nation vnto the event of things, hearing report, that Philip was beaten once and againe : as also that Pleuratus and the Dardenians 50 were fallen vpon Macedon; grew no leffe busic on the sudden, than before he had beene wife. He perswaded his Nation to take their time; and so, not staying to proclaime war, ioyned his forces with Aminander the Athamanian; and made invalion vpon Theffalie. They tooke and cruelly facked a few Townes: whereby they grew confident; as if, without any danger, they might doe what they lifted. But Philip came vpon them ere they looked for him : and killing them as they lay difpersed, was like to have taken their Campe; if Aminander, more warie than the Atolians, had not helped at need, and made the Retrait through his owne mountainous Countrie.

About the fame time; the Roman Fleet, affifted by Attalus and the Rhodians, had raken some small Islands in the Legan Sea. They tooke likewise the Towns of oreum in the Ile of Eubaa; and some other places thereabout. The Townes were giuen to Attalus, after the same Compact that had formerly beene made with the * Etolians: the goods therein found were given to the Romans; and the people, for flaues. Other attempts on that fide were hindred; eyther by foule weather at Seas or by want of daring, and of meanes.

VILLIUS the Roman Conful wastes a yeare to no effect. Warre of the Gaules in Italie. An Embassie of the Romans to Carthage, MASANISSA, and VER-MIN A. The Macedonian prepares for defence of his Kingdome: and T. QVINTIVS FLAMINIVS is fent against him.

Hus the time ranne away : and P. Villius, a new Conful, tooke charge of the Warrein Macedon. Hee was troubled with a Mutinie of his olded Souldiors: whereof two thousand, having ferned long in sidi and Africk, thought themselves much wronged, in that they could not bee suffered to looke vnto their owne estates at home.

They were (belike) of the Legions that had ferued at Canna: as may feeme by their complaint, of hauing beene long ablent from Italie, whither faine they would 30 haue returned, when by their Colonels they were shipped for Macedon. How Villins dealt with them, it is vncertaine. For the Historic of his yeare is lost: whereof the miffe is not great; fince hee did nothing memorable. Valerius Antias, as wee find in Linie, hath adorned this Villeus with a great exploit against Philip. Yet since Linie Lini.L.32. himselfe, an Historian to whom few of the best are matchable, could find no such thing recorded in any good Authour; we may reasonably believe, that Villins his

In the beginning of this Macedonian Warre, the Romans found more trouble than could have bin expected with the Gaules. Their Colonie of Placentia, a goodly and flrong Towne, which neyther Hannibal, nor after him Afdrubal, had beene able 40 to force; was taken by these Barbarians, and burntin a manner to the ground. In like fort Cremona was attempted; but faued herfelfe, taking warning by her neighbours calamitic. Amilear a Carthaginian, that had staied behind Afarubal, or Mago, in those parts; was now become Captaine of the Gaules, in these their enterprises. This when the Romans heard: they fent Embassadours to the Carthaginians: giving them to vnderstand, That, if they were not wearie of the peace, it behoued them to call home, and deliuer vp, this their Citizen Amilear, who made warre in Italie. Herevnto it was added (perhaps left the meffage might feeme otherwife to have fauoured a little of some scare) That of the Fugitive slaves belonging vnto the Romans, there were some reported to walk vp and down in Carthage: which if it were so, then 50 ought they to beereftored backe to their Masters; as was conditioned in the late Peace. The Embassadours that were sent on this errand; had further charge to treat with Masanissa, as also with Vermina the sonne of Syphax. Vnto Masanissa, befides matter of complement, they were to fignifie what pleafure Hee might doe them , by lending them some of his Namidian Horse , to serue in their Warre against the Macedonian, Vermina had entreated the Senate, to vouchsafe vnto him the name of King; and promifed thereafter to descrue it, by his readinesse in doing them all good offices. But they were fomewhat fcrupulous in the matter : and faid. That having beene, and being still (as they tooke it) their Enemie, Hee ought first of all to delire peace; for that the name of King, was an honour which they vsed not to conferre vpon any, faue onely vpon fuch as had royally deserued it at their hands. The authoritie to make peace with him, was wholly committed vnto these Embassadours vpon such termes as they should thinke sit; without further relation to the Senate and People. For they were then busied with greater cares. The Carthaginians made a gentle answere, That they wholly disclaimed Amilear : bani- 10 thing him; and confifcating his goods. As for the Fugitiues; they had reftored as manie as they could finde; and would in that point, as farre as was requifite, give fatisfaction to the Senate. Herewithall they fent a great proportion of Corne to Rome: and the like vnto the Armie that was in Macedon. King Mafanissa would haue lent vnto the Romans two thousand of his Numidian Horse: but they were contented with halfe the number; and would accept no more. Vermina met with the Embaffadours, to give them entertainment, on the borders of his Kingdome: and, without any disputation, agreed with them vpon termes of peace.

Thus were the Romans bufied in taking order for their Macedonian Warre, that they might purfue it ftrongly, and without interruption. As for Amilear and his 20 Gaules : they laid seige vnto Cremona; where L. Furius a Roman Prætor came vpon them, fought a battaile with them, and ouercame them. Amilear the Carthaginian died in this battaile; and the fruit of the Victorie was fuch, as both made amends for loffes past, and left the worke easie to those, that afterwardes should have the mannaging of warre among those Gaules. So was there good leifure to thinke vpon the businesse of Macedon: where Philip was carefully prouiding to give contentment vnto his subjects, by punishing a bad Counsailour whom they hated; as also to affure vnto himselfe the Acheans, by rendring vnto them some Townes that he held of theirs; and finally to strengthen his Kingdome, not onely by exercising and trayning his people, but by fortifying the passages that led thereinto out of Epirus. This was in doing, when Villius, having vnprofitably laboured to find way into Macedon, taking a journie (as Sulpicius had done before him) wherein he could not be supplied with victuals, determined at length to trie a new course. But then came aduertisement, that T. Quintius Flaminius was chosen Conful, and had Macedon allotted him for his Pronince, whose comming was expected and he very shortly arrived at the Armie.

d. XIII.

The Romans beginne to make warre by negotiation. T. OVINTIVS winnes a passage against PHILIP. Thessale wasted by PHILIP, the Romans, and Atolians. The Acheans for faking the Macedonian take part with the Romans. A treatie . of peace, that was vaine. PHILIP delivers Argos to NA-BIS the Tyrant, who presently enters into League with the Romans.

He Romans had not beene wont in former times, to make Warre after fisch a trifling manner. It was their vie, to give battaile to the Enemie, as soone as they met with him. If hee resused it, they besieged his 50 Townes: and fo forced him to trie the fortune of a day, with his difaduantage in reputation, when hee had long forborne it (as it would bee interpreted) vpon knowledge of his owne weaknesse. But in this their Warre with Philip, they beganne to learne of the fubtle Greekes, the art of Negotiation:

wherein hitherto they were not growne fo fine as within a little while they proued. Their treasurie was poore, and stood indebted, * manie yeares after this, vnto prinate men, for part of those monies that had beene borrowed in the second Punicke Warre. This had made the Commonaltie averse from the Macedonian Warre; and had thereby driven the Senators greedie of the enterprize, to make vse of their cunning. Yet being wearie of the flow pace wherewith their businesse went forward, they determined to increase their Armie; that they might have the lesse need to relie your their Confederates. So they leavied eight thousand foot and eight hundred Horse (the greater part of them of the Latines) which they sent with T. Quintius Flaminus the new Consulinto Macedon. Their Nauie, and other meanes could well haue serued, for the setting forth and transportation of a greater Armie : but by ftraining themselves to the most of their abilitie, they should (besides other difficulties, incident vnto the fullenance of those that are too manie and too farre from home) have bred some icalousie in their friends of Greece, and thereby have lost some friends, yea perhaps have increased the number of their enemies more than of their owne Souldiours. This present augmentation of the forces was verie requifite; for that Attalus, about the fame time, excused himselfe vnto them, by his Embaffadours: requesting that eyther they would undertake the defence of his Kingdome against Antiochus who inuaded it; or else that they would not take it oncourteoufly, that he quitted the Warre with Philip, and returned home, to looke unto that which more concerned him. Their answer was remarkeable. They faid. That it was not their manner to vie the aid of their friends, longer than their friends had good opportunitie, and could also bee well contented to affoord it; That they could not honeftly take part with Attalus, their good friend though hee were, against Antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but That they would deale with Antiochus by Embaffadours, and (as common friendes unto both of the Kings) doe their best to perswade an attonement betweene them. In such louing falhion did they now carrie themselves, towards their good friend the King Antion thus: who reciprocally, at their entreatie, withdrew his Armie from the Kingdome 20 of Attalus. But how little they regarded these tearmes of friendship, after that once they had made an end with Philip; it will verie soone appeare.

T. Quintius halling away from Rome, came betimes into his Prouince, with the Supply decreed vnto him, which confilted, for the most part, of olde Souldiours, that had served in Spaine and Africk. He found Villius the old Consul, (whom at his comming hee presently discharged) and King Philip of Mucedon, encamped one as gainst the other, in the Streights of Epirus, by the River of Applus or Aous, It was manifest, that eyther the Romans must fetch a compasse about, and seeke their way into Macedon through the poore Countrie of the Daffarctions; or elfe winne, by force, that paffage which the King defended. In taking the former way, they had alo readic two yeares together mispent their time, and beene forced to returne backe without profit, for want of victuals : whereof they could neyther carrie with them from fufficient, nor find it on the way. But if they could once get ouer thefe Mountaines, which divided the South of Epirus from Theffalie: then should they enter into a plentifull Countrie; and which, by long dependance on the Macedonian, was become (in a manner) part of his Kingdome, whereof it made the South bors der. Neuerthelesse the desire of winning this passage, was greater than the likelihood. For the River of Apfus, running along through that Valley which alone was open betweene the Mountaines, made it al adeep Marish and vnpassable Bogge; a verie narrow way excepted, and a path cut out of the maine Rock by mans hand. Wherefore Quintius affaied to climbe in the Mountaines : but finding himfelfe difappointed of this hope, through the diligence of his Enemie, who neglected not the gard of them that was verie easie; Hee was compelled to sit still, without doing

composition, vp on some reasonable termes. He therefore so dealt with some of the Epirots, (among whom he had many friends) that He and the Conful had a meeting together. But nothing was effected. The Conful would have him to fet all Town es of Grecce at libertie; and to make amends for the injuries, which hee had do no to many people in his late Warres. Philip was contented to give libertie to those whom hee had subdued of late; but vnto such, as had beene long subicct ynto him and his Ancestors, He thought it against all reason, that he should relinguish his claime and Dominion over them. He also said. That as farre forth as it should appeare, that hee had done wrong vnto any Towne or people whatsoeuer. He could well be pleafed to make fuch amends, as might feeme convenient in the 10 judgment of some free State, that had not beene interested in those quarrels. But herewithall Quintius was not fatisfied. There needed, (hee faid) no judgment or compromise; for a smuch as it was apparant, that Philip had alwayes beene the Inuader; and had not made warre, as one prouoked, in his owne defence. After this altercation, when they should come to particulars : and when the Conful was required to name those Townes, that he would have to be fet at libertie; the first that hee named were the Thessalians. These had beene subjects (though conditionall) vnto the Macedonian Kings, ever fince the dayes of Alexander the Great and of Philiphis father. Wherefore, as foone as Flaminius had named the Theffalians; the King in a rage demanded, what sharper Condition Hee would have laid vpon him, 20 had he beene but vanquished. And herewithall abruptly hee flane away: refusing to heare any more of fuch discourse.

After this; the Conful strone in vaine, two or three dayes together, to have prenailed against the difficulties of that passage which Philip kept, When he had wel wearied himselfe, and could not resolve what course to take: there came to him an Heard man, fent from Charopus a Prince of the Epirots that favoured the Romans. who having long kept beafts in those Mountaines, was throughly acquainted with all by-paths; and therefore undertooke to guide the Romans, without any danger, to a place where they should have advantage of the Enemie. This guide, for feare of treacherous dealing, was fast bound: and, being promised great reward, in case he 39 made good his word; had fuch Companies, as was thought fit, appointed to follow his directions. They trauailed by night (it being then about the full of the Moone) and rested in the day-time, for scare of being discouered. When they had reconcred the hil-toppes, and were aboue the Macedonians, (though undiscouered by them because at their backs) they raised a great smoke; whereby they gave notice of their fuccesse vnto the Coful. Some skirmilhes, whilst these were on their journie. T. Quintius had held with the Macedonian; thereby to auert him from thought of that which was intended. But when on the third morning he faw the smoke arise more and more plainly, and thereby knew that his men had attained vnto the place whither they were fent: He preffed as neare as he could vnto the Enemies Campe: 40 and affailed them in their strength. He prevailed as little as in former times; vntill the shoutings of those that ranne downe the Hill, and charged Philip on the backe, aftonished so the Macedonians, that they betooke themselves to flight. The King. vpon first apprehension of the danger, made al speed away to saue himself. Yet anon confidering, that the difficultie of the passage must needes hinder the Romans from pursuing him: He made a stand at the end of fine miles; and gathered there together his broken troupes, of whom hee found wanting no more than two thousand men. The greatest losse was of his Campe and provisions: if not rather perhaps of his reputation; for that now the Macedonians beganne to stand in feare, lest being driven from a place of fuch advantage, they should hardly make good their partie against 50 the Enemie, vpon equall ground. Neyther was Philip himselfe much better perswaded. Wherefore he caused the The falians, as many of them as in his hastic retrait he could visit, to forsake their Townes and Countrie; carrying away with them as much as they wereable, and spoiling all the rest. But all of them could not be perfwaded, thus to abandon (for the pleafure of their King) their ancient habitations, and all the fubliance which they had gotten. Some there were that forcibly relifted him: which they might the better doe, for that he could not flay to vica my great compulsion. He allo himselfe tooke it verie greitourly, that he was driven to make fuch wast of a most pleafant and fruitfull Countrie, which had ever been well affected vnto him: fo that a little hinderance did ferue, to make him breake off his purpose; and withdraw himselfe home into his Kingdome of Assection.

The Atolians and Athamanians, when this fell out, were even in a redinesse to inuade The sale, ; whereinto the waies lay more open, out of their feuerall Countries. - When therefore they heard for certaintie, that Philip was beaten by the Romans: they foreflowed not the occasion; but made all speede, each of them to lay hold you what they might. T. Quintius followed them within a little while: but they had gotten so much before his comming, that He, in gleaning after their haruest, could not finde enough to maintaine his Armic. Thus were the poore Thel. falians, of whose libertie the Romans a few daies fince had made shew to be verie defirous, wasted by the same Romans and their Confederates, not knowing which way to turne themselves, or whom to avoid. T. Quintius wan Phaleria by assault: Metropolis and Piers y eclded vnto him. Rhage he belieged; and having made a faire breach yet was vnable to force it; so stoutly it was defended both by the inhabitants, and 20 by a Macedonian Garrison therein. Philip also at the same time, having somewhat recollected his spirits, houered about Tempe with his Armie; thrusting men into all places, that were like to be diffressed. So the Conful, having well neare spent his victuailes, & feeing no hope to prenaile at Rhige; brake up his liege, and departed out of Thessile. Hee had appointed his shippes of burden to meet him at Antierra, an Hauen towne of Phocis, on the Guife of Corinth : which Countrie being freind to the Macedonian, he presently inuaded; not so much for hatred vnto the people, as because it lay conveniently scated betweene Thessale and other Regions, wherein hehad busines, or was shortly like to haue. Many Townes in Phoeis he wan by affault: many were yeelded vp vnto him for feare; and within short space he had (in effect) mastered it all.

In the mene time L. Quintins the Confuls brother, being then Admirall for the In the mene time L. Quintins the Confuls brother, being then Admirall for the Romans in this war, io yned with King Lattalus and the Rhedian Fleet. They wan two Cities in Eukea, and afterward laid fiege vnto Canhere, an Haune and Arcenal of the Carinthius so in their Eafterne Sea. This enterprife did somewhat helpe forward the Achaens, in their desire to leaue the part of Philip: since it might come to passe, that Corinth it selfie, cre long time were spent; and that Conhere, with other places appertayning to Carinth, now verie shortly; should be rendred vnto their Naplaces appertayning to Carinth, now verie shortly; should be rendred vnto their Naplaces appertayning to Carinth, now verie shortly; should be rendred vnto their Naplaces appertayning to Carinth, now verie shortly; should be rendred vnto their Naplaces appertayning to Carinth, now verie shortly.

tion, by fauour of the Romans. But there were other Motiues, inducing the Acheans to prefer the freindship of the Romans, before the patronage of Philip; whereto they had been e long accustomed. For this King had fo many waies offended them in time of peace, that they thought it the best courset orid their hands of him; whilest being entangled in a dangerous war, he wanted meanes to hinder the execution of fuch counfale, as they should hold the fafest. His tyrannous practifes to make himselfe their absolute Lord: His poisoning of atus their old Gouernour: His false dealing with the Messenians, Epirots, and other people their Confederates, and his owne dependants: together with many particular outrages by him committed; had caused them long fince to hold him as a necessarie eaill, euen whilest they were vnable to bee without his affiliance. But fince by the vertue of Philopamen, they were growne formewhat 50 confident in their owne firength, fo as without the Macedonians helpe they could as well subsist, as having him to freind: then did they onely thinke how enill he was. and thereupon rejoyce the more, in that he was become no longer necessarie. It angred him to perceive how they frood affected; and therefore he fent murderers, to take away the life of* Philopamen. But fayling in this enterprise, and being detected:

*Plut.in vits Philopem, Inflin, l. 29. he did thereby onely fet fire to the Wood, which was throughly drie before, and prepared to burne. **Philopamea wrought fo with the **Achaems*: that no difcourse was more familiar with them, than what great cause they had to with-draw themselues from the **Macedonian*. Cycliads, a principal man among them, and lately their Prator, was expelled by them, for shewing himselfe passionate in the cause of **Philop** and **Ariftamus* chosen Prator, who laboured to ioyne them in societie with the **Romans*.

These newes were verie welcome to T. Quintius. Embassadours were sent from the Romans, and their Confederates King Attalus, the Rhodians, and Athenians, to treat with the Acheans; making promife, that they should have Corinth restored .. vnto them, if they would for fake the Macedonian. A Parliament of the Achains was held at Sieyon, to deliberate and resolue in this weightic case. Therein the Romans and their adherents defired the Acheans, to loyne with them in making warre vpon Philip. Contrariwife, the Embaffadours of Philip, whom he had also sent for this busines, admonishing the Acheans of their Alliance with the King, and of their faith due vnto him; requested them, that they would be contented to remaine as Neuters. This moderate request of Philips Embassadour, did no way aduance his Masters cause. Rather it game the Achaans to understand, That hee, who could be fatisfied with fo little at their hands, knew himfelfe vnable to gratifie them in anv reciprocall demand. Yet were there many in that great Councel; who remem- 20 bring the benefits of Philip and Antigonus, laboured earnefly for the prescruation of the ancient League. But in fine, the sense of late injuries, and expectation of like or worse from him in the future ; prenailed against the memorie of those old good turnes, which he, (and Antigonus before him) had partly fold vnto them, and partly had vsed as baites, whereby to allure them into absolute subjection. Neither was it perhaps of the least importance, That the Romans were strong, and likely to preuaile in the end. So after much altercation the Decree passed, That they should thenceforward renounce the Macedonian, and take part with his enemies in this war. With Attalus & the Rhodians : they forthwith entered into focietie with the Romans (because no League would be of force, vntill the Senate and People had approved 20 it) they forbore to decree any focietie at the present; vntill the returne of those Embaffadours from Rome, which they determined to fend thither of purpose, The Megalopolitans, Dymaans, & Argines, having done their best for the Macedonian, as by many respects they were bound; rose vp out of the Councell, and departed before the passing of the Decree, which they could not resist, nor yet with honestie thereto give affent. For this their good will, and greater which they shortly manifested, the Argines had folittle thanke ; that all the rest of the Acheans may be the better held excused, for escaping how they might, out of the hands of so fell a Prince.

Soone after this, vpon a folemne day at Arges, the affection of the Citizens difcouered it felfe fo plainly, in the shalle of Philip; that they which were his Partifans within the Towne, made no doubt of putting the Citie into his hands, if they might have any finall affishance. Philotele, a Licutenant of the Kings, lay then in Covinls; which he had manfully defended again the Romans and Attalia. Him the Conspirators drew to Arges: whither comming on a finden, and finding the Multitude readie to iowne with him; He casily compelled the Athana Carrison to quit

This getting of Argos, together with the good defence of Corimth and some other Townes, as it helped Philip a little in his reputation, so they gaue him hope to obtaine some good end by Treatie: whiles as yet with his honour he might seke it, and when (the Winter being now come on) a new Consoli would shortly be chosen; who should take the worke out of Titus his hands, if it were not concluded the soften: Who should take the worke out of Titus his hands, if it were not concluded the soften: Titus had the like respect who himselfe; and therefore thought it best, since more could not be done, to predipose things who a conclusion, for his owne reputation. The meeting was appointed to be held on the Sca-shore; in the Bay then called the Malian, or Lamian Bay, now (as is supposed) the Golfe of Ziton, in the Agean Sea, or Archipelago. Thither came Titus, with Aminander the Athamanian; an Embaffador of Attalus; the Admirail of Rhodes; and some Agents for the Atolians and Acheans, Philip had with him fome few of his owne Captaines, and Cycliadas, lately banished for his sake out of Achaia. He refused to come on shore: though fearing (as he faid) none but the immortall gods : yet mildoubting fome treacherie in the Stolians. The demands of Titus in behalfe of the Romans were, That he should fet all cities of Grecce at libertie ; deliuer vp to the Romans and their Confederates. all prisoners which he had of theirs, and Renegado's ; likewise whatsoeuer he held of theirs in Illyria; and what locuer about Greece or Afia he had gotten from Ptolemie then King of Agypt, after his fathers death. Attalus demanded restitution to be made entire, of Ships, Townes, and Temples, by him taken and spoiled in the late warre betweene them. The Rhodians would have againe the Countrie of Perea, lying ouer against their Iland; as also that hee should withdraw his Garrisons, out of divers Townes about the Hellespont, and other Hauens of their freinds. The Acheans defired restitution of Argos and Corinth: about the one of which they might, not vniutly, quarrell with him; the other had beene long his owne by their confent. The Atolians tooke vpon them angerly, as Patrons of Greece: willing him to depart out of it, euen out of the whole Countrie, leaving it free ; and withall to deli-20 uer vp vnto them, what souer he held that had at any time beene theirs, Neither were they here-withall content : but infolently declaymed against him , for that which he had lately done in Thessalie; corrupting (as they faid) the rewards of the victors, by destroying, when he was vanquished, those Townes which else they might haue gotten. To answer these malapert Atolians, Philip commanded his Gallie to row nearer the shore. But they began to plie him a fresh: telling him, that he must obey his betters; vnlesse he were able to defend himselfe by force of armes. He answered them, (as he was much given to gybing) with fundrie scoffes; and efpecially with one, which made the Roman Conful ynderstand, what manner of companions these Etolians were. For he said, That he had often dealt with them; as 30 likewise, the rest of the Greekes; desiring them to abrogate a wicked Law, which permitted them to take (poile from (poile: yet could be get no better an answer, than Execute. è that they would sooner take Atolia out of Atolia. Titus wondered what might be the Popp. 1.17. meaning of this strange Law. So the King told him, That they held it alaudable custome, as often as warre happened betweene their friends, to hold vp the quarrell by fending voluntaries to ferue on both fides, that should spoile both the one and the other. As for the libertie of Greece 3 He faid it was strange that the Atolians should be so carefull thereof, fince divers Tribes of their owne, which he there named, were indeed no Gracians: wherefore he would faine know, whether the Romans would give him leave to make flaves of those Atolians, which were no 40 Greekes. Titus hereat smiled: and was no whit offended, to heare the Ætolians well ratled vp; touching whom he began to understand, how odious they were in all the Countrie. As for that general demand of fetting all Greece at libertie; Philip acknowledged, that it might well beseeme the greatnesse of the Romans; though hee would also consider, what might beseeme his owne dignitie. But that the Atolians, Rhodians, and other pettic Estates, should thus presume, under countenance of the Romans, to take vpon them, asif by their great might hee should be hereunto compelled: it was, he said, a strange and ridiculous insolence. The Acheans he charged with much ingratitude : reciting against them some Decrees of their owne;

wherein they had loaden both Antigonus and him, with more than humane honors.

rinth, that he would turther deliberate with Tilm himfelfe. Thus he addressed himfelfe wholy to the Roman Generall : vnto whom if he could give satisfaction, he caredlittle for all the reft. With Attalus and the Rhodians, his late warre, (he faid) was

50 Neuerthelesse he said, that he would render Arges vnto them; but, as touching Co-

it was onely in helping Prufias, his fonne-in-law; neither did hee fee why they should rather seeke amends at his hands, than he at theirs. For whereas they complained, that, spoyling a Temple of Venus, hee had cut downe the Groue and pleafant walkes thereabouts : what could he doe more, than fend Gardiners thirher with yong Plants; if one King of another would fland to aske fuch recompence. Thus he iested the matter out: but offered neuerthelesse, in honour of the Romans. to giue backe the Region of Peranto the Rhodians; as likewife to Attalus, the Ships and Prisoners of his, whereof he had then possession. Thus ended that daies conference, because it was late: Philip requiring a nights leifure to thinke upon the Articles, which were many and he ill prouided of Counfaile, wherewith to aduife a- to bout them. For your being fo ill provided of counfaile, faid TITVS, you may even thank your selfe; as having murdered all your freinds, that were wont to adusse you faithfully. The next day Philip came not, vntill it was late at night : exculing his long flay by the waightinesse of the things propounded; whereon he could not suddenly tell how to resolue. But it was beleived, that hee thereby sought to abridge the Atolians of leifure to raile at him. And this was the more likely; for that hee defired conference in private with the Roman Generall. The fumme of his discourse, as Titus afterward related it, was, That he would give to the Acheans both Argos and Corinth; as also that he would render vnto Attalus and the Rhodians, what he had promised the day before; likewise to the Liolians that hee would grant some part of their de-20 mands; and to the Romans, what focuer they did challenge. This when Titus his affoicates heard, they exclaimed against it: saying, That if the King were suffered to retaine any thing in Greece, he would shortly get possession of all which hee now rendred vp. The noise that they made came to Philips care: who thereupon design red a third day of meeting; and protested, that if he could not perswade them, hee would fuffer himselfe to be perswaded by them. So the third day they met early in the morning : at what time the King entreated them all, that they would with fincere affection hearken vnto good offers of peace; and immediatly conclude it, if they could like well of those Conditions, which he had alreadic tendered; or other-wise, that they would make truce with him for the present, and let him send Embassadours to Rome, where hee would referre himselfe to the courtesse of the

This was cuen as Quintius would have it: who flood in doubt, leaft a new Conful might happen to defraud him of the honour, which hee expected by ending of the warre. So he casily prevailed with the rest, to affent hercunto : for a smuch as it was Winter, a time vnfit for feruice in the warre; and fince, without authoritie of the Senate, he should be vnable to proceed resolutely either in warre or peace. Further he willed them to fend their feuerall Embassadours to Rome : which intimating vnto the Senate what each of them required, should easily hinder Philip, from obtayning any thing to their preiudice. Among the rest he perswaded King Aminander, to make a journie to Rome in person : knowing wel, that the name of a King, together with the confluence of so many Embassadors, would serue to make his owne actions more glorious in the Citie. All this tended to procure, that his owne Command of the Armie in Greece might be prorogued. And to the same end had he dealt with some of the Tribunes of the people at Rome: who had alreadic (though as yet he knew not so much) obtained it for him, partly by their authoritie, partly by good reasons which they alleaged vnto the Senate.

The Embassadors of the Greekes, when they had audience at Rome, spake bitterly against the King, with good liking of the Senate; which was more desirous of victorie, than of satisfaction. They magnified the honourable purpose of the Romans, in vndertaking to fet Greece at libertie. But this (they fayd) could neuer be effected; vnleffe especiall care were taken, that the King should be dispossessed of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias. In this point they were so vehement, producing a Map of the Countrie, and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in seruilitie; that the Senate agreed to haue it even so as they desired. When therefore the Embaffadours of Philip were brought in, and began to have made a long Oration; they were breifly cut off in the middest of their Præface, with this one demand: Whether their Master would reeld up Corinth , Chalcis , and Demetrias : Hereto thev made answer. That, concerning those places, the King had given them no direction or Commission what to say, or doc. This was enough. The Senate would no longer hearken to Philips defire of peace; wherein they faid heedid no better than trifle. Yet might his Embassadours haue truly said, That neither the Etolians, Acheans, nor any of their fellowes, had in the late T reatic required by name, that Chalcis and Demetrias should be yeelded vp. For which of them indeed could make any Claime to either of these Townes ? As for Corinth, whereto the Achaans had fome right; (though their right were no better, than that, having stolne it from One Macedonian King in a night, they had, after mature deliberation, made it away by bargaine vnto an Other) Philip had alreadie condescended to give it backe vnto them. And this perhaps would have beene alleadged, even against the Greekes in excuse of the King, by some of T. Quintius his freinds; that so he might have had the honour to conclude the warre, if a Succeffor had beene decreed vnto him. But fince He was appointed to continue Generall: neither his freinds at Rome, nor Hee himselfe, after the returne of the Embassadours into Greece, cared to give eare vnto 20 any talke of peace.

Philip, feing that his Acheans had forfaken him, and joyned with their common enemies; thought even to deale with them in the like manner, by reconciling himfelfe ento Nabis, whom they hated most. There were not many yeares past, since the Lacedemonians under Cleomenes, with little other helpe than their owne frength, had been almost strong enough both for the Macedonians and Achaans together. But now the condition of things was altered. Nabis his force confided in a manner wholly in his Mercinaries: for he was a Tyrant; though stiling himselfe King. Yet he forely vexed the Acheans : and therefore feemed vnto Philip one likely to fland him in great stead, if he could be won. To this purpose it was thought meet, that 20 the Towne of Argos, which could not otherwise be easily defended, should be configned ouer into his hands; in hope, that fuch a benefit would ferue to tie him fast vnto the Macedonian . Philocles the Kings Lieutenant, who was appointed to deale with Nabis, added further, That it was his Masters purpose to make a streight alliance with the Lacedamonian, by giving some daughters of his owne in marriage vnto Nabis his fonnes. This could not but be well taken. Yet Nabis made some scruple in accepting the Towne of Argos; vnleffe by decree of the citizens themselues He might be called into it. Hereabont Philosles dealt with the Argines: but found them so auerse; that, in open assemblic of the people, they detested the verie name

40 of the Tyrant, with many railing words . Nabis hearing of this, thought hee had thereby a good occasion to rob and fleece them. So he willed Philodes, without more adoe, to make ouer the Towne which he was readie to receive. Philoeles accordingly did let him with his Armie into it by night; and gaue him poffession of the strongest places therein. Thus dealt Philip with the Argines : who for verie loue had for saken the Acheans, to take his part. Early in the morning, the Tyrant madehimselse Master of all the Gates. A few of the principall men, understanding how things went, fled out of the Citie at the first tumult. Wherefore they were all banished, and their goods confiscated. The rest of the chiefe Citizens that stated behind, were commanded to bring forth, out of hand, all their Gold and Silver. Alfo a great imposition of monie was laid vpon all those, that were thought able to pay it. Such as made their contribution readily, were difmiffed without more a-

doe. But if any flood long your the matter : or plaied the theines, in purloyning their owne goods, they were put to the whip, and, befides loffe of their wealth, bad their torments to boot. This done, the Tyrant began to make popular Lawes: namely fuch, as might ferue to make him gracious with the rafcall multitude: abrogating all debts, and dividing the Lands of the rich among the poore. By fuch are of oppressing the great ones, it hath beene an old custome of Tyrants, to assure themselves of the Vulgar for a time.

As soone as Nabis had gotten Arges, He sent the ne westo T. Quintius; and offered to joyne with him against Philip. Titus was glad of it: so as hee tooke the paines to croffe ouer the Streights into Peloponne/w, there to meet with Nabis. They had foone agreed (though King Attalus, who was prefent with the Conful made fome cauill touching Argos) and the Tyrant lent vnto the Romans fixe hundred of his Mercinaries of Crete: as also hee agreed with the Acheans, vpon a Truce for foure moneths, referring the finall conclusion of peace betweene them untill the Warre 10 of Philip should be ended, which after this continued not long.

A. XIIII.

The battaile at Cynoscophala, wherein PHILIP was vangui-Shed by T. QVINTIVS.

ITVS QVINTIVS, as soone as he understood that he was appointed to have Command of the Armie, without any other limitation of 20 time, than during the pleasure of the Senate; made all thinges readie for diligent pursuit of the Warre. The like did Philip: who having failed in his negotiation of peace, and no leffe failed in his hopes of getting Nabis to friend in that Warre; meant afterwardes wholly to relie vpon himfelfe.

Plut in vita T.

Titus had in his Armicabout fix and twentie thousand: and Philip a proportionable number. But neyther of them knew the others strength, or what his Enemie intended to doe. Onely Titus heard that Philip was in Theffalie; and thereupon addreffed himfelfe to feeke him out. They had like to have met vnawares, neare vnto the Citie of Phera: where the vant-courriers on both fides discovered each other: 30 and sent word thereof vnto their severall Captaines. But neither of them were overhaltic, to commit all to hazard vpon so short warning. The day following each of them fent out three hundred Horse, with as many light armed Foot, to make a better discouerie. These met, and fought a long while: returning finally backe into their feuerall Campes, with little aduantage vnto eyther fide. The Countrie about Phera was thicke fet with Trees; and otherwise full of Gardens and mud-wals; which made it unproper for feruice of the Macedonian Phalanx. Wherefore the King diflodged, intending to remoue back vnto Scotufa in the Frontier of Macedon; where he might be plentifully served with al necessaries. Titus coceiued aright his meaning: and therefore purposed also to march thither wards; were it onely to wast the Coun- 40 tric. There lay betweene them agreat ledge of hils, which hindered the one from knowing what course the other tooke. Neuerthelesse they encamped not farre afunder, both the first and the second night; though neyther of them understood what was become of the other. The third daic was verie tempessuous; and forced each of them to take up his lodging, where he found it, by chance. Then fent they forth discoucrers againe, in greater number than before. These meeting together, held a long fight, wherein at first the Macedonians had the worse, But Philip anon fent in such strong supply; that if the resistance of the Atolians had not beene desperare, the Romans their fellowes had beene driven backe into their Campe. Yet all relissance notwithstanding, the Miceconians prevailed : so that Titus himselfe was 50 fame to bring forth his Legions, that were not a little discouraged, by the defeat of all their Horfe, to animate those which were in flight.

It was altogether besides the Kings purpose, to put the fortune of a battaile in trust that day, with so much of his estate as might thereon depend. But the newes came to him thick and tumultuoully, how the enemies fled, and how the day was his own; if he could vse an occasion, the like whereof he should not often find. This caused him to alter his purpose: insomuch as he embattailed his men; and climbed vp those hils, which for that the knops thereon had some resemblance vnto Dogs heads, were called, by a word fignitying as much, Cynoscephala. As soone as he was on the hil-top; it did him good to see that they of his owne light armature were bufie in fight, almost at the verie Campe of the Enemies; whom they had repelled so farre. He had also libertie to choose his ground, as might serue best his aduantage: forasmuch as the Romans were quite driven from all parts of the Hill. But of this 10 commoditie hecould makeno great vie: the roughnesse of the place among those Dogsheads, as they were called, feruing nothing aptly for his Phalanx. Neuertheleffe hee found convenient roome, wherein to marshall the one part of his Armie: and gaue order vnto his Captaines, to follow with thereft; embattaling them as they might. Whilest hee was doing this: Hee perceived that his Horsemen and light armature beganne to shrinke; as being fallen vpon the Roman Legions, by force whereof they were driven to recoyle. He fets forward to helpe them: and they no leffe hastily draw vnt ohim for fuccour; having the Romans not farre behind

As the Legions beganne to climbe the Hill, Philip commanded those of his Pha-20 lanx to charge their pikes, and entertaine them. Here Titus found an extreme difficult peece of worke. For this Phalanx, being a great square battaile of armed pikes, like in all points to those which are now vsed in our moderne Warres: and being in like manner vsed, as are ours; was not to bee resisted by the Roman Targettiers, as long as the Phalanx it felfe held together undiffolued. The Macedonians were embattailed in verie close order: fo that two of them stood opposite to one of the Romans; as also the pikes of the first ranke, had their points advanced two or three foot before their fore-man. Wherfore it is no maruel, if the Rom ins gaue back: euerie one of them being troubled (as it were) with tenne enemies at once; and not able to come nearer vnto the next of them, than the length of a dozen foot or thereabout. Titus 20 finding this, and not knowing how to remedie it; was greatly troubled; for that fill the Phalanx bare downcall which came in the way. But in the meane while hee observed, That they which were appointed by Philip to make his left wing, were not able, through the much vneuennesse of the ground, to put themselves in order: fo as eyther they kept their places on the Hil-tops; or elfe (which was worfe) vpon defire eyther of beholding the pastime, or of seeming to bee partakers in the worke, ranne foolishly along by the side of their fellowes, which were occupied in fight.

Of this their disorder He made great and present vse. Hee caused the right wing of his Battaile to march vp the hill, against these il ordered troupes: his Elephants leading the way, to increase the terrour. The Macedonians were readier to dispute 40 what should bee done in such a case, than well aduised what to doe; as having no one man appointed, to comand that part in chiefe. Indeed if they should have done their best, it could not have served; since the ground whereon they stood, made their weapons vnvscfull. For let it be supposed, that Philip having six and twentie thousand in his Armie (as he is said to have beene equall to the Enemie in number) had foure thousand Horse, fourethousand Targettiers, and soure thousand lightarmed: fo shall there remaine fourteene thousand Pikes; whereof hee himselfe had embattailed the one halfe in a Phalanx; the other halfe in the left wing, are they whom Quintius is readie now to charge. The Phalanx having vivally fixteene in File, must, when it consisted of seuen thousand, have well neare source hunodred and fortic in ranke : but foure hundred would ferue , to make a Front long enough; the other fortie or feuen and thirtie Files might bee cut off, and reckoned in the number of the Targettiers, or light-armed. Allowing therefore, as Polybius doth, to eueric man of them three foot of ground: this Lib.17. Front must have occupied twelve hundred Foot, or two hundred and fortie paces; that is, verie nearea quarter of a mile in length. Such a space of open Champaine. free from incumbrance of Trees, Ditches, Hillocks, or the like impediments, that must of necessitie dilioyne this close battaile of the Phalanx; was not cucric where to be found. Here at Cynolcephale Philip had so much roome, as would onely suffice for the one halfe of his men : the rest were faine to stand still and looke about thems being hindred from putting themselues in order, by the roughnesse of the Dogges heads. But the Romans, to whom all grounds were much alike, were not hindered from comming vp vnto them; nor found any difficultie in mastring those enemies.

feeing the victorie on that part affured, left the profequation of it vnto others; and being followed by twentie Enlignes or Maniples, that is, (as they might fallout) by some two thousand men, tooke in hand a notable pecce of worke; and mainly helpfull to making of the Victorie complete. He confidered that Philip, in purfuing the right wing of the Romans, was runne on fo farre; as that himselfe with his fellowes, in mounting the Hill to charge the left wing of the Macedonians, was alreadie gotten aboue the Kings head. Wherefore hee turned to the left hand; and making downe the Hill after the Kings Phalanx, fell vpon it in the Rere. The hindmost rankes of the Phalanx, all of them indeed faue the first fine, were accustomed, 20 when the batailes came to joyning, to carrie their Pikes vpright; and with the whole weight of their bodies to thrust on their foremen; and so were they doing at the present. This was an other great inconvenience in the Macedonian Phalanx,

That it ferued neyther for offence nor defence, except onely in Front. For though it were so, that Alexander, when he was to fight with Darius in Mesopotamia, arranged his Phalang in fuch order, that all the foure fides of it were as fo many Fronts looking fundrie wayes, because hee expected that he should be encompassed round:

vet it is to be vnderstood, that herein he altered the vsuall forme; as also at the same time he embattailed his men in loofe order, that fo with case they might turne their 30 weapons, which way need should require. Likewise it is to be condered, That Alexanders men being thus disposed, were fit onely to keep their own ground; not being able to follow vpon the Enemie, vnleffe their hindmost rankes could have marched backwards. But in this present case of Philip, there was no such prouision for resiftance. Therefore his men, being otherwife vnable to helpe themselues, threw downe their weapons, and fled. The King him selfe had thought vntill now, that the fortune of the battaile was cuerie where alike, and the day his owne. But hearing the noyfe behind him, and turning a little afide with a troupe of Horfe, to fee

how all went: when he beheld his men casting downe their weapons, and the Remans at his backe on the higher ground; Hee presently betooke himselfe to flight.

Neyther staid he afterwards in any place (except onely a small while about Tempe there to collect such as were dispetsed in this ouerthrow) vntill hee was gotten into

T. QVINTIVS falleth out with the Etolians; and grantes truce unto PRILIP, with conditions, upon which the peace is ratified. Libertie proclaimed unto the Greeks. The Romans quarrell with ANTIOCH VS.

He Ætolians wonderfully vanted themselues; and desired to haue it noised through all Greece, That the victoric at Cynoscephale was gotten (in a manner) wholy by their valour. They had gotten indeed the most of the bootie; by sacking the Macedonian Campe, whilest the Romans were busied in the chace. Titus therefore being offended both at their vaineglorie, and at their rauenous condition; purposed to teach them better maners, by regarding them asslightly, as they thought highly of themfelites. He also well perceived, That by vsing them with any extraordinarie fauor, he should greatly offend the rest of his Contederates in Greece; who detested the Ætelians much more vehemently, than euer they had done the Macedonians. But 20 this displeasure brake not forth yet awhile.

After the battaile Titus made hast vnto Larissa, a Citic of Thessalie: which he prefently tooke. Before his comming, Philip had fent thither one of his Courtiers to burne all his letters, and passages whatsoeuer in writing, betwixthim and others. of which many were there kept. It was well done of the King, that among the cares of so much aduersitie, he forgot not to prouide for the safetie of his friends. Yet by his thus doing, they of Lariffa might well perceive, that he gave them as alreadie loft. Wherefore we finde not that they, or any of their neighbours, did make delay of opening their gates to Titus. At the same time, the Towne of Leucas bordering vpon Acarnania, was taken by the Roman Fleete: and verie soone after, all the 30 Acarnanians, a warlike Nation, and in hatred of the Etolians euer true to Philip; gaue up themselues unto the Romans, hearing of the victorie at Cynoscephala. The Rhodians also were then in hand with the conquest of Persa, a Region of the Continent over against their lland; whereof they had demanded restitution, in the late Treatie of peace with Philip. They did herein more manly, than any other of the Greekes: for a fmuch as they awaited not the good leifure of the Romans; but with an Armie of their owne, and some helpe which they borrowed of the Acheans and other their freinds, gaue battaile to Dinocrates the Kings Leiutenant, wherein they had the victorie, and consequently recoursed the whole Province. It angred Philip worse than all this, that the Dardanians gathered courage out of his affliction, to inuadehis Kingdome; washing and spoiling, as if all had beene abandoned to their discretion. This made him gather an Armie in all hast, of fix thousand foot and fiue hundred horse: wherewith comming vpon them, he draue them, with little or no losse of his owne, and great slaughter of theirs, hastily out of the Kingdome. Which done, He returned to Thessalonica.

In this one enterprise He had successe answerable to his desire: but seeing what bad fortune accompanied his affaires, in all other parts at the same time, he thought it wisedome to yeeld vnto neceffitie; and therefore sent in all hast Limneus and Demosthenes, with Cycliadas the banished Achean, in whom hee reposed much confidence, Embassadours vnto Titus. These had conference a long while in private, 50 with Titus and some of his Roman Colonels : by whom they were gently entertained, and in verie freindly wife dismissed. It seemes that they had Commission, to referre all vnto Titus his owne discretion; as Philip himselfe in few daies after did. There was granted vnto them a Truce for fifteene daies: in which time, the King himselfe might come and speake with the Roman General. In the meane scason manie fuspitious rumors went of Titus; as if he had been corrupted with great rewards from the King, to betray the Greekes his Confederates. Of these bruits the Aton lians were chief authors: who being wont to regardneither freindship nor honestie. where profit led them a wrong way, judged a like of all men elfe. But against the day appointed for the meeting betwixt him and Philip, Titus had fent letters vnto his Affociates; willing them to have their Agents readie by a time appointed, at the entrance of Tempe, where the Treatic should be held. There when they were all affembled, they entred into confultation before the Kings arrivall, what should be most expedient for the common benefit of them all, and for every Estate in particular. The poore King Aminander befought them all, and especially the Romans, that 10 they would think vpon him; and confidering his weaknes which he confessed, make fuch provision, that after the Romans had turned their backs, and were gone home. Philip might not wreake his anger you him who was not able to refif. Then fooke Alexander one of the Atolians: who commending Titus for so much as he had thus affembled the Confederates to aduife upon their owne good, and had willed them to deliver their mindes freely; added, That in the maine of the purpose which hee had in hand, he was vtterly deceined: for that by making peace with Philip, hee could neither affure the Romans of their quiet, nor the Greeks of their libertie. There was, he faid, none other end to be made of the war, which could agree either with the purpose of the Senate and People of Rome, or with the faire promises made by 20 Titus himselfe vnto the Greeks, than the chacing of Philip quite out of his Kingdome. And to this effect he made a long discourse. But Titus answered. That this . Atolian was ill acquainted, either with the good pleafure of the Senate and People of Rome, or with the laudable customes which they generally held : for that it was not the manner of the Romans, to feeke the vtter deliruction of any King or Nation, at fuch time as they first made warre with them; vntill by some rebellion they found it a matter of necessitie, to take such a rigorous course. And hereof he alleaged the Carthaginians as a notable example : adding, That victorie, to generous mindes, was onely an inducement vnto moderation. As concerning the publik benefit of Greece: it was (he faid) expedient, that the Kingdome of Macedon should be greatly weak- 20 ned and brought low; not that it should be vtterly destroicd; forasmuch as it ferued as a barre, to the Thracians, Gaules, and a multitude of other fauage Nations, which would foone ouerflow the whole Continent of Greece, if this kingdome were not interposed. Wherefore he concluded, that if Philip would yeeld vnto those demands, wherewith he had preffed him in the former Treatie; then was there no reason to denie him peace. As for the Atolians: if they thought otherwise, it should be at their owne pleasure, to take counsaile apart for themselves as they thought good. Then began Phaneas, another of the Atolians, to fav. That all was come to nothing; for that cre long, Philip would trouble all the Greekes, no leffe than hee had done in time before . But Titus interrupted him, and bad him leave his babling; faying, T hat himfelfe would take fuch order, as that Philip, were he neuer fo delirous, should thenceforth not have it in his power to molest the Greekes.

The next day King Philip came thither: whom Titus vsed freindly; and suffering him to repose himselfe that night, held a Councell the day sollowing; wherein the King yeelded unto all that had beene required at his hands; offering yet further, to stand to the good pleasure of the Senate, if they would have more added to the Conditions. Phaneas the Atolian, infulting oner him, faid it was to bee hoped, that he would then at length give vo to the Liolians a many of townes (which he there named) bidding him speake, whether he would, or not. His answer was, that they might take them all. But Titus interpofing himselse, said it should be otherwise; 50 These were Thessalian Townes, and should all be free: one of them onely excepted, which not long agoe had refused to commit it selfe to the faith of the Romans, and therefore should now be given to the Atolians. Hereat Phaneas cried out that it was too great an injurie, thus to defraud them of the Townes that had sometime belonged belonged vnto their Common-weale. Rather he willed Titus to confider that by an ancient Couenant betweene them and the Romans, all the Townes taken ought to be their owne, and the Romans to have nothing faue the pillage and captines. It is true, that there had beene such a Condition in the former warre; but it ceased to he of any validitie, as foone as the Ætolians made peace with Philip. And thus much Titus gave them to vnderstand; asking them whether they thought it resonable, that all the Townes in Greece, which had let in the Romans by composition, should be delinered into Subjection of the Atolians. The rest of the Confederates were verie much delighted, with these angrie passages betweene the Roman and the Atolians: neither had they great reason, to feare any hard measure; since Titus was so earnest in behalfe of those Thessalians, to give them libertie, though they had stood out against him, even till verie feare made them open their gates. Wherefore they opposed not themselves : but gave their consent willingly vnto a Truce for source

CHAP.4. S.15. of the Hiftorie of the World.

The chiefe cause that moved Titus to grant peace so readily to the Macedonian. belides that laudable custome by him before alleadged; was, the fame of Antiochus his comming with an Armie from Syria, and drawing necretoward Europe. He had also perhaps yet a greater motine; even the consideration that his successor might happen to defraud him of the honour, if the warre should happen to be protracted. And hee was in the right. For when his letters, together with Embassadours from the Macedonian, and fundrie States of Greece, came vnto Rome, new Confuls were chosen: who, (especially the one of them) stood verie carnestly against the peace; alleading friuolous matter of their owne suspition, in hope to get the honour of concluding the warre. The Senate began to be doubtfully affected, between the Embassadors of Philip offering to stand to what soener was demanded. and the letters of Titus preffing them to accept this offer, on the one fide; and the importunitie of the Conful on the other; who faid, that all these goodly shewes were fraudulent, and that the King would rebell, as foone as the Armie was called out of Greece. But the matter was taken out of the Senatours hands by two of the Tribunes, that referred it to an Affemblie of the People: by whose sourciene authoritie it was concluded, That Peace should be granted vnto the King. So ten Embaffadors were fent from Rome ouer into Greece : in which number were they. that had beene Confuls before Titus: and it was ordained by their advice. That Titus should goe through with the businesse of Peace. These would verie faine haue retained those three important Cities of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias, vntill the state of Greece were somewhat better setled. But finally Titus prevailed so, that Corinth was (though not immediately) rendred vnto the Acheans; and all the other Greeke Townes which Philip held, as well in Alis as in Greece, restored vnto

The Conditions of the Peace granted vnto Philip, were. That before the celebration of the next * Ishmian Games, He should withdraw his Garrisons out of al the * Politices. Hereto *Linie addes, That he was for *Lin.L.381 bidden to make war out of Macedon, without permission of the Senate. But I finde not that he observed this Article, or was at any time charged with the breach of it. Foure hundered talents hee had alreadie deliuered vnto Titus, together with his yonger sonne Demetrius, to remaine as hostage for his true dealing in this matter of peace, at fuch time as he lately fent his Embassadours to Rome: when it was promiled, that the monie, and his sonne, should be restored backe vnto him, if the Senate were not pleased with the agreement. Whether this monie were reckoned as Hhhhhh part of the thousand talents, I cannot find: and it seemeth otherwise, for as much as yong Demetrius, who together with those fourchundred Talents was given for hoflage, remained fill in custodie of the Romans, as a part of the bargaine which Titus formerly had made. Letters also were then sent by Titus vnto Prusias King of Bithrnia: giuing him to vnderstand, what agreement was made with Philip in behalfe of the Greekes; and how the Senate held it reasonable, that the Ciani, most miserably spoiled and oppressed by Philip to gratifie this Bythinian his sonne-in-law, should be restored to libertie; and permitted to enjoy the same benefit of the Romans, which other of their Nation did. What effect these letters wrought it was not greatly materially fince the Romans were shortly busied with Antiochas, in such wife that they in had not leifure, to examine the conformitie of Prufias to their wil.

Al Greece rejoyced at the good bargaine, which Titus had made with Philip. Onely the . A tolians found themselves agreived that they were veterly neglected; which was to the rest no smal part of their contentment. The Bactians continued to fauour the Macedonian; and thereby occasioned much trouble vnto themselues. There were fome among them wel-affected to the Romans: who feeing how thinges were like to goe, made their complaint vnto Titus; faying, that they were no better than loft, for the good will which they had borne vnto him; vnleffe at this time, when he lay close by them with his Armie, their Prætor which was head of the opposite Faction might be made away. Titus refused to have an hand in the execution, yet 20 nevertheleffe did animate them in their purpose. So they committed the fact, and hoped to have kept themselves vidiscovered. But when the murder came out. and somewhat was confessed by those that were put to torture: the hatred of the people brake out violently against the Romans; in such wise, that howsoeuer they durft not take armes against them, yet such of them as they found stragling from their Campe, they murdered in all parts of the Countrie. This was detected within awhile, and many of the dead bodies found. Herevpon Titus requires of the Baotians, to have the murderers delivered into his hands; and for five hundred fouldiors, which he had loft by them, to have paid vnto him five hundred Talents. In flead of making any such amends, they paid him with excuses which he would not take as good satisfaction. He sends Embassadours to the Acheans and Athenians, informing them what had happened; and requested them not to take it amisse, though he dealt with these their friends as they had descrued. Herewithal he fals to wasting their Countrie; and beliegeth two fuch Townes of theirs, as did fecme to be most culpable of the murders lately done. But the Embassadours of the Acheens and Athenians, (especially of the Achaans who offered, if hee needed them, to helpe him in this war; yet befought him rather to grant peace vnto the Baotians) prevailed fo farre with him; that he was pacified with thirtie Talents, and the punishment of fuch as were knowne offendors.

In like fort, though not so violently, were many States of Greece distracted: some among them rejoycing that they were free from the Macedonian; others greatly doubting, that the Roman would proue a worfe neighbour. The Atolians would have been glad of any Commotion; and therefore published rumors abroad, That it was the purpose of the Romans, to keepe in their owne handes all those places, wherein Philip lately had his Garrisons. Little did they, or the rest of the Greekes, conceiue, that this Macedonian Warre served as an introduction to the Warre to be made in Afia against King Antiochus; where grew the fruit, that was to bee reaped of this and manie other victories. Wherefore to stay the progresse of bad rumors, when the Isthmian games were held, which in timeof peace were never without great folemnitie and concourse: Titus in that great assembly of all Greece, caufed proclamation to be made by found of Trumpetto this effect, That the Senate 59 and people of Rome, and Titus Quintius Flaminius the Generall, having vanquished King Philip and the Macedonians, did wil to be at libertie, free from Impositions, free from Garrisons, and living at their owne Lawes, the Corinthians, Phocians, Locrians, Eubwans, Acheans of Phthiotis, Magnetians, Theslalians, and Perrhabians. The suddennesse of this Proclamation assonished men: so as though they applauded it with a great flout; yet presently they cried out to heare it againe, as if they durit scarce credit their own cares. The Greeks were Crafts-masters in the Art of giving thankes; which they rendred now to T. Quintius with fo great affection, as that they had welneare (mothered him, by thronging officiously about him.

This good will of all the Greekes, was like to bee much more availeable vnto the Romans in their warre against Antiochus, than could have beene the possession of a few Townes, yea or of all those Prouinces which were named in their Proclamation. Vpon confidence hereof; no fooner were thefe Isthmian games at an end, than Titus, with the Romans that were of his Councell, gaue audience to Hegelianax and Lyfias King Antiochus his Embassadours: whom they willed to signific vnto their Lord, That he should doe well to abstaine from the free Cities in Asia, and not vex them with warre: as also to restore what some he had occupied, belonging to the Kings, Ptolemie or Philip. Moreover they willed him by these his Embassadours, that he should not passe ouer his Armie into Europe; adding, That some of them would visit him in person cre it were long, to talke with him further concerning these points. This done, they fell to accomplishing their promises unto the Greekess to the rest they gaue what they had promised. But the Phoeians and Locrians they gaue vnto the Atolians; whom they thought it no wisedome to offend ouer-much, being shortly to take a greater worke in hand. The Acheans of Phthiotis they annexed vnto the The falians; all faue the Towne of Thebes in Phthiotis, the same which had been abandoned by T. Quintius to the Atolians in the last Treatie with Philip. The Atolians contended verice earnest about Phar salus and Leucas. But they were put off with a dilatoric answere, and rejected vnto the Senate: for how soeuer somewhat the Councell might fauour them; yet was it not meet that they should have their will, as it were in despight of Titus. So the Acheans were restored Corintle, Triphylia, and Herea. So the Corinthians were made free indeede (though the Romans yet awhile kept the Acrocorinthus) for that all which were partakers of the 20 Achaan Commonwealth, enjoyed their libertie in as absolute manner, as they coulde defire. To Plearatus the Illyrian were given one or two places, taken by the Romans from Philip : and vpon Aminander were bestowed those Castles, which hee had gotten from Philip during this Warre; to reigne in them and the grounds which they commanded, as he did among his Athamanians. The Rhodians had bin their owne Carners, Attalus was dead a little before the Victorie; and therefore loft his share. Yet many that were with Titus in Councell, would have given the Townes of Oreum and Eretria, in the Ile of Eubwa, to his sonne and successour King Eumenes. But finally it was concluded, that these as well as the rest of the Eubwans, should bee suffered to enjoy their libertie. Orestis, a little Province of the Kingdome of Macedon, bordering on Epirus, and lying towards the Ionian Sea. had veilded vnto the Romans long ere this, and fince continued true to them : for which cause it was also set at libertie, and made a free Estate by it selfe. These businesses being dispatcht; it remained, that all care should be vied, not howto avoid the war with King Antiochus, but how to accomplish it with most case and prosperitie. Wherefore Embassadours were sent both to Antiochus himfelfe, to pick matter of quarrell; and about vnto others, to prædifpose them vnto the affilling of the Romans therein. What ground and matter of Warre against this King the Remans now had, or shortly after found : as also how their Embassadours and Agents dealt and sped abroad; I referre vnto another place.

What Kinges, of the races of SELEVOVS and PTOLEMIE, raigned in Asia and Agypt before Antiochusthe great.

ELEVEYS NICATOR, the first of his race, King of Alia and Syria, died in the end of the hundred twentie and fourth Olympiad. Hee wastrecheroufly flaine by Ptolemie Ceraunus, at an Altar called Argos; hauing (as is faid) beene warned before by an Ora- 20 cle, to beware of virgos, as the fatall place of his death. But I neuer have read that any mans life hath beene preferred, or any mischance avoided, by the predictions of fuch Deuilish Oracles. Rather Ibeleene, That many such predictions of the Heathen Gods, have beene ante-dated by their Priests or by others; which deutled them after the event.

Antiochus Soter, the sonne and heire of this Seleucus, was dearely beloued of his Father; who furrendred vp vnto him his owne wife Stratonica, when hee vnderflood how much the young Prince was enamoured on her. Wherefore Ptolemie Ce- 30 raunus had great caufe to feare, that the death of Seleucus would not be vnreuenged by this his Successor. But Antiochus was contented to be pacified, cyther with gifts, or perhaps onely with faire words; containing himselfe within Asia, and letting Cerannus enjoy that quietly, which he had purchased in Europe with the bloud of Seleu-GMI. It is faid of this Antiochus, that although he married with the Queen Stratonica in his Fathers life, yet out of modestie he forbore to embrace her, till his Father was dead. So that perhaps his incestuous loue was partly, if not chiefly, the cause of his not profecuting that reuenge; whereunto Nature should have vrged him. Afterwards he had warres with Antigonus Gonatas, and with Nicomedes King of Bithynia. Alfo Lutarius and Leonorius, Kings or Captaines of the Gaules, were fet voon him by 40 the same Nicomedes. With these he fought agreat battaile; wherein though otherwife the Enemies had all advantage against him; yet by the terror of his Elephants, which affrighted both their Horses and them, he wonne the Victorie. Hee tooke in hand an enterprise against Ptolemie Philadelphus: but finding ill successe in the beginning, he foone gaue it ouer. To this King Antiochus Soter it was, that Berofus the Genebrard, lib. 2. Chald.can dedicated his Historic of the Kings of Affyria; the same, which hath since beene excellently fallified by the Friar Annius. He left behind him one sonne, called Antiochus Theos; and one daughter, called Apame, that was married unto the King of Cyrene. So he died about the end of the hundred twentie and ninth Olympiad, or the beginning of the Olympiad following, in the fiftieth or one and fiftieth yeare of the Kingdome of the Greekes; when he had raigned nineteene yeares.

Antiochus, furnamed Theos or the god, had this vaine and impious title given vnto him, by flatteric of the Milesians; whom hee deliucred from Timarchus, a Tyrant that oppressed them. Heleld long and difficult, but fruitlesse, warre with Ptolemie CHAP.5. S.I. of the Historie of the World.

Philadelphus King of £gypt; which finally he compounded, by taking to wife Berenice the daughter of Ptolemie.

Of these two Kings, and of this Ladie Berenice, Saint Hierome and other Interpreters have understod that Prophecie of DANIEL: The Kings daughter of the Dan.c.11.0.6. South, Shall come to the King of the North, to make an agreement; and that which fol-

Ptolemie Philadelphus was a great louer of Peace and Learning; and (fetting apart his incestuous marriage with his owne fifter Arlinge) a verie excellent Prince: howfocuer, the worthiest of all that race. It was Hee, that built and furnished with Bookes, that famous Librarie in Alexandria: which to adorne, and to honour the more, He sent vnto Eleazar then high Priest of the Iewes for the Bookes of Moses and other Scriptures. The benefits of this King vnto the Iewes, had formerly bin verie great: for He had fet at libertie as many of them, as his Father held in flauerie throughout all Agypt; and hee had fent vnto the * Temple of God in Hierusalem * Aug.de (in verie rich Presents. Wherefore Eleazar yeelding to the Kings desire, presented him with an Hebrew coppie: which Ptolemie caused to be translated into Greeke, by seuentie two of the most grave and learned persons, that could bee found among all the Tribes. In this number of the feuentie two Interpreters, or (as they are comonly called)the Seventie; Iesus the sonne of Sirach; is thought by Genebrard to have beene one: who that he liued in this Age, it seemes to me verie sufficiently proued by Ianfenius, in his preface vnto Ecclesiasticus. The whole passage of this businesse between Philadelphus and the High Pricst, was written (as h sosephus affirmes) by Arist aus that was employed therein. Portic yeares Ptolemie Philadelphus was King reckoning the that Booke time wherein he iountly reigned with his Father. He was exceedingly beloued of his people; and highly magnified by Poets, and other Writers. Towardes his end hee grew more voluptuous, than hee had beene in his former yeares in which time he boafted, that hee alone had found out the way how to live for ever. If this had beene referred vnto his honourable deeds, it might have flood with reason: o. reft Lodonicus therwise, the Gowt, with which he was often troubled, was enough to teach him his owne errour. He was the first of the Kings, derived from Alexanders Successors; that entred into League with the Romans: as also his Off-spring was the last among those Royall Families, which by them was rooted vp. Antiochus Theos had another wife, called Laodice, at fuch time as he married with if it were to be Berenice the daughter of this Ptolemie. After his fecond marriage, hee vied his first wife with no better regard, than if thee had beene his Concubine. Landice hated him for this: yet aduentured not to feek renenge; untill her own some Selencus Callinieus, was of abilitie to be King. This was two or three yeares after the death of Ptolemie Philadelphus: at what time shee poysoned her husband Theos; and by permission of Seleucus her sonne, murdered Berenice, together with a sonne that shee of it is come had borne to Antiochus, Iustine reports, that Berenice faued herselfe, together with the yong Prince her child, awhile in the Sanctuarie at Daphne: and that not onely forme Cities of Asia prepared to succour her, but her brother Ptolemie Euergetes, King of Leyot, came to rescue her with an Armie; though too late, for she was flaine be-his wicked nature; which they discouered in his first entrance. Wherefore it was at Colen. An like, that his Effate would have beene much endangered, if Ptolemie Euergetes, who Iufl.L.a76 came against him, had not beene drawne backe into his owne Countrie, by some Commotions there in hand. For there were none that would beare armes against Ptolemie, in defence of their owne King: but rather they fided with the Agyptian; who tooke Laodice the Kings mother, and rewarded her with death as she had well descrued. Wherefore Seleucus, being freed from this invasion, by occasion of those domesticall troubles which recalled Energetes home into Egypt, went about a dangerous peece of worke, euen to make Warre voon his owne subjects because of their bad affection towards him; when as it had beene much better, by well deferuing, to have changed their hatred into love. A great Fleet hee prepared : in furnishing and manning whereof he was at such charges, that hee scarce left himselfe any other hope, if that should miscarrie. Herein hee embarqued himselfe; and, putting to Sea, met with fuch a tempelt, as denoured all faue himfelfe, and a verie few of his friends that hardly escaped. This calamitic, having left him nothing else in a maner than his naked bodie, turned neuertheleffe to his great good; as anon after it feemed. For when his Subjects understood, in what for the Gods (as they conceived it) had punished him for his offences: they had commiseration of his estate; and, 10 prefuming that hee would thenceforth become a new man, offered him their feruice with great alacritic. This revived him, and filled him with fuch foirit; as thinking himselfe well enough able to deale with the Agyptian, he made readic a mightie Armie for that purpose. But his fortune was no better at Land, than it had beene at Sea. He was vanquished by Ptolemie in a great bataile; whence he escaped hardly; no better attended, than after his late shipwrack. Hasting therefore backe to Antioch, and fearing that the Enemic would foone be at his heeles; He wrote vnto his brother Antiochus Hierax, who lay then in Asia, praying him to bring succour with all speed; and promising, in recompence of his faith and diligence, the Dominion of a great part of Alia. Antiochus was then but fourteene yeares olde, yet ex- 20 tremely ambitious; and therefore glad of fuch an occasion to make himselfe great. He leuied a mightic Armie of the Gaules; wherewith he fet for wards to helpe his brother; or rather to get what he could for himselfe. Hereof Ptolemie being aduertifed: and having no defire to put him felfe in danger more than needed tooke Truce with Seleneus for tenne yeares. No sooner was Seleneus freed from this care of the Aevptian warre, but his brother Antiochus came voon him; and needs would fight with him, as knowing himfelfe to haue the better Armie. So Seleucus was vanquifhed againe; and faued himfelfe, with fo few about him, that hee was verily fuppofed to have perisht in the battaile. Thus did Gods justice take revenge of those murders, by which the Crowneiwas purchased; and settled (as might have beene 20 thought) on the head of this bloudie King. Antiochus was glad to heare of his brothers death; as if thereby hee had purchased his hearts delire. But the Gaules, his Mercinaries, were gladder than He. For when he led them against Eumenes King of Pergamus, in hope to get honour by making a Conquest in the beginning of his Reigne: these perfidious Barbarrans tooke counsaile against him; and denised how to strippe him of all that hee had. They thought it verie likely, that if there were none of the Royall house to make head against them; it would be in their power, to doe what should best bee pleasing to themselves, in the lower Asia. Wherefore they laid hands on Antiochus, and enforced him to ransome himselfe with monic, as if he had beene their lawfull Prisoner. Neither were they so contented; but made him enter into such Composition with them, as tended little to his honour. In the meane while Seleucus had gathered a new Armie; and prepared once more to tric his fortune against his brother. Eumenes hearing of this, thought the season fit for himselfe, to make his profit of their discord. Antiochus fought with him, and was beaten: which is no great meruaile; fince he had great reason to stand in no leffe feare of the Gaules his owne fouldiers, than of the enemie with whom hee had to deale. After this, Eumenes wanne much in Asia; whilest Antiochus went against his brother. In the second battaile, fought betweene the brethren, Seleucus had the vpper hand: and Antiochus Hierax or the Hawke, (which furname was given him, because he sought his prey vpon cuerie one, without care whether hee were prouoked or not) foared away as farre as he could, both from his brother, and from his owne 50 Gaules. Having fetcht a great compasse through Mesopotamia and Armenia, He fell at length in Cappadocia; where his father in law King Artamenes tooke him vp. Hee was entertained verie louingly in outward shew; but with a meaning to betray him.

This he foone perceived : and therefore betooke him to his wings againe; though he knew not well, which way to bend his flight. At length he resolved to bestow himselfe your Ptolemie; his owne conscience telling him, what cuill he had meant vnto Seleucus, his brother; and therefore what little good he was reciprocally to expect at his hands. Infidelitie can finde no fure harbour. Ptolemie well vnderstood the perfidious and turbulent nature of this Hierax . Wherefore he laid him vp in close prison: whence though by meanes of an harlot hee got out; yet flying from his keepers, he fell into the handsoftheeues, by whom he was murdered. Neare about the same time died Selencus. The Parthians and Bactrians had rebelled against him, during his warres with his brother. Hee therefore made a journie against Arfaces founder of the Parthian kingdome: wherein his euill fortune, or rather Gods vengeance, adhered to closely to him, that he was take prisoner. Ar faces dealt freindly with him, and dismissed him, having every way given him royall entertainment: but in returning home, he brake his necke by a fail from his horse, and so ended his vnhappie reigne of twentie yeeres. He had to wife Laodice, the fifter of Andromachus one of his most trustie Captaines: which was father vnto that Acheus, who making his aduantage of this affinitie, became shortly after (as he stilled himself) a kings though rather indeed, a great troubler of the world in those parts. By Laodice hee had two fonnes ; Seleucus the third , furnamed Ceraunus ; and Antiochus the third. called afterwards the Great.

Seleucus Ceraunus reigned onely three yeeres : in which time he made war vpon Attalus the first, that was King of Pergamus. Being weake of bodie through lickneffe, and in want of monic, He could not keepe his men of war in good order: and finally he was flaine by treason of Nicanor, and Apaturius a Gaule. His death was reuenged by Achaus, who flue the Traitors, and tooke charge of the Armic: which he ruled verie wifely, and faithfully a while; Antiochiu, the brother of Selencius, being then a Child.

CHAP.5. $ 2.

NTIOCHYS was scarcely fifteene yeeres old, when hee began his reigne, which lasted fix and thirtie yeeres. In his Minoritie, Hee was wholy gouerned by one Hermins, an ambitious man; and one which maligned all vertue, that hee found in any of the Kings faithfull fermins. uants. This vilde qualitie in a Counfailor of such great place, how harmefull it was vnto his Lord, and finally vnto himfelfe; the successe of things wil fhortly discouer.

Soone after the beginning of Antiochus his reigne, Ptolemie Euergetes King of Ægypt died; and left his heire Ptolemie Philopator, a yong boy likewise, as hath elf-50 where beene remembred. This was that Euergetes, who releined Aratus and the Acheans : who afterwards tooke part with Cleomenes ; and louingly entertained him, when he was chaced out of Greece by Antigonus Gonatas. He annexed vnto his Dominion the Kingdome of Cyrene; by taking to wife Berenice, the daughter of King Magas. He was the third of the Ptolemies; and the last good King of the race.

The name of Euergetes, or the doer of good, was given him by the Agyptians; not fo much for the great spoiles which hee brought home, after his victories in Syria: as for that he recoursed some of those Images or Idols, which Cambyles, when hee conquered . Levpt, had carried into Persia. He was readie to have made war vpon the lewes, for that Onias their high Priest, out of meere couetousnes of monie, refufed to pay vnto him his veerely tribute of twentie talents: but he was pacified by the wisedome of Josephus a Jew; vnto whom afterwards he let in farme the Tribures and Customes, that belonged vnto him, in those parts of Syria which he held. For Calefyria, with Palastina and all those parts of the Countrie that lay nearest vnto Leypt, were held by the Leyptian; either as having fallen to the share of Ptole- 10 mie the first, at such time as the great Antigonus was vanquished and slaine in the battaile at Ipfus; or as being won by this Energetes, in the troublesome and vnhappie reigne of Seleucus Callinicus. The victories of this Euergetes in Syria, with the contentions that lasted for many succeeding ages between the Ptolemies and the Seleucida; were all foretold by Daniel in the Prophecie before cited, which is expounded by S. Hierome. This Ptolemie Euergetes reigned fix and twentic yeeres; and died towards the end of the hundred thirtie and ninth Olympiad . It may feeme by that, which we finde in the Prologue vnto Iefus the fonne of Sirach his booke, that he should have reigned a much longer time. For Stracides there faith, that he came into Fernt in the eight and thirtith yeere, when Euergetes was King. It may there- 20 fore be, That either this King reigned long together with his father: or that those eight and thirtie yeeres, were the yeeres of Jefus his owne age; if not perhaps reckoned (as the Jewes did otherwhiles reckon) from some notable accident that had

Not long after the death of Euergetes: Hermias the Counfailor, and in a manner the Protectour of King Antiochus, incited his Lord vnto warre against the Egyptian; for the recoucite of Calefyria and the Countries adjoyning. This counfaile was verie vnscasonably giuen; when Molo, the Kings Lieutenant in Media, was broken out into rebellion, and fought to make himselfe absolute Lord of that rich Countric. Neuerthelesse Hermias, being more froward than wife, maintained stiffy, that 30 it was most expedient, and agreeable with the Kings honour, to fend forth against a rebellious Captain other Captaines that were faithful; whileft He in person made warre vpon one, that was like him felfe a King. No man durst gainfay the refolution of Hermias; who therfore fent Xenætas an Achaan, with fuch forces as he thought expedient, against the Rebell; whilest in the meane season an Armie was preparing for the Kings Expedition into Calefyria. The King having marched from Apamea to Landicea, and so over the Desarts into the Vallie of Marsyas, between the Mountaines of Libanus and Anti-libanus; found his way there stopped by Theodotus an Atolian, that served vnder Ptolemie. So hee consumed the time there awhile to none effect : and then came newes, that Xenatas, his Captaine, was destroied with his 40 whole Armie; and Molo thereby become Lord of all the Countrie, as farre as vnto

Avaetas, whileft he was yet on his iournie, and drew neare to the Riuer of Tigris; received many advertifements, by fuch as fied over vnto him from the Enemie, That the followers of 300 were, for the most part, against their wils, drawne by their Commander to beare armes against the King. This report was not altogether falle; but Molo him felfeshood in some doubtlesh his followers would leauce him in time of necessifier. Avmetas therefore making shew, as if he had prepared to passe the River by Botes in face of his Enemie: left in the night time such as he thought meet to desend his Campe; and with all the floure of his Armie went over Tigris, in a place ten miles lower than Molo his Campe, Abolo heard of this, and sent forth his horse to give impediment: but hearing that Xemetas could not so be shopped. He himself disologed, and tooke his iournie towards Media; leaving all his baggage behind him in his Campe. Whether he did this, as distrusting the faith of his owne fouldiours : or whether thereby to deceive his Enemie ; the great follie of Xenwiss made his stratageme prosperous. For Xenætas, having borne himselfe proudly before, you the countenance of Hermias by whomhe was advanced vnto this charge; did now presume, that all should give way to his authoritie, without putting him to much trouble of vling the fword. Wherefore he fuffered his men to feati, with the prouisions which they found readie in the forfaken Campe: or rather hee commanded them fo to doe, by making Proclamation, That they should cherish vp themselves against the journie, which hee intended to take next day, in pursuit of the Rebels that fled. And to the same purpose he busied himselfe, in transporting 10 the remainder of his Armie, which he had left on the other fide of Tigris. But Siglo went no further that day, than bee could eafily returne the same night. Wherefore ynderstanding what good rule the Kings men kept : hee made such hast backe vnto them, that hee came vpon them early in the morning; whileft they were vet heatie with the wine and other good cheare, that they had spent at supper. So Xenatasand a verie few about him, died fighting in defence of the Campe: the reft were flaughtered, without making reliftance; and many of them, ere they were perfectly awake. Likewise the Campe on the other side of Tigris, was easily taken by Molo: the Captaines flying thence, to faue their owne lines. In the heat of this victorie, the Rebell marched vnto Seleucia, which he prefently tooke : and, mafre-

20 ring within a little while the Prouice of Babylonia, and all the Countrie downer to the Red Sea, or Bayof Perfia. Hebafted vnto Sufa; where at his first comming hee wan the Citie: but failing to take the Callle that was exceeding strong, returned backet or Selencia, there to giue order concerning this busines.

The report of these things comming to Intiochus, whilest he lay (as is said before) in the Vale of Mar/yas; filled him with great forrow, and his Campe with trouble. He tooke counfaile what to doe in this needfull case; and was well aduised by Epigenes the best man of warre he had about him, to let alone this Enterprise of Calefyria; and bend his forces thither, where more neede required them. This counfaile was put in execution with all conucnient bast. Yet was Epigenes dismissed by the way, and soone after slaine, by the practise of Hermias; who could not endure to heare good counfaile ginen, contrarie to his owne good liking and allowance. In the journie against Mole, the name and presence of the King was more available, than any oddes which hee had of the Rebell in Brength. Molo distrusted his owne followers : and thought, that neither his late good fuccesse, nor any other consideration, would serve to hold them from returning to the Kings obedience; if once they beheld his person. Wherefore hee thought it safest for him, to affaile the Kings Campein the might time. But going in hand with this; Hee was difcoucred by some that fled over from him to the King. This caused him to returne backeto his Campe: which, by some error, tooke alarme at his returne; and was hardly quieted, when Antiochus appeared in fight. The King was thus forward in giuing battaile to Molo, vpon confidence which hee had that many would reuolt vnto him. Neither was he deceiued in this his beleefe. For not a few men, or Enfignes: but all the left wing of the Enemie, which was opposite vnto the King, changed fide forthwith as foone as euer they had fight of the kings person; and were readie to doe him feruice against Molo. This was enough to have won the victorie:but Molo (hortned the worke, by killing himfelf; as did also divers of his friends, who for feare of torments preuented the Hang-man with their owne fwords.

After this victorie came ioyfull newes, that the Queene Laodice, daughter of Milipadates king of Pontus, which was married vnto Interna swhile before had brought forth a fonne. Fortune feemed bountifull vnto the king: and therefore he purpofed to make what vse he could, of her freindly disposition while it lasted. Being now in the Easterne parts of his kingdome, Heiudged it convenient to vist his Frontiers; were it onely to terrifie the Barbarian, that bordered youn him. Hereunto his Counsaidor Hermias gaue affent: not so much respecting the kings honours as confidering what good might thereby happen to himfelfe. For if it should come to passe, that the king were taken out of the world by any casualtie : then made hee no doubt of becomming Protector to the yong Prince; and thereby of lengthening his owne Gouernment. Antiochus therefore went against Artabazanes, who reigned among the Atropatians; having the greatest part of his kingdome, fituate betweene the Calpian and Euxine Sea. This barbarous king was vericold and fearefull; and therfore yeelded vnto what socuer Conditions it pleased Antiochus to lay vpon him. So in this iournie Antiochus got honour, fuch as well contented him ; and then returned homewards. Vpon the way, a Phylician of his brake with him as concerning Hermias; informing him truly, how odious he was vnto the people; and how ro dangerous he would be thortly vnto the kings owne life. Antiochus beleiued this, having long suspected the same Hermias; but not daring, for feare of him, to vtter his suspitions. It was therefore agreed, that he should be made away on the sudden: which was done; he being trained forth by a fleight a good way out of the Campe, and there killed without warning or disputation. The king needed not to have yied fo much arte, in ridding his hands of a man fo much detelled. For how focuer hee feemed gracious whilest he was aline: yetthey that for feare had beene most obsequious to him, whilest he was in case to doe them hurt, were as readic as the foremost, to speake of him as he had deserved; when once they were secure of him. Yea his wife and children, lying then at Apamea, were stoned to death by the wines and 20 children of the Citizens; whose indignation brake forth the more outragiously, the longer that it had been concealed.

About these times, Acheus (of whom we spake before) thinking that Antiochus might happen to perish in some of those Expeditions which he tooke in hand; was bold to set a Diademe vpon his owne head, and take vpon him as a King. His purpose was to have inuaded Syria : but the same of Antiochus his returning thitherwards, madehim quit the enterprise; and studie to set some handsome colour on his former præsumption. It is verie strange, that Antiochus neither went against Asheus; nor yet dissembled the notice which he had taken, of these his traiterous purpofes:but wrote vnto him, fignifying that he knew al; and vpbrayding him with 20 fuch infidelitie, as any offender might know to be unpardonable. By these meanes he emboldned the Traitor : who being alreadie detected, might better hope to maintaine his former actions by strong hand, than to excuse them, or get pardon by submission. Antiochus had at that time a vehement desire to recouer Calefyria or what else he could, of the Dominions of Ptolemie Philopator in those parts Hebegan with Seleucia, a veric strong Citic neare vnto the mouth of the River Orontes; which ere long he won, partly by force, partly by corrupting with bribes the Captaines that lay therein. This was that Seleucia, whereto Antigonus the great who founded it, gaue the name of Antigonia: but Selencus getting it shortly after, called it Seleucia; and Ptolemie Euergetes having lately won it, might, if it had fo pleased him, 40 have changed the name into Ptolemais. Such is the vanitic of men, that hope to purchase an endlesse memoriall vnto their names, by workes proceeding rather from their greatnesse, than from their vertue; which therefore no longer are their owne, than the same greatnesse hath continuance. Theodotus the Atolian, he that before had opposed himselfe to Antiochus, and defended Calestria in the behalfe of Ptolemie; was now growne forrie, that he had vsed so much faith and diligence, in seruice of an vnthankfull and luxurious Prince. Wherefore, as a Mercinarie, he began to have regard vnto his owne profit: which thinking to finde greater, by applying himselfe vnto him that was (questionlesse) the more worthic of these two Kings; He offered to deliuer vp vnto Antiochus, the Cities of Tyrus and Ptolemais. Whilest he was deuising about this treason, and had alreadie sent messengers to King Antiochus: his practife was detected; and he befieged in Ptolemais by one of Ptolemies Captaines, that was more faithfull than himselfe. But Antiochus hasting to his rescue, vanquished this Captaine who met him on the way : and afterwards got possession, not onely of Tyrus and Ptolemais, with a good fleete of the Layptian Kings that was in those Hauens: but of so many other Townes in that Country, as emboldned him to thinke your making a journic into Egypt it selfe. Agathodes and Salibius bore all the fway in Legypt at that time : Prolemie himselfe being loth to have his pleasures interrupted, with businesse of so small importance, as the safetie of his Kingdome. Wherefore these two agreed together, to make prouision as hastily, and yet as fecretly as might be, for the warre : and neuertheleffe, at the same time. to preffe Antiochus with daily Embaffadours to some good agreement. There came in the heate of this busines. Embassadours from Rhodes, Byzantium, and Cyzicus, as likewise from the Atolians; according to the viuall courtelie of the Greekes, desiring to take vp the quarrell. These were all entertained in Memphis, by Agathocles and Solibius: who entreated them to deale effectually with Antioohus. But whileft this Treatie lafted great preparations were made at Alexandria for the warre: wherein these two Counsailors perswaded themselves reasonably, that the victorie would be their owne; if they could get, for monie, a sufficient, number of the Greekes to take their parts. Antiochus heard onely what was done at Memphis, and how defirous the Gouernours of Agypt were to be at quiet: whereunto he gaue the readier beleefe, not onely for that hee knew the disposition of Ptolemie, but because the Rhodians, and other Embassadours, comming from Memphis, discoursed vnto him all after one manner; as being all deceived, by the 20 cunning of Agathocles and his fellow. Antiochus therefore having wearied himfelte, at the long fiege of a Towne called Dura, which he could not win : and being delirous to refresh himselfe and his Armie in Seleucia, during the Winter which then came on; granted vnto the Egyptian a Truce for foure moneths, with promife that he would be readie to hearken vnto equall Conditions, when they should be offered. It was not his meaning to be so courteous, as he would faine have seemed; but onely to lull his enemies alleepe, whileft he tooke time to refresh himselfe; and to bring Acheus to some good order, whose treason daily grew more open and violent. The same negligence which he thought the Agyptian would have vsed, He vied himselfe; as presuming, that when time of the yeare better served, little force 30 would be needfull: for that the Townes would voluntarily yeeld vnto him, fince Ptolemie prouided not for their defence. Neuerthetesse he gaue audience to the Embaffadors, and had often conference with those that were sent out of Agypt: pleafine himselfe well, to dispute about the inflice of his quarrell; which hee purposed shortly to make good by the sword, whether it were just or no. He said, that it was agreed between Seleucus his Ancestorand Ptolemie the sonne of Lagi, That all Syria, if they could win it from Antigonus, should be given in possession to Selencus: and that this bargaine was afterwards ratified, by generall confent of all the Confederates, after the battaile at Ip/us. But Ptolemies men would acknowledge no fuch bargaine, They faid, that Ptolemie the sonne of Lagi, had won Coelesyria, and the 40 Provinces adioyning for himselfe : as also that he had sufficiently gratified Seleucus, by lending him forces to recouer his Province of Babylon, and the Countries about the River of Emphrates. Thus whilest neither of them greatly cared for peace; they were, in the end of their disputation, as farre from concluding as at the beginning. Ptolomie demanded restitution; Antiochus thought, that he had not as yet gotten all that was his owne: Also Ptolemie would needes haue Acheus comprehended in the League betweene them, as one of their Confederates; But Antischus would not endure to heare of this, exclaiming against it as a shameful thing, that one King should offer to deale so with another, as to take his Rebell into protection, and seeke to 50 ioyne him in Confederacie with his owne fouereigne Lord. When the Truce was expired, and Antischus prepared to take the field againe: contrarie to his expectation he was informed, That Ptolemie, with a verie puillant Armie, was comming vp against him out of Agypt. Setting forward therefore to meet with the Enemie, he was encountred on the way by those Captaines of Ptolemie, that had resisted him the veere before. They held against him the passages of Libanus, whence nevertheleffe he draue them; and, proceeding onward in his journie, wan fo many places that he greatly increased his reputation; and therby drew the Arabians, with divers of the bordering people, to become his followers. As the two Kings drew neare together: many Captaines of Ptolemie for looke his pay, and fled ouer to Antiochus. This notwithstanding, the Agyptian had the courage to meet his Enemie in the field. The battaile was fought at Raphia: where it was not to be decided, whether the Agretians or Aliatiques were the better fouldiors (forthat the firength of both Armies confifted in Mercinaries, cheifly of the Greekes, Thracians, and Gaules) but whether of the Kings was the more fortunate. Ptolemie, with Arfinoe his lifter 10 and Wife, rode vp and downe encouraging his men; the like did Antiochus on the other fide: each of them rehearling the brane deedes of their Ancestors; as not hauing of their owne, wherby to valew themselves. Antiochus had the more Elephants: as also his, being of Asia, had they been fewer would have beaten those of Africke. Wherefore by the advantage of these beasts, He draue the enemies before him, in that part of the battaile wherein hee fought himfelfe. But Ptolemie had the better men: by whose valour he brake the Grosse of his Enemies battaile, and wan the victorie; whilest Antiochus was heedlesly following vpon those, whom he had compelled to retire. Antiochus had brought into the feild aboue feuentie thou fand foot. and fix thousand Horse : whereof though he lost scarce ten thousand foote, and not 20 foure hundred horse; yet the fame of his ouerthrow, tooke from him all those places which he had lately wonne. When therefore he was returned home to Antioch: He began to stand in feare, lest Ptolemie and Achaus, setting upon him both at once. should put him in danger of his whole Estate. This caused him to fend Embassadors unto the Egyptian to treat of peace : which was readily granted ; it being much against the nature of Ptolemie, to vex himselfe thus with the tedious busines of warre. So Ptolemie, having flaied three moneths in Syria, returned home into Egypt clad with the reputation of a Conqueror; to the great admiration of his fubicets, and of all those that were acquainted with his voluptuous and slothfull

Acheus was not comprised in the League between these two Kings: or if hee had beene included therein; yet would not the Agyptian have taken the paines. of making a fecond Expedition for his fake. The best was, that he thought himselfe firong enough, if fortune were not too much against him, to deale with Antiochus. Neither was he confident without great reason. For besides his many victories, whereby he had gotten all that belonged vnto Antiochus on this side of Taurus, Hee had also good successe against Attalus King of Pergamus; that was an able man of warre, and commanded a strong Armie. Neither washe, as Mole the Rebell had beene, one of meane regard otherwife, and carried beyond himfelfe by apprehending the vantage of some opportunitie : but Cozen german to the King, as hath 40 beene shewed before; and now lately the Kings brother-in-law, by taking to wife a yonger daughter of the fame Mithridates King of Pontus, which was also called Laodice, as was her fifter the Queene, Antiochus his wife. These things had added maiestievnto him; and had made his followers greatly to respect him, even as one to whome a Kingdome was belonging. Neither made it a little for him, That King Ptolemie of Egypt held him in the nature of a freind : and that King Antiochus was now lately vanquished in the battaile at Raphia; and had thereby lost all his gettings in Syria. But all these hopes and likelihoods came to nothing. For the King of Pontus, if he would meddle in that quarrell betweene his fonnes-in-law, had no reafon to take part against the more honourable. As for the Agyptian: Hee was not 50 onely flothfull; but hindered by a rebellion of his owne subjects, from helping his friends abroad. For the people of Agypt, of whom Ptolemie, contrarie to the manner of his Progenitors, had armed a great number to ferue in the late Expedition: began to entertaine a good opinion of their owne valour, thinking it not inferiour to the Micedonian. Hercupon they refuled to fuffer as much as formerly they had done : fince they leffe effeemed, than they had done, the force of the Kings Mercinarie Greekes; which had hitherto kept them in streight subjection. Thus brake out a warre, betweene that King and his subjects: wherein though the ill-guided force of the Multitude was finally broken; yet King Ptolemie thereby wasted much of his strength, and much of his time, that might have beene spent, as he thought, much better in reuelling; or, as others thought, in succouring Achieus. As for Antigebus: He had no fooner made his peace with the Agyptian, than he turned all his care to the preparation of warre against Acheus. To this purpose he entred into League with Attalus; that so he might diltract the forces of his Robell, and finde him worke on all fides. Finally, his diligence and fortune were fuch, that within awhile he had pent up Acheus into the Citie of Sardes; where he held him about two yeeres belieged. The Citie was verie strong, and well victualed: so as there appeared not, when the fecond yeere came, any greater likelihood of taking it, than in the first yeeres seige. In the end, one Lagor as a Cretan found meanes how to enter the Towne. The Castle it selfe was vpon a verie high Rocke, and in a manner impregnable: as also the Towne-wall adioyning to the Castle, in that part which was called the Same, was in like manner fituated upon fleepe Rockes, and hardly accessible; that hung ouer a deepe bottome, whereinto the dead carkaffes of Horses and 20 other beafts, yea and fometimes of men, yfed to be throwne. Now it was observed by Lagoras, That the Rauens and other birds of prey, which hanted that place by reason of their food which was there neuer wanting, vsed to flie vp vnto the top of the Rockes, and to pitch upon the wals; where they refted without any diffurbance. Observing this often, he reasoned with himselfe, and concluded rhat those partes of the Wall were left vnguarded, as being thought vnapproachable. Heereof hee informed the King: who appropued his judgement, and gaue vinto him the leading of fuch men, as hee defired for the accomplishing of the enterprize. The successe was agreeable to that which Lagoras had afore conceived: and, though with much labour, yet without relistance, he scaled those Rockes, and (whileftagenerall affalt was made) entred the Towne in that part; which was, at other times vngarded, then vnthought vpon. In the same place had the Persians, under Cyrus, gotten into Sardes; when Crasfus thought himselfe secureon that side. But the Citizens tooke not warning, by the example of a loffe many ages paft; and therefore out of memorie. Acheus held still the Castle: which not onely feemed by nature impregnable, but was verie wel stored with all necessaries; and manned with a sufficient number, of such as were to him well affured . Antiochus therefore was constrained to wast much time about it; having none other hope to prevaile, than by familhing the inclosed. Besides the vsual tediousnesse of expectation; his busineffe called him thence away into the higher Asia, where the Backrians, and Parthians with the Hyreanians, had erected Kingdomes taken out of his Dominions, voon which they still encroched. But he thought it not safe to let Acheus breake loose againe. On the other fide, there were fome Agents of Ptolemie the Agyptian , and good friends vnto Acheus; that made it their whole studie, how to deliuer this befeiged Prince. If they could rescue his person, they cared for no more : but prefumed, that when he should appeare in the Countries under Taurus, he would soone haue an Armie at command; and be strong enough to hold Antiochus as hardly to worke, as at any time before. Wherefore they dealt with one Bolis a Cretan, that was acquainted well with all the waies in the Countrie; and particularly with the by-paths and exceeding difficult passages among those Rockes, whereon the Castle of Sardes flood. Him they tempted with great rewards, which he should receive

5º of Sardes flood. Him they tempted with great rewards, which he should receive at the hands of Polemie, as well as of Adhaus; to doe his best for performance of their desire. He vndertookethe busines: and gaue such likelie reasons of bringing all to good effect, that they wrote vnto Achaus by one Arians a trustie messenger; whom Bolis found meanes to conucigh into the Castle. The faith of the Nego.

"Among thefe few I doe not except one, felfe Eudemon John Andrew, a Cretan : who in one of his lare fhameleffelibels, wherein he traduceth our King, Religion, and Countrie, with all the good & worthic men of whom he could learne the names; hath, by inferring my name, twice belied me; in calling mea Puritani& one that have been dangerous ynto my Soucraigne. It is an ill spoken of by fo diligent a Supporter of Treasons, and Archite@of whereof I may not denie him the commendation of Creticisme no leffe volum:yond any the Cretians in elder times, that were alwaics Lvers, cuill beafts, and he Polyb Stiff A.3

tiators Achaus held most affured. They also wrote vnto him in privile characters, or Ciphers, wherewith none faue he and they were acquainted: whereby hee knew, that it was no fained device of his Enemies, in the name of his friends. As for the mellinger; he was a truftie fellow, and one whom Achaus found, by examination. heartily affected vnto the fide. But the Contents of the Epifile, which were, That he should be confident in the faith of Bolis, and of one Cambylus whom Bolis had wonne vnto the bufinesse, did somewhat trouble him. They were men to him vnknowne : and Cambylus was a follower of Antiochus; under whom he had the commaund of those Cretans, which held one of the Forts that blocked up the Calle of Sardes. Neuertheleffe other way to escape he saw none, than by putting himselfe to to some adventure. When the messinger had therefore passed often to and fro : it was at length concluded, That Bolis himselfe should so me speake with Achaus, and conduct him forth. There was none other than good faith meant by any of the relt. faue onely by Bolis and Cambylis; which were Cretans, and (as all their Countrimen. * fome few excepted, have beene, and still are) false knaues. These two held a confultation together, that was, as k Polybius observes it, rightly Cretical: neither concerning the fafetie of him whose deliuerance they undertooke, nor touching the discharge of their ownesaith; but onely how to get most, with least adoe and danger to themselves. Briefly they concluded, That first of all they would equally fhare betweene them ten Talents, which they had alreadie received in hand : and 20 then, That they would reucale the matter to Antiochus; offering to deliver Acheus vnto him, if they might be well rewarded both with present monie, and with promife of confideration answerable to the greatnesse of such a service, when it should be dispatched. Antiochus hearing this promise of Cambylus, was no lesse glad; than were the friends of Acheus well pleased with the comfortable promises of Bolis. At length when all things were in readinesseon both sides, and that Bolis with Arianus was to get up into the Castle, and conneigh Acheus thence : Hee first went with Cambylus to speake with the King, who gave him veric private audience; and confirmed vnto him by word of mouth the affurance of his liberall promifes, And after that, putting on the countenance of an honest man, and of one that was faithfull vnto Ptolemie whom he long had ferued, Hee accompanied Arianus vp into the Castle. At his comming thither, Hee was souingly entertained; yet questioned at large by Achaus, touching all the weight of the businesse in hand. But he discoursed fo well, and with fuch gravitie; that there appeared no reason, of distrusting eyther honour to bee his faith or judgment. Hee was an old Souldior, had long beenea Captainevnder Ptelemie, and did not thrust himselfe into this businesse; but was inuited by honourable and faithfull men. He had also taken a safe course, in winning (as it seemed) that other Countriman of his: who kept a Fort that flood in their way; and there-Lies: in regard by had alreadie fundrie times, ginen fafe paffage and repaffage vnto Arianus. But against all these comfortable hopes, the importance of so great an aduenture stirred 40 vp some diffidence. Achaus therefore dealt wisely, and said, That hee would yet flay in the Castle a little longer: but that he meant to send away with Bolis three or foure of his friends; from whom when hee received better advertisement, concerning the likelihood of the enterprise, then would hee iffue forth himselfe. Hereby in multiplicitie he tooke order, not to commit himselfe wholly vnto the faith of a man vnknowne. But, as Polybius well notes, He did not confider that he plaid the Cretian with a man of Crete: which is to fay, That he had to doe with one, whose knauerie could not be avoided by circumspection. Bolis and Cambylus had laid their plot thus, That if Acheus came forth alone, then should be easily be taken by the ambush prepared for him if he were accompanied with many of his friends, then should Arianus becappointed to lead the way, as one that of late had trodden it oft; and Bolis following behind, should have an eye vpon Acheus, to prevent him not onely from escaping in the tumult, but from breaking his owne necke, or otherwise killing himselfe: to the end that being taken aliue, Hee might bee to Antiochus the more welcome Pre-

CHAP.5. $ 2. fent. And in such order came they now forth: Arianus going before as Guide; the rest following, as the way served, and Bolis in the Rere. Acheus made none acquainted with his purpose, till the vericinstant of his departure. Then signified he the matter to his wife Laodice; and comforting her with hope as well as hee could, appointed foure of his especiall freinds to beare him companie. They were all difguised : and one of them alone tooke vpon him to have knowledge of the Greeke tongue, speaking and answering, as need thould require, for all, as if the rest had beene Barbarians. Bolis followed them, craftily deuising vpon his businesse, and much perplexed. For (faith Polybius,) Though hee were of Crete, and prone to surmife to anything to the mischeise of another: yet could bee not see in the darke, nor know which of them was Acheus, or whether Acheus himselfe were there. The way was verievneasie, and in some places dangerous; especially to those that knew it not. Wherefore they were faine to staie in diners places, and helpe one another vp or downe. But vponeuery occasion, they were all of them verie officious toward Acheus; lending him their hands, and taking such care of him, as cassly gaue Bolis to vnderstand, that he was the man : and so by their vnseasonable dutie, they vndid their Lord. When they came to the place where Cambylus laie in wait; Bolis whiftled, and presently clasped Achaus about the middle, holding him fast that hee should not stirre. So they were all taken by the ambush, and carried forthwith to 20 Antiochus: who sat vp watching in his Pauliton, expecting the cuent. The fight of Acheus, brought in bound vnto him, did so assonish the King, that he was vnable to speake a word, and anon brake out into weeping. Yet was hee before informed of the plot, which might have kept him from admiration : as also the next morning betimes affembling his friends together, He condemned Acheus to a cruell death; which argues, that hee was not moued with pittic towardes this vnhappic man. Whereforeit was the generall regard of calamities, incident vnto great fortunes, that wrung from him these teares: as also the raritie of the accident, that made both him and his friends to wonder: though it bee so, that such a course as this of his, in employing two mischeiuous knaues against one Traitour, doth not rarely succeed 30 well; according to that Spanish Prouerbe, Aun traydor dos alleuosos. The death of Achens brought fuch aftonishment upon those which held the Castle, that after awhile they gaue vp the place and themselues vnto the King; whereby hee got entire possession of all to him belonging in the lesser Asia. Some yeares passed after this ere Antiochus was readie for his Expedition against the Parthians, and Hyrcanians. The Parthians were a little Nation of obscure beginnings; and commonly subject vnto those that ruled in Media. In the great shuffling for Provinces after the death of alexander, the Government over them was committed by Antipater to one Philip, a man of small regard: shortly they fell to Eumenes : then to Antigonus; and from him, together with the Medes, to Seleucus: vnder whose po-40 fteritie they continued untill the Reigne of Seleneus Callinieus, being ruled by Leiutenants of the Syrian Kings. The luftfull insolencie of one of these Leiutenants, together with the misfortune of Callinicus, that was vanquished and thought to bee flaine by the Gaules; did firre vp Arfaces, a Noble man of the Countrie, to feeke reuenge of injuries done, and animate him to rebell. So he flew the Kings Leiutenant, made himselfe King of the Parthians, and Lord of Hyrcania; fought prosperoully with those that diffurbed him in his beginnings; and tooke Seleucus Callinicus prisoner in battaile, whom he royally entertained, and dismissed. Hereby he wanne reputation as a lawfull King: and by good government of his Countrie, procured vnto himselfe such loue of his subjects, that his name was continued vnto his Successors; 10 like as that of the Prolemies in Egypt , and that of the Cefars afterwardes in Rome. Much about the same time the Bactrians rebelled: though these at length, and all belonging vnto the Seleucida beyond Euphrates, encreased the Parthians Dominion.

Now Antiochus went against them with so strong an Army, that they durst not meet him in plaine feild; but keptthemselues in Woods, or places of strength, and defended the Streights and paffages of Mountaines. The refiliances they made auailed them not. For Antiochus had with him fo great a multitude, and fo well forted. as hee needed not to turne out of the way, from those that lay fortified against him, in Woods and Streights between their Mountaines, it being easie to spare out of io great a number, as many as fetching a compaffe about, might eyther getaboue the Enemies heads; or come behind and charge them on the backe. Thus did hee often employ against them his light ar mature: wherewith hee caused them to dislodge, and give way vnto his Phalanx; vpon which they durft not adventure them-Iclues in open ground. Arfaces, the fecond of the name, (for his father was dead before this) was then King of Parthia: who though hee was confident in the fidelitie of his owne fubicets; yet feared to encounter with fo mightie an Inuader. His hope was, that the bad waves, and defarts, would have caufed Antiochus, when he was at Echatane in Media, to give over the journie without proceeding much further. This not fo falling out; He canfed the Wels and Springs in the Wilderneffe, through which his Enemie must passe, to bee dammed vp and spoiled. By which meanes, and the relistance before spoken of, when he could not preuaile, He withdrew him felfe out of the way: fuffering the Enemie to take his pleafure for a time in wasting the Countrie; wherein, without some victoric obtained, hee could make no long abode. Antiochus hereby found, That Arfaces was nothing strongly prouided for the warre. Wherefore hee marched through the heart of Parthia: and 20 then forward into Hyreania; where he wanne Tambrace the chiefe Citie of that Pronince. This indignitie and many other loffes; caused Arfaces at length, when hee had gathered an Armie that feemed strong enough, to aduenture a battaile. The iffue thereof was fuch, as gave to neither of the Kings hope of accomplishing his defires, without exceeding difficultie. Wherefore Arfaces craued peace, and at length obtained it: Antiochus thinking it not amiffe, to make him a friend, whom Hee could not make a subject.

The next Expedition of Antiochus, was against Euthydemus King of the Baltrians; one that indeed had not rebelled against him or his Ancestors; but having gotten the Kingdome from those that had rebelled, kept it to himselfe. With Euthydemus he fought a battaile by the River Arius, where he had the victorie, But the victorie was not fo greatly to his honour; as was the testimonic which hee gauge of his owne private valour, in obtaining it. He was thought that day to have demeaned him more couragiously, than did any one man in all his Armie. His Horse was flaine vinder him: and hee himfelfe received a wound in his mouth, whereby hee loft fome of his teeth. As for Euthydemus; He withdrew himfelfe back into the further parts of his Kingdome; and afterwards protracted the Warre, feeking how to end it by composition. So Embassadours passed betweene the Kings: Antiochus complaining, That a Countrie of his was vniuftly vfurped from him; Enthydemus answering, That He had wonne it from the children of the Vsurpers: and further, 36 That the Bactrians, a wild Nation, could hardly be retained in order, faue by a King of their owne; for that they bordered upon the Scythians, with whom if they should joyne, it would be greatly to the danger of all the Provinces that lay behind them. These allegations, together with his owne wearinesse, pacified Antiochus; and made him willing to grant peace vpon reasonable Conditions. Demetrius, the sonne of Euthydemus, being a goodly Gentleman, and employed by his father as Embaffadour in this Treatic of peace; was not a little auaileable vnto a good conclusion. For Antiochus liked him fo well, that he promifed to giue him in marriage one of his owne daughters; and therewith all permitted Euthydemus to retaine the kingdome; causing him neuerthelesse to deliver vp all his Elephants; as also to binde himselfe by oath, to fuch Coucnants as he thought requifite.

So Antiochus leauing the Ballrian in quiet, made a journie ouer Caucasus, and came to the borders of India: where he renewed with Sophagasensus, King of the Indians, the Societie that had beene betweene their Ancestors. The Indians had remained subject ynto the Macedonians, for a little while, after Alexanders death. Enmenes in his Warre against Antigonus, rayled part of his forces out of their Countrie. But when Antigonus after his victorie turned Westward, and was ouer-bufied in a great civill Warre; then did one Sandrocottus, an Indian, ftirre vp his Countrimen to Rebellion; making himfelfe their Captaine, and taking vpon him as Protestor of their libertie. This Office and Title hee foone changed, though not withour some contention, into the Name and Majestic of a King. Finally hee got vnto himselfe, (hauing an Armie of sixe hundred thousand men) if not all India, yet as much of it as had beene Alexanders. In this Estate he had well confirmed himselfe, 10 ere Seleneus Nicator could find leifure to call him to account. Neyther did He faint, or humble himfelfe, at the comming of Seleueus; but met him in field, as readic to defend his owne; fo ftrongly and well appointed, that the Macdonian was contented, to make both peace and affinitie with him, taking onely a reward of fiftie Elephants. This League, made by the Founders of the Indian and Syrian kingdomes, was continued by some Offices of lone betweene their children, and now renewed by Anisochus: whose number of Elephants were increased thereupon, by the Indian King, to an hundred and fiftie; as also he was promised, to have some treasure fent after him; which hee left one to receive. Thus parted thefe two great Kings. Nevetter had the Indians, from this time forwards, in many generations, any buli-20 neffe worthie of remembrance with the Westerne Countries. The posteritie of Sanarezettus, is thought to have retained that kingdome vnto the dayes of Auguilus Cafar: 10 whom Porus, then reigning in India, fent Embassadours with Presents, and an Epittle written in Greeke: wherein, among other things, Hee faid, That Hee had command ouer fix hundred Kings. There is also found, scattered in sundrie Authors, the mention of some which held that kingdome, in diver: Ages, even vnto the time of Constantine the great: being all peraduenture of the fame race. But Antioches, who in this Treatie with Sophagafenes carried himfelfe as the worthier person, receiving Prefents; and after marched home through Drangiana and Carmania, with fuch reputation, that all the Potentates not onely in the higher Asia, but on the hi-30 ther fide of Taurus, humbled themselves vnto him, and called him The Great: faw an end of his owne Greatneffe within few yeares enfuing, by prefuming to fland vpon points with the Romans; whose Greatnesse was the same in deed, that his was onely in feeming.

The lewd reigne of PTOLEMIE PHILOPATOR in Agypt: with the tragicall and of his fauourites, when he was dead. ANTIOCHVS prepares to warre on the young child PTOLEMIE EPIPHANES, the Sonne of PHILOPATOR. Hisirresolution in preparing for divers warres at once. His Voyage toward the Hellespont, Hee feckes to hold amitie with the Romans, who make friendly flow to him; intending neuertheleffe to have warre with him. His doings about the Hellefpont; which the Romans made the first ground of their quarrell to him.

His Expedition being finished; Antiochus had leisure to repose himfelfe awhile, and fluide which way to consure the terror of his pulffance, for the enlargement of his Empire. Within two or three yeares Pstelmie Philostrae diedle leaning his fonce Pstelmie Philostrae diedle leaning his fonce Pstelmie Philostrae diedle leaning his fonce Pstelmie Philostrae diedle leaning his fonce Pstelmie Philostrae diedle leaning his fonce pstelmie philostrae a young Boy, his fuccessor in the kingdome; valikely by him to bee well defended, against a neighbour so mightie and ambitious. This Pto emic surnamed Philopator, that is to fay, alouer of his Father, is thought to have had that furname given him in meere derifion; as having made away both his Father and Mo. 14/6/11/20; ther. His yong yeares, being newly past his childhood when he beganne to reigne, may feeme to discharge him of so horrible a crime, as his Fathers death : yet the beaftlineffe of all his following life, makes him not vnlike to have done any mifcheife, whereof he could be accused. Hauing wonne the battaile at Raphia, He gaue himselfouer to sensualitie; & was wholy gouerned by a Strumpet called Agathoclea. At her instigation Hee murdered his owne wife and sister; which had adventured herselfe with him, in that onely dangerous Action by him undertaken and performed with honor. The Leiutenant-ships of his Provinces, with all Commands in his Armie, and Offices whatfoeuer; were wholly referred vnto the disposition of this Agothoclea, and her brother Agathodes, and of Oenanthe a filthic Bawd that was mother vnto them both. So these three gouerned the Realme at their pleasure, to 10 the great greife of all the Countrie, till Philopator died ; who having reigned feuenteene yeares, left none other sonne than Ptolemie Epiphanesa childe of fine yeares old, begotten on Arimoe that was his fifter and wife. After the Kings death; Agathocles beganne to take vpon him, as Protector of young Epiphanes, and Gouernour of the Land. He affembled the Macedons (which were the Kings ordinarie forces in pay, not all borne in Macedonia, but the race of those that abode in Agypt with Ptolemie the first, and would not be accounted Egyptians; as neyther would the Kings themselves) and bringing forth vnto them his fifter Agathaclea, with the yong King in her armes; beganne a folemne Oration. He told them, That the deceafed father of this their King, had committed the child into the armes of his fifter, but vnto the 20 faith of them: on whose valiant right hands, the whole state of the Kingdome did now relie. He befought them therefore that they would be efaithfull, and, as great need was, defend their King against the treason of one Tiepolemus, an ambitious man. who traiteroufly went about to fet the Diademe you his owne head, being a meere firanger to the Royall bloud. Herewithall hee produced before them a witneffe, that should justifie his accusation against Tlepolemus. Now though it were so, that he delinered all this with a fained passion of forrow, and counterfeiting of teares: yet the Macedons that heard him, regarded not any word that hee Spake; but flood laughing, and talking one to another, what a shamelesse dissembler he was, to take so much vpon him, as if he knew not how greatly he was hated. And so brake vp the 20 Affembly: Hee that had called it, being scarce aware how. Agathocles therefore, whom the old Kings fauour had made mightie, but neyther wife nor wel qualified; thought to goe to worke, as had formerly beene his manner, by vfing his authoritic, to the suppression of those that he distrusted. Hee haled out of a Temple the mother in-law of Tlepolemu; & cast her into prison. This filled Alexandria with rumors, and made the people (though accustomed to fuffer greater things, whilest they were committed in the old Kings name) to meet in knots together, and otter one to another their mindes; wherein they had conceived extreme hate, against these three pernicious misgouernours of the old King. Besides their consideration of the prefent injurie done to Tlepolemus, they were somewhat also mooned with feare of 49 harme; which, in way of requitall, Tlepolemus was likely to doe vnto the Citic. For He was, though a man most ynapt for Gouernment, as afterwards hee projed: yet no bad Souldier, and well beloued of the Armie, It was also then in his power, to stop the provision of victuals which was to come into Alexandria. As these motiues wrought with the people; fo by the remedie which Azathorles vied, were the Macedons more haltily, and more violently stirred vnto vprore. Hee secretly apprehended one of their number, whom he suspected of conspiracie against him; and deliuered him vnto a follower of his owne, to be examined by torture. This poore fouldior was carried into an inner roome of the Palace and there stripped out of all his apparrell to be tormented. But while strike whippes were brought forth, and all things even in a readine see for that purpose: there was brought who the Minister of Agathoeles, a lad report of Tlepolemus his being at hand. Hereupon the Examiner, and his Torturers, one after another, went out of the roome; leaving Moeragenes the Souldior alone by himfelfe, and the dores open. Hee perceiung this, naked as he was, conneighed himfelfe out of the Palace, and got vnto the Macedonians, of whom he found some in a Temple thereby at dinner. The Statedonians were as ferce in maintenance of their Priniledges, as are the Twikes laintains. Being affured therefore that one of their fellowes had thus beene vset; they fell to Armesin a great rage, and beganne to force the Palace: crying out. That they would see the King, and not leave him in posselion of such a dangerous man. The whole multitude in the Citic, with lowd clamours, made no lesse about the Souldiors, though to lesseeffect. So the old Bawd Genanthe sted into a Temple: her Sonne and Daughter staid in the Court, untill the King was taken from them; and they, to by his permission which hee easily gaue, and by apointment of those that now had him in their hands, delinered up to the burie of the people. Agashockes himsselfe was stabbed to death, by some which therein did the office of friends; though in manner of enemies. His sister was dragged naked up and downe the streetes, as was also his mother, with all to them belonging: the enraged multitude committed upon them a barbarous execution of justice; biting them, pulling out their eyes, and tearing them in peeces.

CHAP.5. $ 2.

These troubles in Agypt, served well to stirre vp King Antiochus; who had verie good leifure though he wanted all pretence, to make warre vpon yong Ptolemie. Philip of Macedon had the same defire, to get what part he could of the childes 20 estate. But it happened well, that Ptolemie Philopator in the Punick Warre, which was now newly ended, had done many good offices vnto the Romans. Vnto them therfore the Agyptians addressed themselves, and craved helpe against these two Kings: who though they fecretly maligned one the other, yet had entred into copenant, to divide between them, all that belonged vnto this Orphan; whose Father had beene Confederate with them both. So * M. Lepidus was fent from Rome, to *Infinitizon protect from all violence the King of Egypt; especially against Antiochus. As for the Macedonian; Hee was verie soone found busied, with warreat his owne doores. Also Scopus the Etolian, being a Pensioner to the Egyptian, was sent into Greece to rayle an Armie of Mercinaries. What Lepidus did in Egypt, I doe not find: and 20 therefore thinke it not improbable, that Hee was fent thither onely one of the three Embaffadours, oin the beginning of the Warre with Philip, as hath beene o Linder; shewed before, As for Scopas; He shortly after went vp into Syria with his Armie: where winning many places, among the rest of his Acts, He subdued the Ierres, who feeme to have yeelded themselves a little before vnto Antiochus, at such time as they faw him prepare for his Warre, and despaired of recei uing helpe from Egypt. But Vide to sphant, it was not long, ere all these Victories of Scopas came to nothing. For the verie next yeare following, which was (according to Eusebius) the same yeare that Philip was beaten at Cynoscephala; Antiochus vanquilhed Scopas in battaile, and recoucred all that had beene loft. Among the rest, the Iewes with great willingnesse returned 40 vnder his obedience; and were threfore by him verie gently entreated.

The Land of Legypt this great King did forbeare to inuade; and game it our, that he meant to beliow a daughter of his owne in marriage vpon Ptolomie: either hoping, as may feeme, that the Countrie would willingly fubmit it felfe vnto him, if this yong child fhould happen to mifearrie; or elfet hat greater purchale might be made in the Westerne parts of Asia, whilest Philip was held ouer-laboured by the Romans. I tappeares that he was verie much distracted; hunting (as weslay) two Hares at once with one Hound. The quarries betweene Lesting, Philip, and the Greekes, promised to affword him great aduantage, if he should bring his Armite to the steelegons. On the other side, the state of Legypt being such as hath beene devaluate could get in Spris: where all were willing (and the Inves among the rest, though hitherto they had kept saith with the Legyptian) to yeeld him obedience. An other while, letting Legypt alone, He was about to make inussion vpon Attalus his Kingdome; yet suffered himselfe casily to be persuaded by the Roman Embase.

fadors, and delisted from that enterprise. Having thus farre gratified the Romans; He fends Embaffadours to the Senate, to conclude a perfect amitie betweene him and them. It is not lightly to be ouerpassed, That these his Embassadors were louingly entertained at Rome; and dismissed, with a Decree and answer of the Senate. altogether to the honour of King Antiochus. But this answer of the Romans was not lincere; being rather framed according to regard of the Kings good liking, than of their owne intent. They had not as yet made an end with Philip: neither would they gladly be troubled with two great warres at once. Wherefore, not flanding much you the nice examination of what belonged vnto their honour; they were content to giue good words for the present. In the meane time Antiochus fights to with Scopas in Syria: and shortly prepares to win some Townes elsewhere, belonging vnto Ptolemie; yet withall hee fends an Armie Westward, intending to make what profit hee can of the distractions in Greece. Likewise it is considerable, as an argument of his much irrefolution, How notwithstanding his attempts your both of their Kingdomes, he offered one of his daughters to Ptolemie, and another to Eumenes the sonne of Attalus, newly King of Pergamus : feeking each of their friendships, at one and the same time, when hee sought to make each of them a spoile. Thus was heacting and deliberating at once : being carried with an inexplicable defire of repugnancies, which is a disease of great, and over-swelling fortunes. How-focuer it was, He sent an Armie to Sarder by Land, vnder two of his owne some 20 willing them there to flay for him; whileft he himfelfewith a Flecte of an hundred Gallies, and two hundred other veffels, intended to paffe along by the Coasts of Cilicia and Caria, taking in fuch places as held for the Aegyptian. It was a notable Act of the Rhodians, that, whileft the war of Philip lay yet vpon their hands, they aduentured vpon this great Antiochus. I hey sent vnto him a proud Embaffage: wherby they gaue him to understand, That if he passed forward beyond a certaine Promontorie in Cilicia, they would meete him and fight with him; not for any quarrell of theirs vnto him; but because hee should not joyne with Philip their enemie. and helpe him against the Romans. It was insolently done of them, neither seemed it otherwise, to prescribe such limits vnto the King. yet he tempered himselfe, and 30 without any flew of indignation gaue a gentlean fwer; partly himselfe to their Embassadours ;partly vnto their whole Citie, by Embassadours which he thither fint. He shewed his delire, to renew the ancient Confederacies betweene his Ancestors and them; and willed them not to be afraid, left his comming should tend vnto any hurt, either of them, or of their Confederates. As touching the Romans whom they thought that he would molest : they were (he said) his verie good friends; whereof, he thought, there needed no better proofe, than the entertainment and answer by them newly given to his Embaffadours:

The Rhodians appeare to have beene a cunning people, and fuch as could forefee what weather was like to happen. This answer of the King, and the relation of what 40 had passed betweene his Embassadours and the Senate, moued them not a whit; when they were informed shortly after, that the Afacedonian war was ended at the battaile of Cynoscephale. They knew that Antiochus his turne would be next; and prepared to be forward on the stronger side. Wherefore they would not be contented to fit (till; vnleffe the Townes on the South Coast of Asa, belonging to Ptolemie their friend and Confederate, were suffered to be at quiet. Herein also they did well; for that they had ever beene greatly beholding, to all the race of the Ptolenses. They therefore, in this time of necessitie, gaue what aid they could vnto al the subjects of the Azyptian in those parts. In like manner did King Eumenes, the fonne of Attalus, prognoficate as concerning the war that followed, betweene An- 50 tinchus and the Romans. For when King Anticchus made a freindly offer, to bestow one of his daughters upon him in mariage: Hee excused himselfe, and would not have her. Attalus and Philetarus, his brethren, wondered at this. But he told them. that the Romans would furely make warvpon Antiochus; and therein finally preuaile. Wherefore he faid, That by abitayning from this affinite, it hould be in his power to ioyne with the Roman, and itrengthen himselfig greatly with their treind-lihp. Contrariwish, if he leaned to Anticolus: as hee muit be partaker in his oer-throw; so was he sure to be oppressed by him, as by an ouer-mightie neighbour, if he happened to win the victorie.

he happened to win the victorie. Antiochus himselfe wintered about Ephelus: where hee tooke such order as hee thought convenient, for the reducing of Smyrna and Lamplacus to obedience; that had vsurped their libertie, and obstinately strone to mantaine it, in hope that the Romans would protect them. In the beginning of the Spring he failed ynto the 10 Hellespont: where having won some Townes that Philip had gotten not long before this, he passed ouer into Europe side; and in short space mattered the Chersonesus. Thence went hee to Lylimachia: which the Thracians had gotten and deftroied, when Philip withdrew his Garrison thence, to employ it in the Roman warre. The Ætolians objected as a crime vnto Philip, in the Conference before T. Quintius, that he had oppressed Lysmachia, by thrusting thereinto a Garrison. Hercunto Philip made answer, that his Garrison did not oppresse the Towne, but saue it from the Barbarians: who tooke and fackt it, as foone as the Macedonians were gone. That this answer was good and substantiall, though it were not accepted as such; might appeare by the miferable case, in which Antiochus found Lysimachia at his comming 20 thither. For the Towne was vtterly razed by the Barbarians; and the people, caried away into flauerie. Wherefore the King tooke order to haue it reedified : as also to redeeme those that were in bondage; and to recollect as many of the Citizens, as were dispersed in the Countrie thereabout. Likewise he was carefull to allure thither, by hopefull promifes, new inhabitants; and to replenish the Cittie with the wonted frequencie. Now to the end that men should not be terrified from comming thither to dwel, by any feare of the neighbour Thracians; he tooke a journic in hand against those barbarous people, with the one halfe of his Armie; leaving the other halfe, to repaire the Citic. These paines he tooke; partly in regard of the convenient situation, and former glorie of Lysimachia; partly for that he thought it 30 highly redounding vnto his owne honour, to recover and establish the dominion in those parts, which his fore-father Seleneus Nicator had won from Lysimachus, and thereby made his Kingdome of greater extent, than it occupied in any following time. But for this ambition he shall dearely pay : and as after that victoric against Lysimathus, the death of King Seleucus followed shortly; so shall a deadlic wound of the Kingdome founded by Seleucus enfue verie speedily, after the reconquest of the fame Countrie, which was the last of Seleucus his purchases, or the Roman, though they were vnable to function their defire of war with Antiochus, whereof notice was alreadie taken both by their friends and by their enemies: yet was it much againft their will to keepe the rumour on foot, which they meant thortly to make good, of this intended warre, so long as they wanted matter of quarrell; whereof they were furnished, by this enterprise of the Kings about Lysimachia. It was not long, tince King Attalus, a friend and belper of the Romans in their war with Philip, could obtain of them none other help against Antierbus, than Embalfadors to fipcake for him; becaufe the one of the Kings was held no leffe a friend than the other. Neither did there afterwards paffe between them any other offices, than verie friendly. Antierbus, at the requeft of their Embalfadors, withdrew his Inustion from the Kingdom of Pergams: allo verie thortly after he fent Embalfadours to them, to make a perfect League of amitie between them. This was while as yet they were builed with Philip; and therfore had reason to answer his good will with good acceptation: as they did in outward flew. But when the Macedonian war was at an end, and all, or most of all the States in Greece, were become little better than Cli-10 enes with the Romans: then was all this good correspondence changed, into termes of worfe, but more plaine, meaning. For T. Quintius, with his ten Counfailors fent from Rome, required (as hath beene * flewed before) with a commination of war, this kings gratuation of their victorie; as also his long-profested amitic, and defire

These ten Counsailors were able to informe T. Quintin, and acquaint him with the purpose of the Senate: whereof yet it seemes that he was not ignorant before ; fince, in regard of Antiochus, he was the more inclinable vnto peace with Philip. It was therefore agreed, when they divided themselves to make progresse through diuers quarters of Greece for the execution of their late Decree, That two of them 20 should visit King Antiochius; and the rest, where occasion served, vse diligence to make a partie strong against him. Neither was the Senate at Rome vinmindfull of the busines: wherein lest T. Quintius, with his ten Ashstants, should happen to forget any thing to their parts belonging ; L. Cornelius was lent from Rome of purpole, to deale with the King about those controuersies, that were betweene him and Ptolemie. What other private instructions Cornelius had; wee may coniecture by the mannaging of this his Embaffage. For comming to Selymbria: and there vnderstanding that P. Villius and L. Terentius, having beene sent by Titus, were at Lysimachis, He hastned thither; whither also came P. Lentulus (another of the ten Counfailours) from Bargilla, to be present at the Conference. Hegesianax and Lysias were 20 also there; the same, who had lately brought from Titus those peremptorie Conditions, which the Embaffadours present shall expound vntotheir Master. After a few daies Antiochus returned from his Thracian Expedition. The meeting and entertainment betweene Him and these Romans, was in appearance full of loue. But when they came to treat of the busines in hand; this good mood was quitealtered. L. Cornelius, in two or three words, briefly delivered his errand from Rome: which was, That Antiochus had reason to deliuer backe vnto Ptolemie those Townes of his, whereof he had lately gotten possession. Hereunto he added, and that verie earnestly, That he must also give vp the Townes of late belonging vnto Philip; and by him newly occupied. For what could be more abfurd, than fuch folly in the 40 Romans zas to let Antiochus enioy the profit of that war, wherein they had laboured fo much, and He done nothing? Further He warned the King, that hee should not molest those Cities that were free: and finally Hee demanded of him, vpon what reason he was come ouer with so great an Armie into Europe; for that other cause of his journie there was none probable, than a purpose to make war vpon the Romans. To this the King made answer, That hee wondered why the Romans fhould so trouble themselves, with thinking upon the matters of Asia: wherewith He praied them to let him alone; euen as He, without such curiositie, suffered them to doe in Italie what they thought good. As for his comming ouer into Europe: they faw well enough what bulines had drawne him thither ; namely, the warre against the barbarous Thracians: the rebuilding of Lysimachia, and the recourie of Townes to him belonging, in Thrace and Cherfone fus. Now concerning his title vnto that Countrie, He derived it from Seleucus: who made conquest thereof, by his victoric against Lysimachus. Neither was it so, that any of the places in controuersie betweene him and the other Kings, had beene still of old belonging to the Macedonians or Agyptians; but had beene feized on by them, or by others from whom they received them, at fuch time as his Ancestors, being Lords of those Countries, were hindred by multiplicitie of busines, from looking vnto al that was their owne. Finally he willed them, neither to fland in feare of him, as if hee intended ought against them from Lysimachia; since it was his purpose to bestow this Citie vpon one of his sonnes, that should reigne therein: nor yet to be greized with his proceedings in Alia; either against the free Cities, or against the King of Agypt; since it was his meaning to make the free Cities beholding vnto himselfe, and to joyne ere long with Ptolemie, not onely in freindship, but in a bond of neare affinitie. Cornelius ha-10 uing heard this, and being perhaps vnable to refute it; would needes heare further, what the Embaffadours of Smyrna and of Lampfacus, whom he had there with him, could fay for themselues. The Embassadors of Lampfacus being called in, began a tale: wherein they feemed to accuse the King before the Romans, as it were before competent ludges. Antiochus therefore interrupted them, and bade them hold their peace : for a fmuch as he had not chosen the Romans, but would rather take the Citizens of Rhodes, to be Arbitrators betweene Him and them.

CHAP.5. S.4. of the Historie of the World.

Thus the Treatic held some sew daies, without any likelihood of essect. The Romans, hauring not laide their complaints in such fort, as they might be a conuent condition of the war by them intended: nor yet having purpose to depart well as the matter, in such wise as they might neither too rudely, like boilstrous Gallo-Greekes, pretend onely the goodnes of their (wordes; nor yet ouer modelly, to retain among the Greekes an opinion of their institute, forbeare the occasion of making themselves great. The King on the other side was wearie of these tedious guests; that would take none answer, and yet sacre knew what to say. At length came newes, without any certaine author, That Ptolemie was dead. Hercof neither the King, nor the Roman; would take notice, though each of them were desirous to has seen into a segret: Antiochus, to take possession in good order. Cornelius was seen.

130 ims, to predere thin thereof, and let the Countrie in good order. Earlian was the from Rome Embalfadour, both to Antischus and to Ptolemie: which gaue him occasion to take leave, and prepare for his Legiptian voyage. Both He, and his fellow Embalfadors, had good leaute to depart all together: and the King forthwith made readie, to be in Legipt with the first. To his fonne Seleusus he committed his Armie; and left him to ouer-fee the building of Lyfmechis: but all his Sea-forces Hee took ealong with him, and failed with Ephelius. Thence he fent Embalfadours to T. Quintins: whom he requested to deale with him in this matter of Peace, after such fort, as might shand with honestic and good faith. But as he was further proceeding on his voyage; He was perfectly informed that Ptolemie was aline. This made him was accommended to the proceeding on his voyage; and the many from Legipt: and afterwards a tempers, with a greatous ship-wrack, made him, without any further attempt on the way, glad to baue safely rewards a tempers.

coursed his Port of Seleucia. Thence went he to Antiochia, where he wintered : secure, as might appeare, of the Roman war.

But the Romans had not fo done with him. During the Treatic at Lyssmachias, (at leastwife not long before or after it) one of their Embasiladours that had beene fent vinto the Assachiam gaue him counsaile, as in a point highly tending to his good; Not to reficontented with the Peace which was granted vinto him by the Romans, but to desire societie with them, whereby they should bee bound to have the same friends and enemies. And this he adulted him to doe quickly before the Warre brake out with Anisohus; lest otherwise he might seeme, to have awaited some fit occasion of taking Armes againe. They who dealt thus plainly, did not meane to be satisfied with weake excuses. In like manner some of the Greeks were follicited; and particularly the Anisohus, That constantly and faithfully they should ablide in the friendship of the People of Rome. It was needlesse to say plain-by whereto this entreatic tended: the froward answere made by the Estalians, deciares them to have well vinderflood the purpose. They complained, that they were notalike honoured by the Romansafter the Victorie, as they had beene during the Warre. They that so complained were the most moderate of them. Others cryed out, that they had beene wronged, and defrauded of what was promifed vinto them: vipbrayding withall the Romans, as mento them beholding; not onely for their Victorie ouer Philip; but even for helping them to set foot in Greece, which else they power could have done. Hereto the Roman gaue gentleanswers: telling them that there was no more to doe, than to send Embassadors to the Secretary and the good and then good and the most set where the interfece and then should like well.

nate, and otter their griefes; and then should all be well. Such care tooke the Romans in Greece, for their Warre intended against Antioclus. The fame hereof arriving at Carthage, gave mater vnto the enemies of Hanribal, wherewith both to pick a thanke of the Roman Senare; and to chace out of their Citie this honourable man, whom they fo greatly hated. He had of late exercifed his vertue against them in the Civill administration; and given them and ouerthrow, or two, in the long Robe. The Judges at that time bore all the fway in Carthage: holding their places during life; and having subject vnto them, the lives, goods, and fame of all the reft. Neyther did they yie this their power with moderation; but conspired in such wife together, that who so offended any one of them, should have them all to be his enemies; which being once knowne. He was fure to 20 be foone accused and condemned. In this their impotent rule of the Citie, Hannibal was chosen Prætor. By vertue of which Office, though hee was superiour vnto them during that yeare; yet had it not beene their manner to beare much regard vinto fuch an annual Magistrate, as at the yeares end must be accomptable to them. if ought were laid vnto his charge. Hannibal therefore fending for one of the Ouxftors, or officers of the Treasurie, to come and speake with him : the proud Ouxflor fet lightly thereby, and would not come. For he was of the aduerfe Faction to Himibal; and men of his place, were to bee chosen into the Order of Indges; in contemplation whereof, he was filled alreadic with the foirit of his future Greatpeffe. But he had not to doe with fuch a tame Practor, as were they that had occur 30 pied the place before. Hamibalfent for him by a Purliuant; and having thus apprehended him, brought him into judgement before a publique affemblie of the people. There he not onely shewed, what the vidutifull stubbornesse of this Queftor had beene; but how vnfufferable the infolencie of all the Indgesatthe prefent was: whose vnbridled power, made them to regard neyther Lawes nor Magifirates. To this Oration when he perceived that all the Citizens were attentive and favourable; He forthwith propounded a Law, which paffed with the generall good liking; That the Judges should be chosen from yeare to yeare, & no one man be continued in that Office two yeares together. If this Law had beene paffed before he passed ouer Iberus: it would not perhaps have beene in the power of Hanno, 40 to have brought him vnto necessitie of reforming another greinance, concerning the Roman Tribute. This Tribute the Carthaginians were faine to levie by Taxation laied upon the whole Commonaltie; as wanting monie in their publique Treasurie, wherewith to defray eyther that, or divers other needfull charges. Hannibal confidering this, beganne to examine the publique Reuennes; and to take a perfect note, both how much came into the Treasurie, by waves and meanes what focuer; and in what fort it was thence laid out. So he found, I hat the ordinarie charges of the Common-wealth did not exhaust the Treasurie: but that wicked Magistrates, and corrupt Officers, turning the greatest part of the monies to their owne vie, were thereby faine to load the people with needlesse burdens. Hereof he made such plaine demonstration, that these Robbers of the common Treasure were compelled to reflore, with flame, what they had gotten by knauerie; and fo the Carthaginians were freed from the necessitie of making such poore shifts; as formerly they had vsed, when they knew not the valew of their owne Estate. But as the vertue of Hannibal, was highly commended by all that were good Citizens: fo they of the Roman Faction, which had, fince the making of the peace vntill now, little regarded him, beganne to rage extremely; as being by him stript of their ilgotten goods, and il-employed authoritie, both at once, even when they thought themselues to have beene in full possession of the vanquished Carthage. Wherefore they fent letters to their friends at Rome: wherein they complained, as if the Barchine Faction grew strong againe, and Hannibal would shortly be in armes. Queftionlesse, if oppressing the Citie by injustice, and robbing the Treasurie, were the onely way to hold Carthage in peace with Rome : these enemies to the Barchines 10 might well crie out, That having done their bestalreadie to keepe all in quiet, they faw none other likelihood than of Warre. But having none other matter to alleadge, than their owne inventions: they faid, That Hannibal was like vnto a wild healt, which would never be tamed: That fecret melfages past betweene him, and King Antiochius : and that hee was wont to complaine of idlenesse, as if it were harmefull to Carthage; with what elfe to like effect they could imagine. These accufations they directed not vnto the Senate : but addressing their letters craftily, cuericone to the best of his owne friends at Rome, and such as were Senators; they wrought so well, that neyther publike notice of their Conspiracie was taken at Carthage; nor the authoritic of the Roman Senate, wanting to the furtherance of their 20 malicious purpose. Onely P. Scipio is faid to have admonished the Fathers, that Sapph is laid to hate datholiment the Fanots, was they should not thus dishonourably stablerite, and become Seconds to the accupiers of Hamibal: as if they would oppresse, by suborning or countenancing false witnesses against him, the Man; against whom in warre they had not of long time preualled, nor vied their Victorie in such base manner, when they obtained it. But the Romans were not all so great-minded as Seipie: they wissled for some sites at unanage against Hamibal, and were glad to have sound it. Three Embassadours they sent ouer to Carthoge, C. Sernilius, Q. Terentius, and O.M. Claudius OMarcellus; whose verie names import sufficient cause of bad affection to Hamibal. These nating past the Sea, were entertained by those that had procured their commings and, being by them instructed how to carrie themselues, gaue out, That they were fent to end some controuers see sevene the Carthogians and Massinss. But Hamibal had kept such good espial upon the Romans, that hee knew their meaning well enough: against which he was never unprepared. It were enough to say. That thee estaped them by flight: but in the actions of so famous a man, I hold it.

not impertment to rehearfe the particularities. Hauing openly shewed himselfe, as was his manner, in the place of Assembly, He went forth of the Towne when it begannet to wexe darke, accompanied with two which were ignorant of his determination; though such as hee might well trust. Hee had appointed Horsesto bein a readinesse at certaine place: whence riding all night, Hee came to a Tower of his owne by the Sea-lide. There had hee a Ship surnished with all thinges needfull; as having long expected the necessific of some such journie. So Hee bad Assiried farewell; lamenting the missortune of his Countrie, more than his owne. Passing ouer to the lele of Cercina; he found there in the Hauen some Marchants ships of Carthsgae. They saluted him respectively: and the chiese among them beganne to enquire, whither he was bound. He said, Hee went Embassadour to Tyre: and that he intended there in the lland to make a facrifice; where the cleanistical all the Merchants, and Masters of the Shippes. It was hote weather: and therefore Hee would needs hold his Feast upon the shore; where, because there wanted covert, He made them bring thither all their failes and yards to be ved in stead of Tents. They did so, and sealed with him till it was late at night: at which time hee less that the stead of the ship of the ship of the said of the sa

All that night, and the day following, Hee was fure not to be epurfued. For the Merchants did neither make half to fend any newes of him to Carthage, as thinking him to be gone Embalfadour: neyther could they, without fome lofte of time, fuch of them as Kkkkk made made most speed homeward, get away from Cereina; being busied awhile in fitting their tackle. At Carthage, the misse of to great a person was diuersly constitued. Some ghetical aright, I hat he was fled. But the more common opinion was, That the Roman had made him away. At length came newes where hee had bin seen e and then the Roman Embassacours, having none other errand thither accurded bim (with an eull grace) as a troub er or the Peace, whereby they onely discourred the mischiefe by them intended against him, and the makee of their Senate; missing the while their purpose, and cauting men to vnderstand, that Hee sted not thus without great reason.

Hamnbal, comming to Type the Mother-Citic of Cathage, was there entertained I Royally: as one, in whose great worth and honour the Tyrian, by reason of affinite betweener then Cities, thought themselves to have interest. Thence wenthe to Antioch; and, finding the King departed, visited his sonne in Daphne: who friendly welcommed him, and sent him with his Father at Ephesia, that exceedingly re-

As Antiochus had cause to be glad, in that he had gotten Hannibal: so had the Romans no great cause to be therefore sorrie; otherwise than as they had much difgraced themselues, by discouerie of their impotent malice, in chacing him thus out of his Countrie. For it would not proue alike casie vnto this great Commander. to make front fouldiors of base Afiatiques; as it had beene by his trayning and discipline, to make verie feruiceable and skilfull men of Warre of the Spaniards, Africans, Gaules, and other Nations, that were hardie though vnexperienced. Or were it supposed, that one mans worth, especially being so extraordinarie, could alter the nature of a cowardly people : yet was it therewith all confiderable, that the vanities of Antiochus, the pride of his Court, the balencife of his Flatterers, and a thoufand other fuch vexations, would be farre more powerfull in making vnprofitable the vertue of Hannibal; now a defolate and banished man, than had beene the villanic of Hanno and his Complices, hindering him in those Actions wherein he had the high Command, and was seconded by his warlike brethren. Wherefore the name of this Great Carthaginian, would onely helpe to ennoble the Roman Victoric or if it further (crued to hearten Antochus, and make him leffe carefull to auoid the warre; then should it further serve, to justifie the Romans in their quarrell. And it feemes indeed, that it was no little part of their care, to get a faire pretence of making warre. For Antiochus, as is said before, having newly sent Embassadours to T. Quintius, requiring that the Peace might faithfully be kept: it was not probable, that Hee had any meaning to take armes; vnleffe by meere violence hee were thereto enforced. Onely the Ltolians were greatly suspected, as a turbulent peoplc, desirous of innovation, and therefore practifing with this Great King; whom they wished to see among them in Greece. In this regard, and to appeale them; they had of late beene answered with gentle words by one of the tenne Counsailours, 40 That the Senate would grant them what soener with reason they should aske. But this promife was too large, and vnaduifed. For when their Embassadours came to Rome, the Senate would grant them nothing; but wholly referred them to T, Quinttus, who fauoured them leaft. Hereat they murmured, but knew not how to right themselues: otherwise than by speaking such words, as might hasten the Romans out of Greece for verie shame; who had no desire to be thence gone.

The daily talke at Rome was of warre with Annothus, but in Greece, when the Romans would leave the Countrie. For the Annothus, were wont to vpbraid the rest of the Greekes, with the vaine libertie which the Romans had proclaimed: saying, That these their Deliverers had laid heavier setters youn them, than formerly stopy did weare; but yet brighter and fairer, than those of the Macedonian: likew ise, That it was a gracious as to firms, to take from the legs of the Greeks their chaine, & tie it about their necks. There was indeed no cause of tarrying loger in Greece, sisthe Romans had no other mening than what they precended For Philip had made no de-laie, in accomplishment of that which was laid you him; all the Townes of Greece were at libertie; and the whole Countrie at peace, both with the Romans, and within it felfe. As for Antiochus: He made it his daily fuit, That the Peace betweene him and Rome, fuch as it was, might be confirmed, and strengthned by a League of more affurance. Neuertheleffe T. Quintius would needs feare that Antiochus means forthwith to feize vpon Greece, as foone as he and his Armie were thence departed. And in this regard, He retained ftill in his own hands Chalcis, Demetrias, and the A. crocorinthus: by benefit of which Townes, he might the better withstand the dangerous Inualion like to be made by Antiochus. Suteable vnto the doings of Outntius were the reports of the tenne Embassadours, that had beene sent ouer to affist him; when they returned backe into the Citie, Antiochus, they faid, would questionleffe fall upon Greece: wherein he should find not onely the Etolians, but Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedamon, readie to giue him entertainment. Wherefore there was none other way, than to doe fomewhat against these their suspected enemies: especially against Nabis, who could worst make resistance; whilest Antiochus was farre away in Syria, and not intentine to his businesse. These reports went not onely current through the Citiel, among the vulgar: but found such credit with the chiefe of the Senate, that in the following yeare, against which time it was expected that Antiochus should bee readie to take his great enterprise in hand ; P. Cornelius Scipio the African defired, and obtained, a fecond Confulthip, with intention to be Generall in the Warre, against the King and his Hannibal, For the prefent, the bulineffe with Nabis was referred vnto Titus; to deale with him as hee thought good. This would be a faire colour of his longer tarriance in Greece. Therefore he was glad of the employment; whereofalfo heeknew that many of the Greekes would not be forrie; though for his owne part, he wanted all good pretence of taking it in hand. For Nabis had entred into friendship with him, two or three yeares before this, as is alreadic shewed, whilest he had warre with Philip: and had further beene contented for the Romans fake to bee at peace with the cheans, neyther fince that time had be done any thing, whereby hee should draw 30 vpon himselfethis Warre. Hee was indeed a detestable Tyrant, and hated of the Acheans; as one, that besides his owne wicked Conditions had formerly done to them great mischiefe. Titustherefore had a plausible Thome, whereon to discourse before the Embassages of all the Confederate Cities; Which hee caused to meet for that purpose at Corinth. He told them, That in the warre with Philip, not onely the Greekes, but the Romans themselves, had each their motives apart (which he there briefly rehearfed) that fliould flirre them vp, and cause them to be carness. But in this which he now propounded to them concerning Nabis, the Romans had none other interest, than onely the making perfect of their bonour, in setting all Greece at libertie: which noble Action was in some fort maimed, or incompleat. 40 whileft the noble Citie of Argos was left in subjection to a Tyrant, that had lately occupied it. It therefore belonged vnto them, the Greeks, duly to confider, whether they thought the deliverance of Argosa matter worthic to be undertaken; or whether other wife to avoid all further trouble, they could bee well contented to leave it as it was. This concerned them, and not the Romans: who intaking this worke in hand, or letting it alone, would wholly be ruled by the Greekes themselues. The Athenian Embaffador made answere hereunto verie eloquently, and as pleasing as he could deuife. He gaue thankes to the Romans for what was past; extolled their vertues at large; and magnified them highly in regard of this their Proposition: wherein vnrequefted they freely made offer to continue that bountie, which at the vehement request of their poore Associates, they had alreadic of late extended vnto the Greekes. To this Hee added, That great pittie it was to heare, fuch notable vertue and high deferts ill spoken of by some : which tooke vpon them, out of their owne imaginations to foretell, what harme these their Benefactors meant to doe hereafter; when as Thankfulnes rather would have required an acknowledg-Kkkkkk 2

ment, of the benefits and pleasures alreadie received. Everie one found the meaning of this last clause; which was directly against the Atolians. Wherefore Alexander the Atolian role vp , and told the Athenians their owne: putting them in minde of their ancient gloric, in those times when their Citie had beene the Leader of all Greece, for detence and recoverie of the libertie generall : from which honour they were now fo farre fallen, that they became Paralites vnto those whom they thought mo ft mightie; and by their bate affentation, would lead all the reft into seruitude. Then spake He against the Acheans, Clients that had beene a long time vnto the Macedonian; and fouldiors of Philip, vntill they ranne away from his aduersitie. These Heesaid had gotten Corinth, and must now have warre be made for their fakes, to the end that they might also bee Lords of Argos: whereas the Ætolians, that had first made warre with Philip, and alwayes beene friends vnto the Romans, were now defrauded of some places, anciently to them belonging. Nevther did hee thus containe himselfe, but objected vnto the Romans fraudulent dealing : for a fmuch as they kept their Garrifons in Demetrias, Chaleir, and the Acrocorinth; having beene alwayes wont to professe, That Greece could never be at libertie, whilest those places were not free. Also now at last, what else did they seeke by this discourse of warre with Nabis, than businesses wherewith to find themfelues occupied, that fo they might have fome feeming cause of abiding longer in the Countrie? But they should doe well, if they meant as they spake, to carrie 20 their Legions home out of Greece: which could not indeed be free, till their departure. As for Nabis; the Atolians themselves did promise, and would undertake, That they would exther cause him to yelld to reason, and relinquish Argos freely, withdrawing thence his Garrison; or else compell him by force of Armes, to submit him selfe to the good pleasure of all Greece, that was now at vnitie. These words had beene reasonable, if they had proceeded from better men. But it was apparent, that no regard of the common libertie wrought fo much with these Atolians; as did their owne rauenous defire of oppreffing others, and getting vnto themfelues, that worfe would yfe it, the whole Dominion in Greece, which Philip had loft. Neyther could they well discemble this; making it no small part of their greiuance. 30 That the old League was forgotten: wherein it had beene conenanted, That the Romans should enjoy the spoile of all, but leave the Townes and Lands in possesfion of the Liolians. This, and the remembrance of a thousand mischiefes by them done in former times, made the whole Assembly, especially the Achans, crie out vpon them; entreating the Romans to take fuch order before they went, that not onely Nabis might be compelled to doe right; but the Atolian theeves be enforced to keepe home, and leave their neighbours in quiet. All this was highly to the pleafure of Titus: who faw, that by discountenancing the Ltolians, He was become the more gracious with all the rest. But whether it pleased him so well, that Antiochus his Embassadors did presently after lie hard vpon him, to draw the peace to some 40 good conclusion, it may be greatly doubted. Hee cast them off with a slight answere : telling them, That the ten Embassadors or Counsailors which had beene fent vnto him from Rome to be his affistants in these matters of weight, were now returned home; and that, without them, it was not in his power to conclude vpon any thing.

Now concerning the Lacedemonian warre; it was verie foone ended. For Thus vled the helpe of all his Confederates; and made as great preparation againft Nobis, both by Land and Sea, as it he floud had used to doe with Philip. Befleds the Raman forces, King Eumene with a Nauic, and the Rhodian Fleet, were inuited to the ferrice: as also Philip of Macedon fent aid by Land; doing therein poorely, whether 50 it were to get favour of the Romans, or whether to make one among the number, in feeking reuenge ypon Nabis, that had done him iniurie. But the most forward in this Expedition were the Abeans, who see four ten thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse. As for the Abelians: rather to hold good fashion, and found their disponents.

fitions, than in hope to speed, their helpe was required; wherof they excused themfelues as well as they thought best. Thus are the Asheans now become the prime freinds of the Romans in Greece; basing remoued the Asheans from that degree of fauour like as they themselues hereaster (though not in all hash) shal bee supplanted by the same Lacedenomians, against whom they are now marching.

Some of the Arginess more bold than wife, began a confpiracie against the Lacedomnium that held their Towne; meaning to open their gates who the Roman, But ere Titus drew neare, they were all detected and faline: excepting a verie few, that escaped out of the Towne. The same of this Commotion, caused the Armie or march apace toward Argos; with hope to be there, before things were at quiet. But there was no stirre within the Walles: the execution done yon the first movers, having terrified all the reflorthe Citizens. Titus then thought it better, to assain gretrified all the reflorthe Citizens. Titus then thought it better, to assain the head of his strength at Lacedomon, than to consume time about other places; escaped by the consumer of th

Nibis had in readines an Armie of fifteene thousand, wherewith to defend himfelfe against these Inuaders. Five thousand of them were Mercinaries : the rest, of his owne Countrie; but fuch as were of all others the worst, as manumifed slaues, malefactors, and base peasants, vnto whom his T yrannie was beneficiall. Of the good and worthic Citizens he flood in doubt: and fince he could not hope to win their love, his meaning was to hold them quiet by feare. He called them all to an Affemblie : and compaffing them round in with his Armie, told them of the danger that was toward him and them. If they could agree within themselves ; they might, he faid, hope the better to withstand the common Enemie. But forasmuch as turbulent heads were inuited by light occasions, to raise tumults, and work dangerous treason: it seemed vnto him the safest, and ( withall) the mildest course, to arrest before hand and put in ward, al those whom he found most reason to suspect. So should he keepe them innocent perforce; and thereby presente not onely the 30 Citie and his owne person from danger, but them also from the punishment, which else they might have incurred. Hereupon he cites and apprehends about fourescore of them; whom he leads away to prison, and the next night puts them all to death. Thus was he fure that they neither should offend, nor yet breake loose. As for the death of them, if it should happen to be noised abrode : what could it else doethan terrifie the people; who must thereby understand, that it was a mortall crime to be suspected? And to the same purpose, his crueltie extended it selfe vnto fome poore wretches: whom he accused of a meaning to flie to the Enemic. These were openly whipt through all the firects, and flaine. Hauing thus affrighted the Citizens; Heeturned the more freely all his thoughts toward the Enemie, that 40 came on apace. He welcommed them with a fallie: wherein, as commonly happens, the fouldiours of the Towne had the better at first; but were at length repelled with loffe. Titus abode not many daies before Sparta: but ouer-ranne the Countric; hoping belike to prouokethe Tyrant forth to battaile. The Roman Fleet at the same time, with King Eumenes and the Rhodians, laid siege vnto Gyttheum, the onely or principall Hauen-towne that Nabis had. Likely they were to haue taken it by force; when there appeared hope of getting it by treason. There were two Governours within the Towne, equall in authoritie : whereof the one, either for feare, or defire of reward, had a purpose tolet in the Romans. But the other finding what was in hand, and being somewhat more faithfull, flue the Traitor; after 50 whose death, he himselfe alone made the better desence. Yet when T. Quintius with part of his Armie came thither to Gyttheum: this Captaine of the Towne had nor the heart to abide the vttermost, and await what either Time or his Master might doe for him, but was contented to give vp the place; yet vpon Condition, to depart in safetie to Sparta with his Garrison. Pythagoras, the sonne-in-law of Nabis, and brother vnto his wife, was come from Argos, whereof he had the Gouernment Kkkkkk 2

with a thousand fouldiors Mercinaries, and two thousand Argines: it being (as may feeme) the T yrants purpofe, to relieue Gyttheum : which hee thought would haue held longer out. But when they heard that it was loft : then began they to thinke vpon finishing the war, by some reasonable Composition. Prthagoras therefore was fent Embaffador to Titus: requesting onely, that he would appoint a time and place for Aabis to meet and speake with him . This was granted. In that Parlee the Tyrant spake veric reasonably for himselfe: prouing, that hee suffered wrong, and had done none; and that by many good arguments; whereof the fumme was. That what socuer they now did, or could, object vnto him, was of elder date than the League which they had made with him. Whereupon he inferred, That nei. 10 ther for his keeping the Towne of Argos, nor for any other cause by them alleadged, they ought to make warre vpon him; fince arges, and all other their allegations whatfocuer, had not hindred them, in time of their more need of him, from entring into that League with him; which was neuer broken on his part, nor ought to be on theirs. But Quinting was not herewith fatisfied. Hee charged him with Tyrannie; and gaue instance, as casily he might, of divers barbarous cruelties by him committed. In all which points, for a funch as they knew this Mabis to be quiltie, before they made Peace and Confederacie with him; it was expedient, that fre, before they made react and Confedence in the form other cause of this Inuation should be alledged. Wherefore hee said further, That this Tyrant had occupied Meffene, a Towne Confederate with the Romans: That he had bargained to joyne with Philip, when he was their enemic, not onely in League, but also in affinitie : and That his Fleet had robbed many of their ships, about the Cape of Malea. Now touching this Piracie, fince in the Articles by Titus propounded vnto Mabis there was no reflitution mentioned, other than of thips by him taken from the Greekes his neighbours, with whom he had long held warre: it may feeme to have beene objected, onely by way of Complement, and to enlarge the volume of those complaints, that were otherwise verie friuolous. As for Meffene, and the bargaine of Alliance made with Philip : they were matters foregoing the League, that was made betweene the Romans and this Tyrant; and therefore notto haue beene mentioned. All this it feemes that Ariflanus, the Prætor of the 30 Acheans, verie well perceived: who therfore doubting left the Romans, (that were wont to talke so much of their owne inflice, honour, and faithfull dealing) should now relent, and forbeare to molest him, who, though a wicked man, was yet their Confederate, and had neuer done them wrong; framed his discourse to an other end. He entreated Nabis to confider well of his owne effate; and to fettle his fortunes, whilest he might doe it without hazard: alleadging the examples of many Tyrants that had ruled in the neighbour-cities, & therein committed great outrages; yet were afterwards contented to forrender their Estates, and lived in great securitie, honour, and happines, as private men. Thus they discoursed vntill night. The next day Nabis was contented to relinquish Argos; and requested them, to de- 40 liver vnto him in writing their other demands, that hee might take counfaile with his friends. The iffue of all was, That, in regard of the charges, whereat the Confederates must be, for maintenance of an Armie to lie in Leaguer all that Winter (as there was no hope of making short worke) before the Citie of Sparta: they were contented to make peace with the Tyrant, vpon fuch Conditions as Titus should thinke meete. Belides the restitution of Argos, and all the places thereon depending; Titus propounded many other Conditions to Nabis, and some of them verie greiuous. He would not suffer the Lacedamonian to have ought to doe in the lle of Crete; no, nor to make any Confederacies, nor war, either in that Iland or elf-where;

shipping, than two small Barkes; besides many other troublesome injunctions;

with imposition of an hundred talents in siluer to be paid out of hand, and fiftie talents yeerely, for eight yeares next enfuing. For observance of these Couenants he demanded five hostages, such as he himselfe should name; and one of them to be the T yrants owne fonne. If it had beene the meaning of Time, to withdraw the war from Nibis, because it was not grounded vpon inflice; then had it been enough, if not more than enough, to take Argos from him; which hee himfelfe did ofter, though it were for feare, to deliver vp. But if it were thought reasonable, to dispensed little with the Romain faith; in regard of the great benefit which thereby might redound who the state of their belt freinds in Greeze, by the extirpation of this Tyranie: then should this enterprise, when once it was taken in hand, have beene prosecuted vnto the verie vtmost. As for this middle course which the Romans held: as it was not honourable vnto them, to enrich themselves by the spoile of one that had not offended them: nor peasing to the Adhern who loaded it rough.

10 of one that had not offended them: nor pleafing to the Acheans, who indged it cuer after a great blemish to the noble acts of Titus: lo did it minister vnto the . Ætolians, and to fuch as curiously pried into the faults of those which tooke vpon them to be Patrons of Greece, no barren Subiect of malicious discourse. For since Philip, a King, and descended of many famous Kings, might not be suffered by these Masteriae Romans, to hold any one of those Countries or Townes in Greece, that had belonged unto his Ancestors: it was thought verie strange, that Lacedaman, once the most tamous Citic among all the Greekes, was by the same Romans left in possession of a Tyrant, that had virped it but yesterday; and He therein rooted by their authorities, as their freind and Confederate. Nation on the other side shought himssifts was or mercifully dealt withall, by the lelfe-fame Romans, whose amite he had preserved in time of a doubtfull warre, before the loue and affinite of the Macadonian King, that had committed the Citic of Ago into his hands. But failfly had hedealt with the Macadonian and failfly was he dealt with by those, to whom he did betake him felife. Among these Articles propounded, there was nothing that pleased him, saue onely that for the banished Lacadonnians, soft whom a great number were in the Roman Campe, having among them Agospois the natural King of Sparta, that being a yong child was driven out by Lyangus, the first of the Tyrants) there was made no provision, to have them restored vinto their Citic and Estates; but onely leave required for as many of their wives, as would be so contented, to live abroad with them in banishment. Wherefore he forbore to gine consent vinto these demands and sustained an assume that the remeines would soon.

manns; and untained an analute of two noping belief that the enemies would foone be wearie. But his fearefull nature flortly ouercame the refolution, which the fence of the feinitudes had put into him. So yeelding vnto all that had beene propounded, Hedeliuered the hoftages; and thereupon obtained peace, that was confirmed afterwards at Rome by the Senate and People. From this time forward, Hee thought the Romans more wicked than himfelie; and was readie vpon the first advantage, to doe them all mischiefe that be could.

The Argines had heard newes that Lesedamon was even at point of being taken.

This creeked them, and game them heart to thinke ypon their owne good. So they aduentured to fet ypon the Garrifon, which was much weakened, by the termoue of the three thouland carried thence by Pythagoras, to helpe the Tyrant at Sporta. There needed vnto their liberite no more, than that all of them joyntly should fee their hands to the getting of it; which no somer they did than they obtained it. Presently after this came T. Quintius to Argas, where he was joyfully welcommed. He was deservedly acknowledged as author of that benefit, whereon the Cittizens had laied hold without flaying for him: and that he might the better entitle himfels thereto, hee caused the libertie of the Argines to be proclaimed at the Nomeau games; as ratifying it by his authoritie. The Citic was annexed again to the Councell of Arbain, whereby the Arbain were not more fittengthened, than the Argines to themselves were secured from danger of relapse, into the same extremities out of the missing when the Argines.

After this, Tinus found little busines or none wherewith to set on worke his Armie in Greece. Antiochus was about to send another Embassage to Rome, desiring peace and friendship of the Senate. Things being therefore in appearance who

ly disposed vnto quiet; Scipio the African, that was chosen Consulat Rome, could not have his defire, of being fent Commander into Greece. The volincere meaning of Aniochus, and the tumultuous disposition of the Atolians, were held as considerations worthie of regard; yet not sufficient causes of making Warre. Neither appeared there any more honest way, of confuting the Atolians, and of throughly perfivading all the Greekes (which was not to be neglected by those that meant to affure unto themselues the Patronage of Greece) that the good of the Countrie, was their foleintent: than by withdrawing thence their Legions, and leaving the Nation vnto it felf, til occasion should be ripe, and cal them ouer again. Wherfore after Titus had spent a Winter there, without any matter of employment, eyther found, or at 10 anie neare distance appearing; he called an Assembly of Delegates, from all parts of Greece to Corinth: where hee meant to bid them farewell. There he recounted vnto them all that had passed since his comming into those parts; and willed them to value the Roman friendship, according to the difference of estate, wherein the Romans found and left them. Hereto headded some wholesome counsaile; touching the moderate vse of their libertie, and the care which they ought to have of living peaceably, and without faction. Laftly hee gaue vp Acrecorinthus to the Acheans; withdrawing thence the Roman Garrison, and promiting to doe the like (which verie soone he did) at Chalcis and Demetrias; that so it might bee knowne, what liers the Atolians were, who had accused the Romans, of a purpose to retaine those pla- 20 ces. With joyfull acclamations did the Greekes testifie their good liking of that which Titus had faid and done : as also (at his request) they agreed to ransome and enlarge all Romans, that had bin fold into their Countrie by Hannibal.

Thus Titus crowned his actions in Greece with an happie end; and by leaning the Countrie before his departure was vrged, left therein behind him the memorie of his vertue and benefits, vntainted by jealousic and suspition of any cuill meaning. At his comming to the Citie, He had the honour of a Triumph; which was the goodlieft of all that Rome had vntill that day beheld. Three dayes together the thew of his pompe continued: as being fet out with the spoiles of a Countrie, more aboundant in things worthie of fuch a spectacle, than any wherein the Romans had 30 before made Warre. All forts of Armes, with Statues and curious peeces of Braffe or Marble, taken from the Enemie, were carried in the first dayes Pageant. The fecond day, was brought in, all the treasure of Gold and Siluer: some in the rude Masse vnwrought; some, in diuerse sorts of Coine; and some, in Vessels of fundrie kindes, that were the more highly prized by the workemanship. Among these were tenne shieldes, all of Silver; and one of pure Gold. The third day Titus himselfe entred the Citie in his Triumphant Chariot. Before him were carried an hundred and fourteene Crownes of Gold, bestowed vpon him by diverse Cities. There were also led the beafts for Sacrifice; the Prisoners, and the hostages: among which, Demetrias the sonne of King Philip, and Armenes the sonne of Nabis, were principall. After him sollowed his Armie; and (which added much grace, and good liking, to the Shew) the Roman Captines, by his procurement redeemed from flauerie in Greece.

Not long after his Triumph. He procured audience of the Senate for many Embaffages, that were come out of Greece and Asia. They had all verie fauourable answeres, excepting those of King Antiochus: whom the Senate would not heare, but referred ouer to T. Quintius, and the tenne that had beene his Counsailors; because their businesse was said to be somewhat intricate. Hereat the Kings Embasfadours wondred. They faid vnto Titus and his Affociates. That they could not discerne wherein consisted any perplexitie of their message. For all Treaties of peace and friendship, were either betweene the Victor and the vanquished; be- 50 tweene those, that having warred together were voon equall termes of advantage; or betweene those that had lived alwaies in good agreement, without any quarrell. Vnto the Victor, they faid, that the vanquilhed must yeeld; and patiently endure

CHAP.5 . S.4. of the Historie of the World. the impolition of some Couenants, that else might seeme vnreasonable. Where Warre had beene made, and no aduantage gotten: there was it viuall to demand and make restitution, of things and places claimed, gotten, or lost; accordingly as both parts could agree. But between those which had neuer fallen out, there ought no Conditions of chablishing friendship to bee proposed ! since it was reasonable. that each part should hold their owne, and neyther carrie it selfe as superiour vnto the other, in prescribing ought that might be troublesome. Now of this last kind. was the League and friendship that had beene so long in conclusion, betwixt Antiochus and the Romans. Which being fo : they held it strange that the Romans 10 should thus infift on points no way concerning them, and take upon them to prescribe vnto the King, what Cities of Asia he lhould set at libertie; from what Cities they would give him leave to exact his wonted Tributes; eyther putting, or not putting, his Garrisons into them, as the Senate should thinke fit. Hereto Ouintius answered. That since they went so distinctly to worke, He would also doe the like. Wherefore he propounded vato them two Conditions, and gaue them their choice whether to accept : Eyther that it should be lawfull for the Romans, to take partin Asia with any that would feeke their friendship; Or, if King Antiochus misliked this, and would have them forbeare to meddle in Afa, that then Hee should abandon what focuer he had gotten in Europe. This was plaine dealing; but no 20 reasonable nor pertinent answere, to that which the Kings Embassadours had propounded. For if the Romans might be hired to abstaine from Asia, by the gift of all that Antiochus had lately wonne in Europe: then did not the affaires of Smyrna, Lamblacus, or any other Miatiques, whome they were pleased to reckon as their Confederates, bind them in honour to make warre with a King that fought their loue, and had neuer done them injurie. But they knew very well, that Antiochus could not without great shame be so base, as to deliuer vp vnto them the Citie of Lylimachia, whereon of latehe had bin at fo much cost; in building it vp euen from the foundations, and repeopling it with inhabitants, that had all beene dispersed, or captine to the Barbarians. And so much the Embassadours with great indignation 30 alleadged: faying, that Antiochus desired friendship of the Romans; but so, as it might fland with his honour. Now in point of honour, the Romans tooke vpon them as if their cause were farre the superiour. For it was, they said, their purpose, to fet at libertie those Townes, which the King would oppresse and hold in subjection: especially fince those Townes were of Greekish bloud and language; and fell in that regard under the patronage, which Rome had affoorded unto all Greece befides. By this colour they might soone haue left Antiochus King of not many fubicets on the hither fide of Euphrates. Neyther did they forbeare to fay, That, vnleffe he would quit what he held in Europe, it was their meaning not onely to 40 protect those which relied vpon them in Asa, but therein to make new Alliances: namely (as might be understood) with such as were his subjects. Wherefore they vrged his Embassadous to come to a point, and tel them plainly which of these two Conditions their King would accept. For lacke of a plealing answere, which the Embassiadours could not hereto make; little wanted of giving presently defiance to the King. But they suffered themselves to bee entreated, and were contented once againe to fend ouer P. Villius, and others that had beene alreadie with the King at Lysimachiasby whom they might receive a finall answer, whether these demands made by Quintius and his Affociates would be accepted, yea, or no. By this refpite of time, and the fruitleffe Treaties enfuing, Antiechus got the leifure of two yeares, or thereabouts, to prepare for warre; finding in the Romans, all that while, no 50 disposition to let him liue in peace.

ð. V

Of the long Warres which the Romans had with the Gaules, Ligarians, and Spamards. Of M. Porcivs Cato. Invites done by Masaniss at the Carthaginian: that fue to the Romans for inflice.

He Insubrians, Boijans, and other of the Cisalpine, Gaules, together 10 with the Ligurians; made often, and (in a manner) continuall warre vpon the Romans in Italie, euen from such time as thamibal and his brother Mago departed thence, vntill such time as they themselues were vtterly subdued : which was not, before the Romans were almost at the height of their Empire. These Nations, having served vnder Mago for wages, and afterwards having gotten Amilear a Carthaginian, to be Leader vnto them all, as hath beene alreadie shewed; by this their fellowship in Armes, grew to be fuch willing partakers each of others fortune, that foldome afterwards eyther the Gaules or Ligurians did stirre alone, but that their companions, hearing it, were readie to fecond them. How the Romans first prevailed, and got large possession 20 Gallia Cifalpina now called Lumbardie; it hath beene long fince rehearled, betweene the first and second Punick Warres. As also it hath since appeared, how they lost the greatest part of their hold in that Countrie, by meanes of Hannibal his passage there-through. Neyther is it likely that the reconquest would have beene more difficult or tedious vnto the Romans, than was the first purchase:if, besides the greater employments which they had of their Armies abroad, their forces appointed unto this warre had not beene distracted by the Ligurians; that alwayes made them to proceed warily, having an eye to the danger at their backes. The Ligurians were a flout Nation, light and swift of bodie; well practifed in laying ambushes, and not discouraged with any ouerthrow, but forthwith readie to fight againe. 20 Their Countrie was mountainous, rough, woodie, and full of streight and dangerous passages. Few good Townes they had; but many Castles, exceedingly well fortified by nature : fo as without much labour, they could neyther bee taken nor belieged. They were also verie poore; and had litle or nothing that might give contentment, vnto a victorious Armie that should spoile their Land. In these respects they ferued excellently well, to traine up the Roman Souldiors to hardnesseand militarie patience: teaching them (besides other exercises of warre) to endure much, and live contented with a little. Their quarrell to Rome, grew partly from their loue vnto the Gaules, their neighbours and companions; partly from their delight in robbing and spoiling the Territorie of their borderers, that were subiect vnto Rome. But their obstinate continuance in the Warre which they had begunne, seemes to have beene grounded vpon the Condition of all Salvages; To be friends or foes, by custome, rather than by Judgment and to acknowledge no such vertue in Leagues, or formall conclusions of Peace, as ought to hinder them from vling their advantage, or taking revenge of injuries when they returne to minde. This qualitie is found in all, or most of the West-Indians: who, if they bee demanded a reason of the Warres betweene them and any of their neighbours, vie commonly this answere, It hath fill beene the custome for is and them, to fight one against the other.

Diners ouerthrowes, though none that were great, these Ligarians gaue vnto the possible statements of not fending any great Armies farre from home; perhaps, because they knew not how to make war, saue on their owne ground.

CHAP.5. S.5. of the Historie of the World.

The Countrie of Spaine, as it was the first part of the Continent out of Italie that became subject vnto the Romans: so was it the last of all their Provinces, which was wholly and throughly by them subdued. It is likened in figure by some Geographers vnto an Oxe hide: and the Romans found in it the propertie of that Oxe hide, which Calanus the Indian shewed vnto the Great Alexander, as an Embleme of his large Dominions. For, treading vpon any fide of it, the further parts would rife from the ground. And thus was it with Spaine. Seldome did it happen, that those parts, from which the Roman Armies lay furtheft, were not vo in rebellion. The Spaniar de were a verie hardie Nation, and eafily stirred up to armes; but had not much knowledge in the Art of warre, nor any good Captaines. They wanted also (which was their principall hinderance) good intelligence among themselues: and being divided into many small Signories, that had little other communion than of language, they feldome or neuer prouided in generall for the common good of their Countrie; but made it their chiefe care, each of them to looke vnto their owne Territorie. Such private respects made them often to fall asunder; when many had vnited themselves together, for chacing out of the Romans. And these were the causes of their often ouerthrowes : as delire of libertie, rather than complaint of any wrong done to them, was the cause of their often taking ermes.

The Carthaginian had been accustomed, to make cuacuation of this Chollerick Spanish humour; by employing, as Mercinaries in their warres abroad, those that were most likely to be vinquiet at home. They had also taken souldiers from one part of the Countrie, and wied them in an other: finding means to pay them all, out of the profits which they raysed ypon the whole Countrie; as being farre better husbands, and of more dexteritie than were the Remans, in that kind. But contrariswise the Remans, wing the service of their owne Legions, and of their sure friends the Latine, had little buffiels for the Spanier's, and therefore were saine to have much businessite with them. Spaine was too farre distant, and withall too 30 great, for them to send our Colonies thither, whereby to hold it in good order, according to the course that they took in staire. Wherefore it remained, that they should alwayes maintaine such Armies in the Countrie, as might serve to hold it in obedience persorce, and such heedfull Captaines, as might be still readie to oppose the Barbarians in their first Commotion. This they did and thereby held the Countrie; though seldome in peace. Verie soone after the departure of Scipio, there was raised warre in Spaine against the Romans, even vpon the same generall ground, that was the foundation of all the Spanish warres following. It was thought unreasonable, that the Spaniards should one while helpe the Carthaginians against the Remans, and another while the 40 Romans against the Corthaginians; basely forgetting to helpe themselves against those that were strangers, yet vsurped the Dominion over them. But the forces which Scipio had left behind him in that Countrie, being well acquainted with the manner of warre in those parts, suppressed this Rebellion by many victories: and. together with subjection, brought peace vpon the Countrie; which lasted fine veares. This Victorie of the Romans, though it happily ended the warre : yet left it still remaining the cause of the warre; which after fine yeares brake out againe. The Spaniards fought a battaile with the Roman Proconful, whom they flew; and had agreat Victorie, that filled them with greater hopes. Yet the happie fuccesse of their Warres in Greece, made the Romans thinke it enough to fend thither two Prætors, and with each of them some two Legions. These did somewhat: yet not so much, but that M. Porcius Gato, who was Conful the yeare following, and fent into that Province; found at his comming little leffe to doe, than the reconquering of all Spaine. But it fell out happily, that all the Spaniards were not of one minde: fome were faithfull to Rome; and fome were idle beholders of the paines

that others tooke. Yet when Cato had wonne a great Victorie vpon the chiefe of them; they role against him in many parts of the Countrie, and put him to much new trouble. Whilest he was about to make a journie against those that were as yet vnfubdued : fome of the lately vanquished, were even readie to rebell. Hee therefore difarmed them: which they tooke so heavily, that many of them slew themselves for verie griefe. Hearing of this, and well vnderstanding, that such desperation might worke dangerous effects; Heecalled vnto him the principallamong them; and commending vnto them peace and quietneffe, which they never had diffurbed but vnto their own great loffe. He praied them to deuise what course might be take, for holding them affured vnto Rome, without further trouble. None 10 of them could, or would give counfaile in a matter of this nature. Having therefore talked with them once or twice, and finding their invention barren in this kind of Subject; He gaue expressecharge, That vpon a day appointed they should throw downe the wals of all their Townes. Afterwards he carried the Warre about from place to place; and with fingular industrie finished it in short time. Neyther thought he it any difgrace to him or to Rome, in this time of danger, to imitate the Carthaginians, and hire an Armie of the Celtiberians, against other of their Countrimen: excusing the indignitie, such as it seemed, with a left, That if he were vanguished and flaine, then should hee need to pay them nothing; whereas if he had the Victorie, he could pay them with the Enemies monie. Finally Hee brought the 20 Warre to so good end, that in long time after, though Spaine were often troublefome, yet was it in no danger of being loft. Heeincreased also the publike Reuenues in that Prouince, by caufing fome Mynes of Iron and Siluer to bee wrought. that had before laine vnregarded. Herein he did benefit the Common-wealth.by a vertue much agreeable to his owne peculiar disposition.

For this M. Cato was not onely verie notable in the Art of War, which might well be then termed The Occupation of the Romans; but so well furnished with all other vseful qualities, that verie litle was wating in him, which might seem requisite to the accomplishment of a perfect man. He was verie skilful in the Roman Lawes, a man of great Eloquence, and not vnprofitable in any busines eyther private or 20 publike. Many Books he wrot: wherof the principal were, of the Roman antiquities. and of hulbandrie. In matter of hulbandrie he was notable, and thereby most increafed his substance; being of meane birth, and the first of his House. Strong of bodie he was, and exceeding temperate: fo as hee lived in perfect health to verice oldage. But that which most commended him vnto the better fort of the Romans, was his great funceritie of life, abstinence from bribes, and fashioning himselfe to the ancient laudable Customes of the Citic. Herein he had merited fingular commendations, if the vehemencie of his nature had not caused him to maliene the vertue of that Noble Scipio the African, and some other worthic men; that were no lesse honest than himselse, though sarre lesserigid, and more gallant in behaui-our. Otherwise, Hee was a veriegood Citizen, and one of such temper, that hee could fashion himselfe to all occasions; as if he neuer were out of his Element. He loued businesse so well, or rather hated vice so earnessly; that even vnto the end of his life, He was exercifed in defending himfelfe, or accusing others. For at the age of fourescore and six yeares, He pleaded in his own defence; and soure yeares after, he accused Sergius Galba vnto the People. So beganne the Nobilitie of Caso his family, which ended in his great grandchild M. Caso the Viscan: one, that being of like vertue and feruencie, had all his good purposes dasht, and was finally wearied out of his life, by men of such Nobilitie and greatnesse as this his Ancestor had continually vexed.

The Spanish Warres, after Cato his departure out of the Countrie, though they 50 were not verie dangerous, yet were they many; and the Countrie feldome free from infurrection, in one part or other. The Roman Prætors therefore, of which two eneric yeare were sent ouer Commanders into Spaine (that was divided into two eueric yeare were sent ouer Commanders into spaine (that was deuided into rwo Gouernments) did rarely faile of fuch worke, as might affoord the honour of Triumph. One flew thirteene thousand Spaniards in a battaile: another tooke fitrie Townes; and a third enforced many States of the Countrie to fue for peace. Thus every one of them, or most of them, did some laudable service; yet so. that commonly there were of men townes, and people, new that rebelled, in stead of the old that were flaine, taken, or reclaimed. At the causes hereof I have alreadie pointed : and therefore thinke it enough to fay, That the bulinesse in Spaine requio red not the employment of a Roman Conful, from fuch time as Cato thence departed vntill the Numantian Warre brake out; which was verie long after.

In all other Countries to the West of the Ionian Seas, the Romans had peace: but so had not the Carthaginians. For when Hannibal was gone from them, and that the enemies of the Barchine House promised al felicitie which Rome could grant, vnto themselves and their obedient Citie: Masanissa fell to disputing with the fword, about the title to the best part of their Lands. He beganne with Emporia, a fruitfull Region about the leffer Syrtis: wherein among other Cities was that of Leptis, which daily paid a Talent vnto Carthage for Tribute. This Countrie the Numidian challenged; and by winning some part of it, seemed to better his claime vnto the whole. He had a great aduantage: for that the Carthaginians might not 20 make any Warre, without leaue obtained from their Masters the Romans. They had none other way of redreffe, than by fending to Rome their Complaint of his doings. And furely they wanted not good matter to alleadge, if the Judges had beene unpartiall. For belides that Scipio, in limiting out vnto them their bounds, had left them the possession of this Countrie: Masaniffa himselfe, now vericlately, pursuing a Rebell that fled out of his Kingdome, defired leaue of the Carthaginians, for himselfe to passe through it in his way to Cyrene : thereby acknowledging (had it otherwise beene questionable) that the Countrie was theirs. This notwithstanding, Masanissa had wherewith to justific his proceedings, especially vnto the Roman Senate. Hee gaue the Fathers to understand by his Embassadours, what 30 faithlesse people the Carthaginians were, and how il assected to the State of Rome. There had latly beene fent vnto them from Hannibal one, that should perswade them to take part with Antiochus. This man they had examined, vpon some suspition of his errand; yet neyther arrefting him nor his shippe, had thereby affoorded him meanes to escape. Hence the Numidian concluded, That certainly it was their purpose to rebell; and therefore good policie to keeke them downe. As for the Countrie of Emporia: it had alwaies, hee faid, beene theirs, that were able to hold it by firong hand: and so belonged sometimes vato the Numidian Kings; though now of late it was in possession of the Carthaginians. But if truth were knowne: the Citizens of Carthage had no verie warrantable title, vinto any more 40 ground, than that whereon their Citie stood; or scarcely to so much. For they were no better than strangers in Africk, that had gotten leave there to build vpon fo much ground, as they could encompasse with an Oxe-hide cut into small thongs: Whatfoeuer they held without fuch a compaffe, was purchased by fraud, and wrongfull enchrochments. This confidered, Mafaniffa requested of the Senate, That they would not adjudge vnto such vsurpers, the Countrie sometimes appertaining to the Ancestors of him their assured friend. The Romans having heard these allegations on both sides, found the matter so doubtfull, that they could not on the sudden tell what to determine. Wherefore because they would doe nothing ralhly, they fent ouer three Embaffadours, of whom P. Scipio the J-50 frican was one and the chiefe, to decide the controversie: yet secretly giving them instructions, to leave all as they found it, without making any end one way or other. The Embaffadors followed their directions, and left all doubtfull. So was it likely, that Masanissa with a strong Armie should quickly prevaile, against those that could no more than talke of their right, and exclaime against the wrong. By fuch arts were the Carthaginians held, not onely from flirring in fauour of King Antiochus, Antiochus, if they had thereto any disposition; but were prepared by little and little vnto their sinall destruction: that came vpon them, when the Roman had leisure to expresse the vtmost of their hatred.

hopes, but quite forfaken by their ancient dependants; and of all other the most vnregarded. Yet was there made a great accesse to their Estate; by adding much vnto them, of that which had beene taken from the Macedonian. This might have well sufficed them, if their desires had not beene immoderate: and their indignation, more vehement, than their defire. But they were not fo pleased with that which they had, since they thought it no more than part of their due; as they were vexed with the deniall of that which they claimed, and with finding themselues to be wholly disesteemed, wherein they thought that they had vnfufferable wrong. Wherefore they denifed, in a Parliament which they shortly held, by what meanes they best might right themselves; and give the Romans a for- 30 rowfull knowledge of the difference, betweene their enmitte and friendship. To this purpose they soone agreed, as concurring all in one affection, That they would not onely perswade Antiochus to make warre vpon the Romans, as one to whom the Romans had long refused peace; but that they would deale with the King of Macedon their ancient Enemie, and with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedamon, to joyne al together in a new Confederacie: whose ioynt forces could not in al likelihood but farre furmount those of the Romans, Acheans, Rhodians, and King Eumenes, with all that were of their Faction. This was a great enterprise, which the Atolians tooke in hand, and well befeeming them, for they were great darers. They fent Embaffadors to all these Kings, with perswasions as they thought most forcible. But Phi- 40 lip was irresolute; and Antiochus willing to trie first all other courses. Nabis the Lacedemonian, who neyther (as Philip) had lost much, nor (as Antiochus) was in feare of any warre; yet shewed himselfe of all other the most forward : and not staying so much as to feeke any good pretence, beganne immediately to lay fiege to Gyttheum. that had beene lately taken from him by the Romans. The Achaans, to whose care chiefly Titus athis departure had commended the affaires of Peloponnesus, were not flow to admonish Nabis of his dutie: neyther would they have staied long from repressing his violence by open war; had not some of them thought it wisedome to aske counsaile of the Romans, and particularly of T. Quintius, before they engaged themselves in a businesse of such importance. Whilest thus they spent the time in 50 fending Embassadours, and were adulfed by Quintius to let all alone, and to wait for the comming of the Roman forces that would shortly bee amongst them: Nabis was bold to give them infler cause of complaint, by wasting their owne Territorie.

Philopamen was then Prator of the Acheans, who had long been cablent in Creie, making warthere for his mindes fake and recreation. Vinto him the Acheuns referred themselues, giuing him leaue to order the war at his pleasure; either staying vntill the Romans came; or doing otherwise, as he should thinke best. He made all haftto releiue Gyttheum, by Sea; fearing leit the Towne, and the Achean Garrison within it, should be lost, if hee vsed any delay. But Philogamen was so bad a Scaman, that he knew not a strong Ship from a rotten. He made a Quadrireme Gallie his Admirall, that had fourescore yeares agoe beene counted a gallant vessell, in the Nauie of Antigonus Gonatas. Neither was the rest of his Fleete lo good, as might encounter with that of the Lacedemonian. Onely it fell out well, that he committed himselse to a light Pinnace or Brigandine, that fought better with her wings, than with her tallons. For his Admirall Gallie was stemmed at the first; and being rotten with age, sprang so many leakes, and tooke in water so fait, that she was faine to yeeld without further refiltance. When the rest of the Fleet saw what was become of their Admirall; all were prefently discouraged, and faued themselues with what foced they could. But Philopamen was not here with danted. If hee had failed in Sea-seruice, which was none of his Occupation; Hee said that hee would make amends by Land. The Tyrant withdrew part of his Armie from the liege of Gyttheum, to flop the Acheans if they should inuade his Countrie, But vpon these which were placed in guard of Laconia, Philopamen came inexpected; fired their Campe; and put all, faue a verie few of them, to the fword. Then marched he with all his Armie towards Lacedamon ; within ten mile whereof he was, when the T yrant met him; that had alreadic taken Gyttheum. It was not expected that Nabis would have beene readie for them so soone. Or if hee should come from Gyttheum, with any part of his forces: yet was it thought that he must ouertake them, and charge them in Rere. They marched therefore almost securely, in a long Troupe reaching some fine miles: having their Horse and the greatest part of their Auxiliaries at their backs to beare off any fudden impression. But Nabis, who formerly understood, or at least suspected, what course they would take : appeared in the front of them with al his Armie; encamped there where they meant to hauelodged. It was the custome of Philopamen, when he walked or trauelled abroad with his freinds, to marke the fituation of the Countrie about him ; and to discourse, what might befal an Armie marching the same way. Hee would suppose, That having with him there such a number of fouldiours, ordered and forted in fuch manner, and marching towards such a place; he were vponthat ground encountered by a greater Armie, or better prepared to the fight. Then would be put the question, whether it were fit for him to hold on his way, retire, or make a stand? what peece of ground it were meete for him to seize vpon? and in what manner he might best doe i.? in what fort he should order his men? where bestow his Carriages, and under what Gard? in what fort 40 encampe himselfe? and which way march the day following? By such continual meditation Hee was growne so perfect, that hee never met with any difficultie, whence he could not explicate himselfe and his followers. At this time he made a stand : and having drawne vp his Reare, He encamped neare vnto the place where he was; within halfe a mile of the Enemie . His baggage, with all thereto belonging, he bestowed on a Rocke; encompassing them round with his souldiours. The ground was rough, the waies bad, and the day almost quite spent; so as Nabis could not at the present greatly molest him. Both Armies were to water at one Brooke; whereto the Acheans lay the nearer. This watering therefore was like to minister the first occasion of skirmish. Philopamen understood this; and layd an ambush in place convenient; whereinto the Mercinaries of Nabis fell, and were flaughtered in great numbers. Presently after this, he caused one of his owne Auxiliaries to goe to the Tyrant, as a fugitive, and tell him, that the Acheans had a purpose to get betweene him and Lacedamon, whereby they would both debarre his returne into the Citie, and withall encourage the people, to take armes for the recoucrie of their LIIIII 2

freedome. The Tyrant hearing this, marched hastily away; and left his Campe. which hardly otherwise would have beene forced. Some Companies he made to flay behind, and flew themselves upon the Rampart, thereby to conceale his departure. But Philopamen was not fo to be beguiled. He casily won the Campe; and gaue chace to Nabis: whose followers being ouertaken, had no courage to turne about and make head. The Enemies being thus dispersed, and fled into Woods, where they lay in couert all that day; Philopamen conceived aright, that their feare and necessitie would teach them to creepe homewards, and saue themselves, when it grew darke. Wherefore in the Euening, when he had gathered together all those of his Light-armature, which had followed the chace whilest it was day; Hee jed to forth the rest that had well resreshed themselves, and occupied the two most ordinarie passages vnto Lacedamon. So Nabis his men, when it was darke night, perceiuing in Philopamens Campe great ftore of lights; thought that all had beene at reft: and therefore aduentured to make an escape home. But they were so way-laid, that hardly one quarter of them got into Sparta. Thirtie daies together after this, did Philopamen wast the Countrie round about, whilest Wabis durst not iffue forth of his Towne; and then returned nome, leaving the Tyrantin a manner without

The Roman Embassadours were then in Greece, and T. Quintius among them; labouring to make their partie strong against Antiochus & Nahis, whom they knew 20 to be sollicited by the Atolians. Verie faire countenance they also made vnto Philip; and with comfortable promifes drew him to make shew, whatsoener hee thought, of good correspondence. They promised to restore vnto him his sonne: and were contented to let him hope, that hee should receive other favours at their hands; and regaine possession of many places, by them taken from him. Thus did the Romans prepare for war against antiochus in Greece; whilest their Embassadors that were with him in Alia, denied otherwise to grant him peace, than if he would yeelde vnto one of the Conditions, by them so often propounded. The long abfence of this King in Syria, where he had accomplished the marriage betweene Ptolemie and his daughter : together with the death of yong Antiochus the Kings son, 30 which happened during the Treatie, and hindered, or seemed to hinder the King, from giuing audience in person to the Embassadors; caused them to returne home to Rome; as vicertaine of their answer as at their setting forth. One thing that might have beene, and partly was, beneficial vnto them, they brought to paffe during their abode at Ephefus; either by cunning, or (as Linie rather thinks) by chance. Finding Hannibal there, they discoursed often with him, and blamed him for hauing thus fled vnto Antiochus, vpon a causelesse suspition wherein hee held the Romans: that honoured his vertue, and intended him no harme. Many haue affirmed that P. Scipto was one of these Embassadours; and that he, among other discourses with Hannibal, demanded once, Which of all the famous Captaines that had lined, Han- 40 nibal indged the most worthie? So Hannibal gauc to Alexander of Macedon the first place: to Pyrrhus the second: and the third he challenged vnto himselfe. But Scipio who thought his owne title better, than that it ought to be fo forgotten : asked yet further, What wouldest thou have faid then Hannibal, if thou hadst vanquished mee ? To whom the Carthaginan replied, Then would not I have given the first place to Alexander, but have claymed it as due vnto my felfe. Now whether this were fo, or otherwise: the often and freindly conference of Hannibal with the Roman Embassadours, made him suspected of Antiochus: who therefore did forbeare awhile to vse his counsell. Yet afterwards, when Hannibal perceived this change in the King : and plainly desiring him to tell the cause thereof, heard what it was; He 50 easily recoursed his former grace, and credit. For he told how his Father had caused him to sweare at the Altars, when hee was a little boy, That hee neuer should be freind vnto the Romans. Wherefore he willed the King not to regard any vaine furmiles: but to know thus much, That as long as hee thought vpon war with Rome, fo long would Hannibal doe him all good feruice : whereas contrariwife if he intended to make peace, then should it behoue him to vsethe counsaile of some other

The £tolians, and their freinds, were no leffe bufie all this while, in making their partie from against the Romans : than were the Romans , in mustering vp their treinds in Greece. They had to often dealt with Antiochus, vanting much of their owne forces, and arrogating to themselves the honour of the victorie against Philips that finally they prevailed with him: especially when the Roman Embaffadors had left him, without hope of peace, vnleffe he would buy it at too deare a rate. They dealt in like fort with the Macedonian. But in vaine . Hee understood the Romans. and himselfe, too well. Wherefore it concerned them to improoue their owne forces to the vtmost : as knowing, that all the burthen must lie vpon Antiochus and themselves, without helpe from anie; saue only from some few that were discontented in Greece. Whilest they were about this, and had with them an Embassador of the King Antiochus that animated them to resolution : the Athenian Embasfadors, whom Titus had requested to be at their meeting, stayed their vehemencie a little; by exhorting them, not to conclude rashly, without first hearing the Romans, that lay neare at hand. For want of a readie answer hereto they were contented to approue the motion. Titus hearing this, thought the bulines worthie of his presence. For since Antiochus had now declared himselfe against the Romans: it would be no small peece of seruice, to with draw from his freindship, those by whose encouragement he had made the aduenture. Wherefore he came to their Panatolium, or Great Affemblie of the Nation; where he forgot nothing that might ferue to appeale them. Hee willed them to consider the weight of the enterprise which they tooke in hand; whereby Greece was like to become a Champaigne-field, on which, to the ruine of the Countrie, the Romans, and King Antiochus, that commanded no small part of the World, should fight for the Masterie: the Atolians, as Masters in that kind of Fence, setting them on, and becomming * the Sticklers . As * Lim. Lak. . . . of for those greinances which did thus exasperate them, and vrge them to such violent miss. Example 20. courses, He willed them to consider how slight they were, and how much better they might doe to fend Embaffadours to Rome, that should either plead their right in the Senate, or (if their right vnto the places which they claimed, were not good) make request to have what they defired : than thus to fet the world in an vorore. and be afterwards the first that should repent it. But what hee said or could say, it skilled not much. They had alreadie done ill, to make the Embassador of the King. whose helpe they had sought, wait so long for an answer, and stay doubting what good end they should make with the Romans. Neither was it newes vnto them to heare those comfortable words, That, by sending to Rome, they might happen to do obtaine what they defired seither as their right, or elfe by way of fauour. For with fuch Termes had they beene feafted once alreadie : and were by the Senate rele-Red vnto Titus: who, having it in his owne power, gaue them no fatisfaction; vet would now againe referre them to the Senate. This were onely losse of time, and might abate their credit with Antiochus. Wherefore without more adoe they made a Decree, That King Antiochus the great should be entreated to come ouer into Greece, as well to fet the Countrie at libertie, as also to decide the controucrsies depending betweene the Romans and Atolians. Such a Decree they would not have made, had they not understood the Kings minde before. Having made it; they forgot no point of brauerie, whereby to vant themselves to the Kings Embasfadours, and against the Romans. Titus desired of their Prætor, to let him see a Copie of this new Decree. The Prætor answered, That then he had other things to doe: but that this Decree, & their further answer, they would shortly let him know. ifhe came to their camp in Italie vpon the river of Tibris. Gentler words would have LIIIII 3

done better as the Atolians are like to understand herafter. But having thus begun. they meant henceforth to goe roundly to worke. The care of the war they referred vnto the more private Councel of their Nation; that no occasion might flip, in waiting for the authoritie of a generall Assemblie. The Apocleti (so were the Priuie Councell of Ætolia called) went as hotly to worke, as any of the yongest heads could have done. They laid a plot, how to get into their hands at one time the Townes of Chalcis, Demetrias, and Sparta: to each of which they fent men for the purpose. Demetrias they tooke vpon the sudden: entring, some of them as freinds to conduct home a principall man of the Citie: who for speaking words against T. Quintius, had beene driven to flie thence, but was, by intercession of those that lo- 10 ned him, againe recalled. His Etolian companions that were not many, feized vpon a Gate: whereat they let in a Troup which they had left not far behind them: and fo fell to murdering the chiefe of the Roman faction. At Chalcis they feed not fo well. Thither also they had a banished man to bring home : but they came so strong, that their purpose was discoursed, and the Towne prepared to defend it felfe against them. Being therefore demanded the cause of this hostilitie, they gaue a gentle answer: faying, T hat they came not thither as enemies, but onely to deliper the Towne from the Romans : who more infolently dominered oper it, than euer the Macedonians had done. By such R hethoricke they preuailed no more, than they could doe by plaine force. For the Townef-men replied, That they neither 20 found any abridgment of their libertie, nor needed any Garrison to keepe them from the Romans; from whom they neither feared any danger, nor received injurie. So this busines was dasht. The attempt your Sparta was more strange and defperate. Nabis their good freind, was Lord of the Towne : styling himselfe King; but, more truly, by all men called T yrant. He had wel-neare loft all, by meanes of the ouerthrow which Philopamen had lately given him : fince, he durft not ftirre abroad : and daily expected the mischeife, that on all sides threatned him. Wherfore he fent mellingers, one after other, to the Atolians: requelling them, That as He had not beene flow to stirre in their behalfe, but aduentured himselfe vpon the vtmost of danger, when all others were backward; so They would be pleased to 30 fend him what helpe they might, fince his bad fortune had caused him presently to need it. It hath beene often faid, That the raucnous Atolians were onely true to themselves, & regarded neither faith nor freindship otherwise than as it might conduce to their owne endes. And so dealt they now. For since Nabis his mercinarie forces, which vpheld his T yrannic, were in a manner confumed: they thought it expedient for their Estate, to put him out of the way; and, by so doing, to affure Lacedamon vnto themselues. To this purpose, they sent thither Alexamenus, one whom they thought a man sit for such a worke. To him they gaue a thousand Foot, and thirtie Horse, chosen for the purpose. These thirtie were by Damecritus the Prætor brought into the Councell of the Apocleti, where they were commanded to be no wifer than they should be, nor to thinke that they were sent to make war with the Acheans, or to doe ought elfe, faue onely what Alexamenus should command them: which were it never fo desperate, and in seeming against all reafon; yet must they understand, that unlesse they performed it, they should have no good welcome home. So Alexamenus came to the Tyrant, whom hee encouraged with braue wordes: telling him, that Antiochus was alreadie in Europe, and would be anon in Greece, meaning to couer all the Land and Sea with his mightic Armies; and that the Romans were like to finde other manner of work, than of late with Philip: fince the Elephants of this great King, without other helpe, would fuffice to tread them downe. As for the Atolians, He faid, that if need should so require, they would presently send away to Lacedamon all the forces that they could raise: But that they were verie desirous at the present, to make as goodlie a muster as they could before the great King; which caused them to send him thither afore with no greater companie. Hereupon he willed Nabu to take heart; bring forth his men, that had beene long pent vp in the Citie; and traine them without the wals: as if shortly he should employ them in work of conquest, rather than defence. Nabis was glad of this; and daily exercised his men in the field; riding vp and downe with his Alexamenus, and no more than three or foure horse about him, from one point to another, to order and behold them. During this time of exercise, Alexamenus made it his falhion to step aside alone to his Atolians, and say somewhat as he thought fit: which done, he still returned agains to Nabis. But when he saw time for the great worke that he had in hand : Hee then went aside to his thirtie Horse-10 men, and bad them remember the taske enjoyned them at their fetting forth; telling them that they were all in case of banished men, valesse they would anon come vp to him, and helpe him to finish that which they should see him take in hand. Herewithall the Tyrant beganne to draw neare them : and Alexamenus making towards him, charged him on the fudden; and struck him dowr. The thirtie Atolians neuer flood to deliberate vpon the matter: but all flew in; and, before any succour could arrive, had made an end of this wretched Nabis. Presently vpon the fact committed, the T yrant his Mercinaries ranne vnto the dead bodie: where in stead of secking reuengethey stood foolishly gazing as beholders. Alexamenus with his Etolians hasted into the Citic, and seized on the Palace: where hee fell 20 to ransacking the Treasure; and troubled himselfe with none other care, as though all were alreadiedone. Such of his followers as were dispersed in the Towne, did also the like; with the greater indignation of the Citizens; who seeing themfelues free by the death of the Tyrant, could not endure to see those that had slaine him, beginne to tyrannize anew. Wherefore all the Towne was shortly in Armes: and for lacke of another Captaine, they tooke a little Boy of the Royall flocke, that had beene brought vp with Nabis his children; whom they mounted vpon a Good Horse, and made him their chiefe. So they fell vpon the Atolians that were idely stragling about; and put them all to the sword. Alexamenus with not many of his Companie, were flaine in keeping the Citadell: and 30 those few that escaped thence into Arcadia, were taken by the Magistrates; who fold them all as bond-flaues, In this doubtfull Effate of thinges at Lacedamon, Philopoemen came thither: who calling out the chiefe of the Citie, and speaking such words unto them, as Alexamenus should have done after hee had flaine the Tyrant; easily perswaded them for their owne good and safetie, to incorporate themselues with the Achaans, Thus by the enterprise, no lesse dishonourable than difficult, of the Atolians, and the small but effectuall, travaile of Philopoemen; the Acheans made a notable purchase : and Lacedemon, that had hitherto bin gouerned eyther by Kings, or by Tyrants that called themsclues Kings, became the member of a Common-wealth; whereof the name had fearce any reputation, when Sparts ruled ouer all Greece.

ANTIOCHUS, perswaded by THOAS the Ætolian, comes over into Greece, ill attended. Sundrie paffages betweene him, the Atolians, Chalcidians and others. Hee winnes Chalcis and therby the whole He of Euboea. The vanitie of the Kings Emballadors and the Etolians, with the Civil answere of TITV's to their discourse, before the Acheans. That it concerned the Greekes to have defired peace, betweene the Romans and ANTIOCHUS; as the best affurance of their owne libertie, Of many pettie Estates that fell to the King. Of AMINANDER; and an idle vanitie, by which King PHILIP was loft. HANNIBAL gives good counfaile in vaine, Some Towneswonne in Theffalie. The King retires to Chalcis; Where hee marrieth a young Wife, and reuels away the rest of Winter. Vpon the comming of the Roman Conful all forfake ANTIOCHUS. Hee with two thousand Etolians keepes the Streights of Thermopyle. Hee is beaten , and flies into Asia : leaving all in Greece unto the Victors.

NTIOCHUS was troubled much in Asia with Smyrna and Lampsaem, that would not hearken to any Composition. He thought it neither fale nor honourable, to leaue them Enemies behind him and to winne them by force, was more than hitherto he was able. Yet was hee defirous with all fpeed conumient to shew himselfe in Greece.

where he had bin told, that his presence would effect wonders. It was faid, That in all the Countrie there was a veric small number, which bore heartie affection vnto the Romans: That Nabis was alreadic up in Armes: That Philip was like a Bandog in a chaine, defiring nothing more than to breake loofe; and that the Atolians, without whom the Romans had done nothing, nor nothing could have done, were readie to conferre vpon him the greatnesse, which they had vnworthily bestowed vpon insolent Barbarians. Of all this the least part was true. Yet that which was true made fuch a noife, as added credit vnto all the reft. Whileft therefore the King was thinking to fend Hannibal into Africk, there to moleft the Romans, and fogine him the better leifure of vling his owne opportunities in Greece: Thoas the Etolian came ouer to him, and bad him lay all other care afide; for that his Countrimen had alreadic taken Demetrias; a Towne of maine importance, that should give him entertainment, whence he might proceed as became the greatnesse of his vertue and fortune. This did serve to cut offall deliberation. As for Hannibal: Thomas was bold to tell the King, first, That it was not expedient for him to divide his forces at fuch a time, when the verie reputation of his numbers, brought into Greece, might scrue to lay open vnto him all places, without need of vsing violence: and fecondly, That in any fuch great enterprise there could not be chosen a more vnfit man to be employed in the Kings feruice, than was that famous Hannibal the Carthaginian. For he faid, That the King should as greatly feele the losse of a Fleet or Armie, perishing under such a notable Commaunder if his fortune were bad, as if the same had miscarried under one of meaner qualitie : whereas neuerthelesse if Hannibal prevailed; Hannibal alone should have all the honour, and not Antiochus. In this regard he was of opinion, That fuch a renowned Warriour should beealwayes neare vnto the Kings person, to give advice: which being followed as often as it was found commodious, the good successe would wholly redound vnto the honour of him that had the fourraigne Command; even of the King himfelfe. Antiochus gladly hearkned vnto this admonition; being iealous of the vertue, that this ned brighter than the Maiestie of his owne fortune. And thereupon hee laid aside the determination; which tended more to the advancement of his defires, than did any thing elfe by him then or after thought vpon.

Presently after this He made readie for Greece. Before his setting forth, in a friun-

CHAP.5. S.7. of the Historie of the World. lous pomp of ceremony, he went vp from the Sea-fide to Ilium; there to do facrifice to Minerua of Troy. Thence passing ouer the Agean Sea, Hee came to Demetrias. Eurylochus the Magnetian, the same whome the Atolians had lately waited on home, when by that pretext they wanne Demetrias; was now the chiefe man and Ruler of his Nation. Hee therefore with his Countrimen, in great frequencie, came to doe their duties to the King Antiochus, and bid him welcome. The King was glad of this; and tooke it as a figne of good lucke, to bee fo entertained at the beginning. But it may be suspected, that the Magnetians found not the like cause of iov. For whereas they had expected a Fleet and Armie fomewhat like to that 10 of Xerxes: they faw three hundred thips, of which no more than fortic were feruiceable for the Warres; with an Armie of tenne thousand Foot, sine hundred Horse, and fixe Elephants. The Atolians no fooner heard of his comming, than they called a Parliament; and made a Decree, whereby they inuited him into their Countrie. He knew before that they would fo doe; and was therefore wel onward on his way towards them, when they met him that brought the Decree. At his comming to Lamia, the Etolians gave him as joyfull entertainment as they could deuise. Being brought into their Councell, He made an Oration: wherein hee defired them to hold him excused, that he came not followed with a greater Armie. This was, he faid, in true estimation a signe of his good will; in that hee staid not to 20 make all things readie; but hafted vnto their aid, even whileft the feafon was vnfit for nauigation. Yet it should not bee long, ere the hope of all those which had expected him, would be fatisfied vnto the full. For it was his meaning to fill all Greece with Armies, and all the Sea-coast with his Fleets. Neyther would hee spare for any charge, trauaile, or danger, to follow the businesse which hee had vindertaken 5 euen to drive the Romans and their authoritie out of Greece; leaving the Countrie free indeed, and the Etolians therein the chiefe. Now as the Armies that were following him, should be veriegreat: so was it his meaning, that all provisions to them belonging should be correspondent; because he would not bee any way burdenfome vnto his Confederates. But at the prefent he must needs entreat them, hauing thus hastily come ouer vnto their aid, unprouided of manie necessaries; that they would helpe him with Corne and other victuals, whereof hee stood in need. So he left them to their confultation: the conclusion whereof was, after a little difpute, (for a vain motion was made by fome, that the differences between the Romas and them, should be put by Compromise to the decision of Antiochus) That they would veild vnto the Kings defire and affift him with all their forces. Here we may observe, how vaine a thing it is for an absolute Prince to engage himselfe, as did Antiochus, in a bufineffe of dangerous importance, vpon the promifed affurance of a State that is meerely popular. For if the vehemencie of Thors, and some other of that Faction, had not prevailed in this Councell : the Atolians, for gaine of two or three Townes, yea for hope of fuch gaine that might have deceived them; were like to haue abandoned this King their friend, vnto the diferetion of the Romans. And what remedie had there beene, if this had so fallen out? He could have bemoaned himselfe to Thous, and complained of the wrong; but he must have bin contented with this answere, That the fault was in those of the opposite side; whom Thoras would therefore have pronounced to bee verie wicked men. It happened much better for the present; though in the future it proued much worse, both for him, and for the Ltolians. He was chosen Generall of all their forces; and thirtie Commissioners were appointed to bee about him, as a Councell of Warre for the Nation. These armed such as readily they could, whilest it was in dispute so where they should beginne the Warre. Chalcis was thought the meetest place to be first undertaken: whither if they came suddenly, they should not peraduenture need to vie much force. The King had brought with him into Liolia but a thoufand Foot; leaning the rest behind him at Demetrias. With these hee hasted away directly toward Chaleis; being ouertaken by no great number of the Etolians, which accompanied him thither. At his comming, the Magistrates, and some of the chiefe Citizens, iffued forth to parle with him. There the Etolians beganne as they had lately done before, to tell, how the Romans had only in words and falle femblance, fet Greece at libertie. But fuch libertie, as might be true and vscfull , they faid would neuer be obtained; vntill by remouing the necessitie of obeying their pleasure that were most mightie, euerie seuerall Estate had where to find redresse of any preffure. And to this end was the great Antiochus come thither; a King wel able to counterpoile, yea to our weigh the Romans : who neuertheleffe defired them only, fo to joyne with him in League, as that if eyther the Romans or Hee should offer them wrong, they might keepe it in their power, to seeke redresse at 10 the other hands. The Chalcidians made hereto the same answere, which, to the like allegations, they had made not long before: That their freedome was not imaginarie, but absolute; for which they were to thanke the Romans; without whose good liking, they would enter into no new confederacie. That which they foake of themselves, they could likewise affirme of all the Greekes; forafmuch as none of them payed any Tribute; was kept under, by any Garrison; or lined o. therwise than by their owne Lawes, and without being tied vnto condition which difoleafed them. Wherefore they wondred, why the King should thus trouble himselfe, to deliuer Cities that were alreadie free. But fince he, and the £tolians. requested their friendship : they befought both him, and the £tolians , to doe a 20 friendly Office, in departing from them quietly, and leaving them in fuch good case as they were. With this answere the King departed : for he was not, as then strong enough to force them. But verie soone after, hee brought thither a greater power, which terrified them, and made them yeeld: before all the fuccours could arriue, which Titss had fent for their defence.

The chiefe Citie of Enburs being thus gotten; all the rest of the Iland shortly yeelded to Antichus. Four cor shu bundred Roman Souldiers, that came over late to have defended Chaliss, reposed themelicus at Delium, a little Towne of Beatis, lying over against the Iland; where was a Temple and Grove, consecrated vnto Apple, that had the privilledge of an invoidable Sanctuaric. In this place were some of them walking, and beholding the things there to bee seene, whilest others were builted as they sound cause: without scare of any danger; as being in such a place, and no warre bitherto proclaimed. But Memppus, one of Antichus his Captannes, that had wearied himselfs in maine vaine Treaties of peace; tooke advantage of their carelessement, which was the such that we warre. Verie sew of them escaped: fiftie were taken; and the rest slains. Herea Quintius was grieved; yet so, as it pleased him well to consider, that his Romans had now more just cause than before, to make warre you the King.

Antiochus liked wel these beginnings, and sent Embassadours into all quarters of Greece; in hope, that his reputation should perswade very many to take his part. 40 The wifer fort returned fuch answere, as the Chalcidians had done. Some referued themselves vntill hee should come among them : knowing that eyther, if hee came not, Hee must holde them excused for not daring to stirre; or, if hee came, the Romans must pardon their just feare, in veelding to the stronger. None of those that lay farre off, joyned with him in true meaning; faue the Eleans, that alwayes favoured the Atolians, and now feared the Acheans. Little reason there was, that he should thinke to draw the Acheansto his partic. Neuerthelesse hee assayed them, vpon a vaine hope that the enuic, which Titus was faid to beare vnto Philopamens vertue, had bred a fecret diflike betweene that Nation and the Romans. Wherefore both Hee and the Etolians lent Embassadours to the Councell at Agium; that spared not braue words, if the A-50 cheans would have so been etaken. The Kings Embassadour told of great Armies and Fleets that were comming: reckoning up the Dahans, Medians, Elimeans and Cadufians; names that were not enery day heard of, and therefore as hee thought, the more terrible. Then told he them what notable men at Sea, the Sydenians, Tyrians, Aradians, and Pamphylians were; fuch indeed as could not be refifted. Now concerning monie, and all warlike furniture : it was, he faid, well knowne . that the Kingdomes of Alia had alwaies thereof great plentie. So as they were much deceiued: who confidering the late war made against Philip, did thinke that this with Antiochus would proue the like : the case was too farre different. Yet this most powerfull King, that for the libertie of Greece was come from the vtmost parts of the East; requested no more of the Acheans, than that they would hold themselves as neutrall, and quietly looke on, whilest He tooke order with the Romans. To the 10 Jame effect spake the Actolian Embassadour : and further added, That in the battel at Cynolcephale, neither Titus had done the part of a General nor the Romans of good fouldiours : but that both He and his Armie had beene there destroyed, had they not beene protected by vertue of the Aetolians, which carried the day. Titus was present at the Councell, and heard all this: to which he made as fit answer, as could have beene defired. He told the Acheans, That neither the Kings Embaffadour, nor the Aetolian, did so greatly labour to perswade those vnto whom they addressed their Orations; as to vant themselves the one vnto the other. So as a man might well discerne, what good correspondence in vanitie it was, that had thus lincked the King and the Aetolians together. For even fuch bragges as here they made, be-20 fore the Acheans who knew them to be liers, had the Actolians also made vnto king Antiochus: proclayming the victoric ouer Philip to be meerely their Act: and the whole Countrie of Greece to be dependant on them. Interchangeably had they beene feasted by the King, with such tales as his Embassadour told even now; of Dahans, and Aradians, and Elimeans, and a many others: that were all but a companie of Syrians, fuch as were wont to be fold about for bondflaues, and good for little elfe. These diverse names of rascall people were, he said, like to the diversitie of Venison, wherewith a freind of his at Chaleis (no such vanter as were these Embasfadours) had fometime featted him. For all that varietie, whereat hee wondred, was none other, as his Hoft then merily told him; than fo many peeces of one 30 tame swine, dreft after seuerall fashions with varietie of sawces. Setting therefore aside this vanitie of idle pompe : it were good to make judgment of the great King, by his present doings. He had, notwithstanding all this great noyse, no more than ten thousand men about him: for which little Armiche was faine, in a manner, to beg victuailes of the Aetolians; and take vp monie at v furie, to defray his charges. And thus he ran vp and downe the Countrie; from Demetrias to Lamia; thence backe to Chalcis; and being there shut out, to Demetrias againe. These were the fruits of lies : wherewith fince both Antiochus and the Actolians had each deluded other; meet it was that they should, as perhaps alreadie they did, repent, whilest other; meet it was that they should, as perhaps alreadie they did, repent, whilest wifer men tooke beed by their example. To a fauourable Auditorie much perfwasion is needlesse. The Athans did not love so well the Actolians, as to desire that they should become Princes of Greece: but rather wished to see them, of all other, made the verical abieds. Wherefore they stood not to harken after newes, what Antiochus did, how he spedin Eubea, or what other Cities were like to take his part: but readily proclaymed war against him, and against the Atolians.

How the hatred betweene these two Nations grew inueterate; sufficiently appeares in the storie foregoing. Now haue they gotten each their Patrons; the other, King Antichus. Hereindid each of them waiting though far the greater blame ought to be laid, on the turbulent spirits of the Etoliam. For when the Romans departed out of Greece, and lest the Countrie at rest: there was nothing more greatly to haue beene desired, than that they might neuer sinde occasion to returne with an Armiethitheragaine. And in this respect ought the Greekes to haue sought not how Smyrna and Lampsaus might recourt their libertie (which had neuer beene held a matter worth regarding, vntill now of late) but how the powers of the East and West, divided and kept assumed their Countrie, as two Seas by an Ifthmus or necke of land, might be kept from ouerflowing the barre that parted them. Neither had the Remans any better pretence for their feeking to make free thofe bade Afaitiques, which originally were Greekiff; than the generallapplaufe, wherewith all the Nation entertained this their louing offer. Yet were Lymachis, and the Townes in Thrace, lately gotten by Anticelus, pretended as a verie great cause of feare, that flould moue them to take armes even in their ownedefence. But if all Greece would have made intercession, & requested that things might continue as they were, promising loyntly to affilt the Remans, with their whole forces both by Land and Sea, whenfoeure King Anticelus should make the least offer to shire against them: then had not onely this quarrell beene at an end 3 but the Ro. 10 man Patronage over the Countric, had been far from growing, as soone after it did, just a Lordy rule.

The Acheans were at this time, in a manner, the only Nation of Greece, that freely and generously declared themselves altogether for the Romans, their freinds and benefactours. All the reft gaue doubtfull answers of hope vnto both sides ; or if fome few, as did the The fail ans, were firme against Antiochus; yet helped they not one another in the quarrel, nor shewed themselves his enemies, till he pressed them with open force. The Bastians willingly received him, as foone as he entered your their borders, not so much for feare of his power, as in hatred of Titus and the Romans, by whom they had beene somewhat hardly vied. Aminander the Athamanian, 20 belides his old freindship with the Aetolians, was caught with a bait; which it may be doubted, whether he did more foolishly swallow, or Antiochus cast out. He had married the daughter of an Arcadian, that was an idle-headed man, and vanted himselfe to be descended from Alexander the Great; naming his two sonnes, in that regard, Philip and Alexander. Philip, the elder of these brethren, accompanied his fifter to the poore Court of Athamania: where having made his follie knowne, by talking of his Pedigree; He was judged by Antiochus and the Aetolians, a man fit for their turnes. They made him beleeue, that in regard of his high parentage, and the famous memorie of Alexander his forefather; it was their purpose, to doe their best for the conquest of Micedon to his behoofe: since no man had thereto so good title 30 as he. But for the enabling of them hereunto ; it behoued him to draw Aminander to their partie, that fo they might the fooner have done with the Romans. Philip was highly pleafed herewith; and by perfualions of himfelfe, or of his fifter, effected as much as they defired. But the first peece of service done by this imaginarie King (whether it proceeded from his owne phrenzie, in hope to get loue of the Macedonians that should be his subjects; or whether from some vanitie in King Antiochus that employed him ) wrought more harme to his freinds, than he and Aminander were able to doe good. There were two thousand men committed to his leading: with which he marched vnto Cynofcephale, there to gather vp the bones of the flaughtered Macedonians; whom their King had fuffered all this while to lie vnburied. The Macedons troubled not themselves to thinke on this charitable act, as if it were to them any benefit at all: but King Philip tooke it in high indignation: as intended meerely vnto his despight. Wherefore he presently sent vnto rhe Romans; and gaue them to understand, that hee was readic with all his power to aid them wherein focuer they should be pleased to vie him.

The Actolians, Angenetians, Eubeans, Baetians, and Athemanians, having now all ioyned with him. Antiochus tooke counfaile of them about the profecution of the warre in hand. The chiefe quefilion was, Whether it were meet for him to inuade Tiefdile, that would not hearken to his perfusations; or whether to let all alone vntill the Spring; becaufe it was now mid-winter. Some thought one things and fome another: confirming each his sowne fentence, with the weightieft realons which he could alleadge; as in a matter of great importance. Hamibal was at this meeting; who had long been each flade, as a veffell of no vie 5 but was now required to deliuet his opinion. He freely told the King, That what he flould now ve-ter, was cuen the fame which he would haue fpoken, had his counfaile at any time before beene asked fince their comming into Greece. For the Magnetiam, Baptian; and other their good freinds, which now fo willingly tooke their parts: what were they elfe than fo many poore Eflates, that, wanting force of their owne, did adioyne themselhees for feare vnto him, that was strongest at the present a yand would atterwards, when they faw it expedient, be asreadie to fall to the contrarie side, alleadging the same feare for their excuse? wherefore he thought it most behoughill, to win King Philip of Nacedon vnto their partie: who (besides that being once engaged, he should not afterwards haue power to recoyle and for lake them at his pleaned.

ged, he mouth afterwards mate power to the the means to furthing the prince, and one that had meanes to furthin the Roman warre with his proper forces. Now that Philip might be eafily perfunded to ioyne with them; the benefit likely to redound winto himselfe, by their focietie, was a verie firong Argument: though indeed what need was there, of prouing by inference the likelihood of this hope? For, faid Hee; Thefe details the reprefent; and name-ty this T is on a sching lately Embalfador from them into Alia, somong other Motiuse Whish be then vied to excite the King winto his Expedition, infifted mainly on the lamepoint. I will be that fooken brauely: but were pleafed with the great spirit of the man, and said he had spoken brauely: but of sail this was nothing done; saue onely that one was sent into Assa; to make all things readie there. In the meane while they went in hand with Thessis is, about which they had before disputed. There when they had won one Towne by force, many other places, doubting their owne strength, were glad to make slibmission. But Lariss, that lay before the countrie, shood out: no tregarding any terrible threats of the King, that lay before the wals with his whole Armie. This their sites and courage was rewarded by good fortune. For M. Bebins, a Roman Proprator

o and courage was rewarced by good fortune. For One had the another thicker. Likewife Philip of Macedon professed himselfe Enemie winto Antiochus: where by the same of the succour comming to Lariffa grew such, as wrought more than the succour could have done, had the arrived. For Antiochus perceiuing many fires on the Mountaines tops a sarre off; thought that Mmmmm m a great Armic of Romans and Macedonians had been ecomming vpon him. Therefore excusing him selic by the time of the yeare; Hee brake vp his seige, and marched away to Obalcis. At Chalcis he sell in loue with a yong Maiden, daughter vnto a Citizen of the Towne: whom, without regard of the much disproportion that was between them, both in yeares and fortune, He shortly married; and so spent the Winter following, as delightfully as he could, without thinking vpon the war in hard. His great men and Captaines followed his example; and the souldiors as readily imitated their Captaines in such wise that when he took the feild, he might cuidently perceive in what loose manner of discipline his Armic had passed the Winter. But M. Acilius Glabrio, the Roman Consul, shall meet him verie shortly, and helpe him to reclaime them from this loosensse of nontial Reuels; by setting them to hem to head exercise.

M. Acilius was chosen Consul with P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica. The warre against Antioches fell to him by lot; whereas otherwise He was no way so honourable, as Nalica his Colleague: vnto whom fell a charge, of farre leffe credit and importance. Nafica, befides the great Nobilitie of his Familie, had been clong fince, in time of the Punicke Warre, crowned with the title of The best man in Rome : when the Senate, for verie feare and superstition, durst not have so pronounced him, had they not so thought him; as being commanded by Oracle, That none other man than the verie best, should entertaine an old stone, which the Diuell then taught 20 them to call the Mother of the gods. But no prærogative of Birth, Vertue, or good Opinion, gaue such aduantage to the better man, as to make choice of his owne Prouince; or arrogate more vnto himselfe, than his lot should affoord him. This vnpartiall distribution of employments, helped well to maintaine peace and concord. P. Scipio therefore was appointed to make war against the Boyans: wherein he purchased the honour of a Triumph, nothing so glorious as was that of his Colleague; though purchased with harder service, requiring the more abilitie in matter of war. But M. Acilius went ouer into Greece, with ten thousand Foot, two thoufand Horfe, and fifteene Elephants. Ptolemie King of £ evet, not with standing his late Alliance with King Antiochus: and Philip King of Macedon; had lately fent Embassadours to Rome, making offer to come each of them in person with all his forces into Ætolia, there to affift the Conful in this warre. Ptolemie fent alfo gold and filuer, toward the defraying of charges; as one that meant none other than good earnest. But he was too yong, and dwelt too farre off. So his monie was returned vnto him with thankes; and his louing offer as louingly refused. Vnto Philips Embaffadors answer was made, that this his freindly offer was gratefully accepted: and that the Senate and People of Rome would thinke themselves beholding to him, for the affistance that He should give to Acilius the Conful . Masanissa likewise, and the Carthaginians, did striue, which of them should be most forward in gratifying the Romans. Each of them promifed a great quantitic of graine; which they would fend partly to Rome, partly to the Armie in Greece . And herein Mafanissa far out-went the poore Citic of Carthage: as also, in that he offered to lend the Conful fiue hundered Horse, and twentie Elephants. On the other side, the Carthaginians undertooke to set out a Fleet at their own charges: and to bring in at one payment all the Tribute-monie, which was behinde, and ought to be discharged by many yeerely pensions. But the Romans did neither thinke it good, to let them arme a Fleet; nor would let them redeem themselves out of Tribute, by paying all at once. As for the Corne; it was accepted with Condition, That they should be contented to receive the price of it.

The haltie and ridiculous iffue of this war, that began with fuch noyfe and preparations, were hardly credible: were not the difference exceeding great, betweene to the Roman and the Afatick fouldior. Anticebus had gotten this Spring a few townes of Asamania, after the fame manner as he had preuailed in other parts of Greece; partly by faire words, and treason of the Rulers; partly by terrour, that was like to proue their excuse, when they should againe for sake him. But King Philip and Babius, having recovered many places; and the Roman Conful being arrived, against whom none made reliftance; He was glad to withdraw himselfe. Aminander fled out of his Athamania : which the Macedonian tooke and enjoyed : as in recompence of his good feruice to the Romans. Philip, the brother of Aminanders wife, was taken by the Conful; made a mocking stocke; and fent away prisoner to Rome. The The [alians vied much more diligence in returning to their old friends, than they had done in yeelding to the King. All their Cities, one after other, gaue vp themselves: the Garrisons of Antiochus, compounding onely for their owne lives, and departing vnarmed: yet fo, that a thousand of them staied behind, and tooke pay of the Romans. This did wonderfully perplex Antiochus: who having withdrawne himself to Chaleis, and hearing how things went, cried out vpon his freinds: and faid, That they had betrayed him. He had taken a great deale of toile during one halfe of a Winter, and spent the other halfe in such Nuptials, as were little to his honour :after which, in time of need, He found all the promifes of the Atolians meerely verball: and himselfe reduced into termes of great extremitie. Hee therefore admired Hannibal as a wife man, yea a verie Prophet, that had foreseene all this long before. Neuerthelesse He sent word to the Etolians, that they should now make readie all their forces: as confidering their owne need to be no leffe than his. But the Ætolians had cause to thinke, that they themselves were shamefully disappointed by Antiochus: who having promised to doe great wonders, was in all this while seconded by no greater numbers out of Asia than so many as would fill up the same ten thousand which he first brought over , Yet came there some of them, though fewer than at any time before, which joyned with him. Hereat the King was angrie: and could get no better satisfaction, than that Thous and his fellowes had done their best, in vaine, to have made all the Nation take armes. Since therefore neither his owne men came ouer to him out of Alia, nor his friends of Greese would appeare in this time of danger : He seized vpon the Streights of Thermopyla: as meaning to defend them against the Romans, vntill more helpe should come. Of the Streights of Thermopyla there hath beene spoken enough *before, *13.49.6.5 3) vpon many occasions : and then chiefly, when they were defended by Leonidas against the huge Armie of Xerxes. Wherefore it may easily be conceived, how the Romans, that landed about Apollonia, and so came onwards into Thessalie, were vnable to passe that Ledge of Mountaines, dividing the one halfe of Greece: vnlesse they could win this difficult entrance. But there was great difference betweene Leonidas and Antiochus. The former of these, with an handfull of men, defended this pasfage two or three daies together, against a World of men comming to invade the Countrie. The latter, having taken vpon him to doe great miracles, and effect what he lifted himselfe in Greece : did commit himselfe vnto the safetie of this place. when he was charged by not many more than he had in his owne Armie. There whilest he lay : He sent earnest messages one after other to the Atolians, entreating them not to forfake him thus: but at least wife now to helpe, and keepe the tops of the Mountaines, lest the Romans finding any by-path should come downe vpon him. By this importunitie, he got of them two thousand, that vndertooke to make good the few paffages: by which onely, and not without extreme difficultie, it was possible for the Enemie to ascend. The Roman Conful in like fort, prepared to force the Streights: without flaying to expect King Philip: that was hindered by ficknes from accompanying him. He had with him M. Porcius Cato, and L. Vale-

70 with two thouland men, to trie whether by any meanes they could get up to the Aetolians. He himfelfe encouraged his Armie: not onely by telling them, with what bale-conditioned enemies they had to deale: but what rich Kingdomes Antiochus held, that should bountifully reward them if they were victors. This was on the day before the battaile. All that hight Cate had a fore journie (for what Mm mm m.)

rius Flaceus, that had both of them beene Confuls. These he sent forth by night happened vnto L. Valerius it is vncertaine, faue onely that hee failed in his intent) and so much the worse, for that he had no skilfull guide. Seing therefore his men exceedingly tired, with climbing vp steepie Rocksand crooked wayes: Hee commanded them to repose themselves; whilest He, being a vericable man of bodie, tooke in hand the discoucrie, accompanied with no more than one of like mettle to himselfe. After a great deale of trouble, He found at length a path : which he tooke to be, as indeed it was, the best way leading vnto the Enemies. So thither he brought his men; and held on the same path till toward breake of day. It was a place not haunted, because in time of peace there was a faire way through the Streights below, that required no such trouble of climbing: neyther had this en- 10 trance of the Thermopyle beene so often the Seat of Warre, as might cause any trapailers to fearch out the paffages of those desolate Mountaines. Wherefore the way that Cate followed, though it were the best: yet dit it lead him to a bogge at the end, which would suffer him to passe no further. So he staid there untill day light: by which he discourred both the Campe of the Greekes underneath him; and some of the Aetolians verie neare vnto him, that were keeping watch. Hee therefore fent forth a luftie Crew of his men, whom he thought fittelt for that feruice; and willed them by any meanes to get him some prisoners. This was effected: and he thereby understood, that these Aetolians were no more than six hundred; as also that King Antiochus lay beneath in the Valley. So he presently set vpon the Actolians; oner. 20 threw them; flue a great part of them; and chaced the reft; that by flying to their Campe, guided him vnto it. The fight was alreadic begun between the Armies below: and the Romans, that had calily repelled the Kings men, and driven them into their Campe, found it in a maner a desperate peece of worke to affault the Campe it felfe: which occupied the whole breadth of the Streights; was notably fortified; and not onely defended by Antiochus his long Pikes, which were best at that kinde of service; but by Archers and Slingers that were placed over them on the Hil-side, and powred downe a showre of weapons on their heads. But Cato his approch determined the matter. It was thought at first, that the Atolians had beene comming to helpe the Kings men : but when the Roman armes and enfignes were dif- 30 couered, such was the terrour, that none made offer of resistance; but all of them for fooke the Campe, and fled. The flaughter was not great: for that the badnes of the way, did hinder the Roman Armie from making pursuit. Yet this daies losse draue Antiochus out of Greece, who directly fled to Chalcis; and from thence, with the first opportunitie, got him backe into Asia.

All the Cities that had embraced the friendship of Antiochus, prepared forthwith to entertaine the Romans, and entreat for pardon : fetting open their gates; and prefenting themselues vnto the Consul, in manner of suppliants. Breifly, in few dayes all was recourred that Antiochus had gained : the Atolians onely flanding out, because they knew not what else to doc. Neyther did the Consulgiue 40 them any respite. At his returne from Chaleis He met with King Philip, that hauing recouered health came to joyne with him against Antiochus: ouer whom since the victorie was alreadie gotten, He did gratulate unto the Romans their good fucceffe; and offered to take part with them in the Atolian Warre. So it was agreed, That the Conful should be siege Heraclea; and Philip, Lamia; at the same time. Each of them plied his worke hard; especially Philip, who faine would have taken Lamia before the Conful should come to helpe him. But it could not be. For his Macedenians that vsed to worke by Myne, were ouermuch hindred by the stonie ground. Yet was Lamia euen readie to be taken, when the Conful, having wonne Heraclea, came thither; and told Philip, that the spoile of these Townes was a reward vnto those that had fought at Thermopyle. Herewith Philip must bee contented; and therefore went his way quietly. But Acilius, that could foill endure to fee Philip in likelihood of thriuing by the Romans victorie, got not Lamia himfelfe: vntill such time as another Consul, was readie to ease him of his charge. The

The loffe of Heraclea did so affright the Ætolians, that they thought no way fafer than to defire peace. Yet had they fent vnto King Antiochus prefently after his flight:entreating him not to forfake them vtterly, but eyther to returne with all those forces which he had purposed to bring into Greeces or if any thing with held him from comming in perion, at leastwife to helpe them with monie and other aid. They prayed him to confider, that this did not onely concerne him in honoure but appertained vnto his owne fatetie: fince it would be much to his hurt, if the &tolians being wholly subdued, the Romans, without any Enemies at their backes, might fet vpon him in Afia. He confidered well of this; and found their words true. Therefore He deliuered vnto Wisander, one of their Embassadors, a summe of monie, that might ferue to defray the charges of the Warre : promiting that ere long he would fend them strong aid, both by Land and Sea. Thous, another of their Embassadors, He retained with him: who willingly staied, that he might vrge the King to make his word good. But when Heraelea was taken from them : then did the Atolians lay afide al hope, of amending their fortune by the helpe of Antiochus; and made fuit vnto the Conful to obtaine peace, vpon any reasonable Condition. The Conful would scarce vouch fafe to give them audience, but faid Hee had other businesse in hand : onely He granted them tenne dayes of Truce, and sent L. Valerius Flaceus with them to Hypata; willing them to make him acquainted with as much, as they would have delivered vnto himselfe. At their comming to Hypata; they began, as men fauouring their own cause, to alleadge how well they had deferued of the Romans. Whereto Flaceus would not hearken. He told them plainly, That the memorie of all fuch good Offices past, was quite obliterated by the malice which they had shewed of late. Wherefore hee willed them to acknowledge their fault, and to entreat pardon. Better they thought to doe so euen betimes. than to flay till they were reduced into termes of more extremitie. Hereupon they agreed to commit themselves vnto the faith of the Romans, and to that effect sent Embaffadours to the Conful. This phrase of committing unto the faith; signified, in their vie of it, little elfe, than the acknowledgment of a fault done, and the cra-20 uing of pardon. But the Romans vsed those words in another sense; and counted them all one, as * reilding to discretion. Wherefore when the Conful heard them * Legat. excepts speake in this manner: Hee asked them whether their meaning were agreeable to e Polybara, their words. They answered that it was : and she wed him the Decree of their Nation, lately made to this purpofe. Then fayd Hee, I commaund you first of all, That none of yee prefume to goe into Asia, vpon any bulinesse private or publike: then, That yee deliuer vp vnto me Dicarchue the Atolian, Menestratus the Epirot, Aminander the Athamanian, and such of his Countrimen as have followed him in revolting from vs. Whilest hee was yet speaking : Phameas the Embassadour interrupted him; and prayed him not to mistake the Custome of the Greekes, who And had yeelded themselves unto his faith; not unto flauerie. What? (faid the Consul) Doe yee stand to plead Custome with mee, being now at my discretion? Bring hither a chaine. With that, chaines were brought; and an iron collar by his appointment fitted vnto cuerie one of their necks. This did so affright them, that they stood dumbe and knew not what to fay. But Valerius and some others entreated the Conful, not to deale thus hardly with them, fince they came as Embaffadours; though fince, their Condition was altered. Phameas also spake for himselfe: and said, That neither He nor yet the Apocletior ordinarie Councel of the Nation, were able to fulfill these injunctions; without approbation of the generall Assembly. For which to for fo long. This furcefance of warre, during tenne and other tenne dayes together, began presently after the taking of Heraclea; when Philip had beene commaunded away from Lamia, that else he might have wonne. Now because of the indignitie herein offered vnto that King, and to the end that hee might not returne home with his Armie, Mmmmmm 3

cause He entreated yet further ten dayes respite; and had granted vnto him Truce

Armie, like one that could not bee trusted in employment : especially the Romans being like hereafter to have further need of him, in the continuance of this Warre: He was delired to set vpon the Athamanians, and some other pettie Nations their borderers, whileft the Conful was buffe with the Atolians; taking for his reward. all that He could get. And Hee got in that space all athamania, Perrhabia, Aperantia, and Dolopia. For the Etolians, hearing what had befalle their Embaffadors. were focuraged, That although they were very ill provided for Warre; yet they could not endure to heare more talke of peace. And it happened, that Nicander about the same time was come backe from Antiochus, with monie and hopefull promifes: the Romans abiding still about Heraclea; and Philip having lately rifen from before Lamia, yet not being far gone thence. His monie Nicander conveighed to into Lamia, by veric vnufuall dexteritie. But hee himfelfe being to paffe further to the Assembly of the Atolians, there to make report of his Embassage; was verice much perplexed about this his journie, which lay betweene the Roman and Macedonian Campes. Yet hee made the adventure : and keeping as farre as hee could from the Roman fide, fell vpon a Station of Macedonians; by whom hee was taken. and led vnto their King. He expected no good; but cyther to bee delivered vnto the Romans, or vsed ill enough by Philip. But it seemes, that the King had not hitherto concocted well the indignitie, of his being fent away from Lamia. For Hee commanded his fernants to entreat Nicander friendly; and he himselfe being then 20 at supper, did visit him as soone as he rose vp: giving him to understand; That the Atolians did now reape the fruits of their own madnesse; for asmuch as they could neuer hold themselves contented, but would needs bee calling strangers into Greece. They had pleafed themselues well, in their acquaintance first with the Romans, and then with King Antiochus: but himselse, being their neighbour, they could neuer well endure. It was now therefore, He said, high time for them to have regard vnto his friendship, whereof hitherto they had never made any triall: for furely their good affection, one vnto the other, would be much more availeable vnto each of them; than their mutuall catching of advantages; whereby they had wrought themselues much displeasure. Thus much the King willed Nicander to fignifie vn- 30 to his Countrimen; and privately to hold in mind the courtese which hee then did him, in fending him fafe home. So giving him a Convoy to gard him to Hypata: He louingly dismissed him. For this benefit, Nicander was alwayes after dutifully affected to the Crowne of Macedon : fo as in the warre of Perfeus hee made himselfe suspected vnto the Romans; and therefore was had away to Rome, where he ended his life.

When the Conful vnderstood, that the Lolians refused to make their submisfion, in fuch wife as he required it: he forthwith meant to profecute the warre against them, without any longer forbearance. They were preparing to make head against him at Naupattus: whither he therefore directly marched, to trie what they could or durst. The seige of Naupactus was of greater length, than the Romans had preconceived it: for it was a strong Citic, and well manned. But deiling stood vpon point of honour; wherein he thought that he should have beenea loofer, by riling from before it without Victorie. So He staid there welneare all the following time of his Confulthip; whileft the Macedonian King and the Acheans, made farre better vie of the Roman Victorie. Philip, as is faid before, being allowed to take in fuch places as had revolted vnto Antiochus, and were not hitherto reclaimed, wan the strong Citie of Demetrias; and with an hastic course of Victoric, subdued the Athamanians and others. The Achaans called to accompt the Eleans and Messenians: which had long beene addicted to the Atolian lide; and followed it, in taking part 50 with Antiochus. The Eleans gaue good words, whereby they faued themselues from trouble awhile. The Mellenians being more front, before they were inuaded; had none other helpe when the Achean Prætor wasted their Countrie, than to offer themselves vnto the Romans. Titus was then at Corinth; to whome they sent word. That at his Commandement their gates should be opened; but that vnto the Acheans it was not their meaning to yeeld. A message from Titus to the Achean Prætor, did suffice to call home the Armie, and finish the Warre : as also the peremptorie Command of the same Titus caused the Messenians to annex themselves vnto the Achaans, and become part of their Common-weale. Such was now the Maieltie of a Roman Embassador. Titus did fauour the Acheans; yet could not like it wel, that eyther they or any other should take too much vpon them. He thought it enough, that they had their libertie, and were ftrong enough to defend it against anie of their neighbours. That they should make themselues great Lords, and able to dispute with the Romans sponeuen termes, it was no part of his desire. They had lately bought the Ile of Zacynthus which had once been Philips, and was afterward given by him to Aminander who fent a Gouernour thither. But when Aminander in this present Warre, was driven out of his owne Kingdome by Philip: then did the Gouernour of Zacrnthus offer to fell the Hand to the Achaans; whom he found readie Chapmen. Titus liked not of this: but plainly told them, That the Romans would be their owne Caruers, and take what they thought good, of the Lands belonging to their Enemies; as a reward of the victorie which they had obtained. It was bootlesse to dispute. Wherefore the Acheans referred themselues vnto his discretion. So he told them, that their Common-wealth was like a Tor-20 toile, whereof Peloponne swas the shell : and that holding themselves within that compasse, they were out of danger; but if they would needs bee looking abroad, they should lie open to blowes, which might greatly hurt them. Hauing setled thinges thus in Peloponnejus, Hee went ouer to Naupactus: where Glabrio the Conful had laine two monethes, that might have beene farre better spent. There, whether out of compassion which Hee had vpon the Atolians, or out of diflike of King Philips thrining to fast : Hee perswaded the Consul to grant vnto the belieged, and to the whole Nation, follong Truce, that they might fend Embassadoursto Rome; and submitting themselves crave pardon of the Senate. Most like it is, that Naupactus was in great danger: else would not the Etolians 20 haue made such carnest suit as they did vnto Titus, for procuring of this fauour. But if Glabrio had beene fure to carrie it, in any floot space : it may well be thought hee would not have gone away without it; fince the winning of that Towne, wherin was then the whole floure of the Nation, would have made the promifed fubmission much more humble and sincere. When they came to Rome: no entreatie could helpe them to better Conditions, than one of these two; That eyther they should wholly permit themselues to the good pleasure of the Senate; Or else pay a thousand Talents, and make neyther Peace nor Warre with any, further than as the Romans should give approbation. They had not so much monie: neither could they well hope to be gently dealt withall, if they should give themselves a way unto discretion; which what it signified, they now understood. Wherefore they defired to haue it set downe, in what points, and how farre forth, they should veild vnto the good pleasure of the Senate. But hereof they could get no certaine answere: so that they were dismissed as enemies, after long and vaine attendance.

Whilest the Ætolians were pursuing their hopes of peace, the Conful had little to doe in Greece; and therefore took vpon him gravely to fet things in order among thetractable Acheans. Hee would have had them to restore the banished Lacedemonians home into their Countrie; and to take the Eleans into the fellowshippe of their Common-wealth. This the Acheans liked well enough : but they did not like it, that the Romans should be medling in all occurrences. Wherefore they deo ferrred the restitution of the banished Lacedamonians: intending to make it an Act of their owne meere grace. As for the Eleans: they were loth to bee beholding to the Romans, and thereby to disparage the Acheans: into whose Corporation they were desirousto be admitted; and saw that they should have their desire, without fuch compulfiue mediation.

The

The Roman Admirall C. Liuius, much about the same time, fought a battaile at Sea with Polyxenides, Admirall to the King Antiochus. King Eumenes brought help to the Romans, though it was not great: and five and twentie faile of Rhodians came after the battaile, when they were following the Chace. The Kings Fleet was the better of faile : but that of the Romans the better manned. Wherefore Polyxenidas being vanquished in fight, was yet out of danger; as soone as he betook himfelfe to a speedie retrait.

And such end had the first yeares warre, betweene King Antiochus and the Romans. After this, as many of the Greekes as had followed the vaine hopes of the &tolians, were glad to excuse themselves by feare; thinking themselves happie when to by Embassadours they had obtained pardon. On the contrarie side, Philip of Maredon, Arch-enemic of late vnto the Romans, did now fend to gratulate this their Victoric: and, in recompence of his good affection, had reftored vnto him Demeerius his yonger fonne, whom fome few yeares they had kept as an hostage. Also King Ptolemie of Agypt, gratulating the Roman Victorie, fent word how greatly all Asia and Syria were thereby terrified. In which regard Hee defired the Senate not to foreflow time; but to lend an Armie, as foone as might be, into Asia: promising, that his affiltance, wherein focuer it pleafed them to vie it, should not bee wanting. This Prolemie was the fonne-in-law of King Antiochus : but hee was the friend of Fortune. He understood long before, as did all that were indifferent beholders of 20 the Contention, that the Romans were like to have the voper hand. The fame did Antrochus now beginne to suspect, who had thought himselfe awhile as safe at Ephofus, as if he had beene in another World but was told by Hannibal. That it was not fo farre out of Greece into Alia, as out of Italie into Greece: and that there was no doubt but the Romans would foone be there, and make him trie the chance of a battaile for his Kingdome.

à. VIII.

LVCIVS SCIPIO, having with him PVBLIVS the African his elder Brother, for his 30 Lieutenant, is fent into Greece. He grants long Truce to the Ætolians, that fo he might atleisure passe into Asia. Much troublesome businesse by Sea; and divers fights. An inuation upon EVMENES his Kingdome; with the fiege of Pergamus, rayled by an handfull of the Acheans. L. Scipio the Conful comes into Afia: where ANTIOCHUS most earnestly desireth peace and is denied it. The battaile of MAGNESIA: wherein ANTIOCHUS being vanguished, veildeth to the Romans good pleasure. The Conditions of the peace. In what fort the Romans veed their Victorie. L. CORNELIUS SCIPIO after amost sumptuous triumph ouer An-TIOCHVS, is surnamed The Asiatique, as his brother was stilled The African.

YCIVS CORNELIUS SCIPIO, the brother of P. Scipio the African was chosen Conful at Rome with C. Lelius. Lelius was veric gracious in the Senate: and therefore being defirous (as generally all Confuls were) of the more honourable employment, offered to referre to the arbitrement of the Senate, if L. Cornelius would be so pleased the disposition of their Provinces; without putting it to the hazard of a Lotterie. Lucius having talked with his brother Publius, approved well of the motion. Such a question had not of long time beene put vnto the Fathers: who therefore were the more defirous, to make an vnblameable Decree. But the matter being otherwise somewhat indifferent; P. Scipio the African said openly thus much, That if the Senate would appoint his brother to the warre against Antiochus, He himselfe would follow his brother in that warre, as his Leiutenant. These words were heard with fuch approbation, that the controughlie was forthwith at an end. For it Antiochus relyed vpon Hannibal, and should happen to be directed wholly by that great Captaine: what better man could they oppose, than Scipio; that had beene victorious against the same Great Worthie. But indeed a worser man might have served well enough the turne. For Hannibal had no absolute Command, nor scarce any trust of great importance: excepting now and then in confultation; where his wisdome was much approued, but his libertie and high spirit as much disliked. It is worthic of remembrance; as a figne of the freedome that he yfed in his cenfures, even whileft he liued in fuch a Court. Antiochus mustered his Armie in presence of this famous Gaptaine: thinking, as may seeme, to have made him with, that hee had beene ser-10 ued by fuch braue men in Italie. For they were gallantly decked, both Men, Horfes, and Elephants, with fuch coftly furniture of Gold, Siluer, and Purple; as glittered with a terrible braueric on a Sun-shine day. Whereupon the King, well pleafing himfelfe with that goodly spectacle, asked Hannibal what hee thought; and whether all this were not enough for the Romans. Enough (laid Hannibal) were the Romans the most courtous men in all the World: meaning, that all this Cost vpon the backs of Cowardly Matiques, was no better than a spoile to animate good Souldiers. How little this answere pleased the King; it is easie to ghesse. The little vse that hee made of this Carthaginian, tellifies that his diflike or the man, caused him to loofe the vie of his feruice, when he stood in greatest necessitie thereof.

The Scipio's made all hast away from Rome as soone as they could. They carried with them, befides other Souldiors newly preft to the warre, about fine thousand Voluntaries, that had served under P. Africanss. There was also a Fleet of thirtie Quinquereme Gallies, and twentie Triremes newly built, appointed vnto L. A. milius Regillus, that was chosen Admirall the same years for that Voyage. At their comming into Greece, they found the old Conful Glabrio belieging Amphilla a Citie of the Etolians. The Etolians after that they were denied peace, had expe-Redhim once again at Naupactus. Wherefore they not onely fortified that Towne: but kept all the passages thereto leading; which heedlessely, as in a time of confulion, they had left vngarded the last yeare. Glabrio knowing this, deceived their

3° expectation, and fel vpon Lamia: which being not long fince much weakned by Philip, and now by him attempted on the sudden; was carried at the second assault. Thence went Hee to Amphills: which he had almost gotten; when L. Scipio, his fuccesfor, came with thirteene thousand Foot and fine hundred Horse, and tooke charge of the Armie. The Towne of Amphissa was presently forsaken by the inhabitants: but they had a Castle, or higher Towne, that was impregnable; whereinto they all retired. The Athenian Embaffadours had dealt with P. Scipio, in behalfe of the Atolians: entreating him to fland their friend, and helpe them in obtaining some tolerable Condition of peace. He gaue them gentle words: and wil-

49 led them to perswade the Atolians, that they should faithfully and with true meaning desireit. This was gladly taken. But many messages passing to and fro: though Publius continued to put them in good hope; yet the Conful made fill the fame answere, with which they had beene chaced from Rome. The coriclusion was, That they should sue for a longer time of respite from warre: whereby at more leifurethey might attend some better disposition of the Senate, or any helpeful commoditie which time should affoord. So they obtained halfe a yeares Truce: after which, the Winter was like to afford them another balfe yeares leifure of breathing. Hereof were not they more glad, than was P. Scipio: who thought all time loft, which with held the Warre from paffing ouer into Afia.

The busines of Aetolia being thus laid aside : and the old Consul Glabrio sent home into Italie: the Scipio's marched into The falie; intending thence to take their way by Land, through Macedon and Thrace vnto the Hellespont. Yet they considred, That hereby they must commit themselves vnto the loyaltic of King Philp: who might either doe them some mischeife by the way, if he were disposed to watch a notableaduantage: or at the least, would he be vnfaithfull, though he were not fo couragious, yet might he take fuch order with the Thratians, that euen for want of victualies, it by no greater inconuenience, they should be disgracefully forced to returne. He had promised them the vtmost of his surtherance: wherein, whether he meant sincerely, they thought to make some triall; by causing a Gentleman to ride Post vnto him, and obserue his doings as see should take him on the sudden. The King was merrice at a feast, and drinking, when the Messenger came: whom he louingly had welcom; and shewed him the next day, not onely what promission of victualies he had made for the Armie, but how he had made bridges ouer the rivers, and mended the bad waies by which they were to passe. With these good newes Grachus returned backe in half wnto the scipio's: who entring into Macedon, 10 sound all things in a readines, that might helpe to advance their iournie. The King entertayned them royally; and brought them on their way, cuen to the Helespont: where they shaied agood while, vntill their Nauie was in readinesse to transport

Much was done at Sea in the beginning of this yeere; though, for the most part. little of importance, Polyxenidas, the Admirall of Antiochus, was a banished Rhodian: true to the King; and desirous of reuenge vpon his Countrimen that had expelled him. He, hearing that the Rhodian Flect was at Samos, the Romans and Eumenes having not as yet put to Sea; thought to doc form what vpon those that were fo early in their diligence, before their fellowes should arrive to helpe them . Yet 20 went he craftily to worke; and fent word, as in great secrecie, to the Rhodian Admirall, That if the sentence of his banishment might be repealed, He would, in requitall thereof, betray all the Kings Fleet. After many passages to and fro, this was beleiued : and the Rhodian Admiral grew so carelesse, expecting stil when he should receive a watchword from Polyxenidas, that he himselfe was taken by Polyxenidas in his owne Hauen. The Kings Fleet fetting forth from Ephefus by night; and, for feare of being discouered, resting one day in harbour by the way; came the second night to Samos: where, by morning, it was readicto enter the Hauen . Paufilratus the Rhodian Admirall feeing this, thought it his best way of resistance, to bestow his menon the two head-lands or points of the Hauen; for o gard the mouth of it: for that he faw no likelihood of defending himfelfe by Sea. But Polyxenidus had alreadie landed some companies, in another part of the lland : which falling vpon the backe of Pauliffratus, compelled him to alter his directions, and command his men aboord. This could not be without great confusion: so as the enemies tooke him out of all order; and funke or boorded all his Nauie, flue excepted, that by a fudden deuice made shift to escape. Each of them hung out a burning Cressetypon two poles, at the Beake-head: and then rowed forwards directly upon the Enemie : who having not bethought himselse what shift to make against such vnexpected danger of firing, was content to giue way unto these desperate Gallies; for feare left they should burne, together with themselues, a part of the Kings

Not long after this, the *Romins* had fome losse by tempes: whereof *Polyxenidas* could not take such advantage as he had hoped; because, putting to Sea for that purpose, the was driuen backe againe by the like soule weather. But the *Rodisms*, to shew that they were not discouraged, set forth twentic other Gallies: the *Romans* also with King *Emmens* repaired their Fleet; and all of them together, in great brauerie, presented battaile to *Polyxenidas* before the Hauen of *Ephess*. When hee durst not accept it: they went from place to place, attempting many things, as eyher they were entreated by the *Rodisms*, or personaded by some appearing hopes of doing good. Yet persourmed they little or nothing: for that one while they were hindred by stormes at Sea; and another while by strong resistance, made against 500 them at Land.

Eumenes with his Fleet was compelled to for fake them; and returne home to the defence of his owne Kingdome. For Antiochus wasted all the grounds about Elea and Pergamus: and leasing his fonne Seleurs: to befeige the royall Citic of Pergamus, did with the reft of his Armie fpoile the whole Countrie thereabout. Attalus, the brother of King Emmense, was then in Pergamus; hauing with him no better men to defend the Citic, than were they that lay againt it. Wherefore hee had reason to fland in seare; being too much inscriour in number. There came to his aid a thousand Foot, and an hundred Horse of the Aethaus: old Souldiors all, and trayned younder Philopemen; whose scholler, in the Art of war, Diophane; their Commander was. This Diophane, belolding from the walles of Pergamus, which was an high Towne, the demeanour of the Enemie; began to distaine, that such menasthey

10 should hold him besieged, For Seleneus his Armie which was encamped at the hillfoor, seeing that none durst sallie forth youn them, grew so careleste: as otherwise, than by spoyling all behind their backes, they seemed to forget that they were in an Enemies Countrie. Diophanes therefore spake with Astalus: and told him that hee would goe forth to visit them. Astalus had no liking to this aduenture; so he said, that the match was nothing equall. But the Asham would needes have his will:
and issuing forth, encamped not far from the Enemie. They of Perganus thought him little better than mad. As for the besseigers; they wondred at first what his meaning was: but when they saw that he held himselfe quier, they made aiett of his boldnes; and laughed to see with what an handfull of men he looked so soul-

20 ly. So they returned vnto their former negligence and diforders. Which Diophant perceiving, Hee commanded all his men to follow him, euen as faft as they well might: and he himfelfe, with the hundred Horfe, brake out on the fudden vyon the Station that was next at hand. Verie few of the enemies had their Horfes readic fadled, but more few, or none, had the hearts to maker fill fance: 16 as Hee draue them all out of their Campe; and chaced them as far as hee might fafely adventure, with great flaughter of them, and no losse of the Towne, men and women, to beholde this speckacle were verie io givell; and highly magnified the vertue of these Achaem. Yet would they not ther fore issue for their gates, to helpe the Achaem.

30 ans in doing what remained to be done. The next day Sclenuse encamped halfe a mile further frome the Towne, than bee had done before: and againft him went forth Diephanes the fecond time; who quietly refted awhile in his old Station, When they had haid many houres, looking who should begin: Sclenus, in faire order as he came, withdrew himselfle toward his lodging that was further off. Diephanes moued not whiled the Enemie was in fight: but as sconeas the ground between them hindred the prospect, he followed them in all hass, 8 soone ouertaking them with his Horse charged them in Rere; so as hebrake them, and with all his forces pursued them at the heeles, to their veric Trenches. This boldnes of the Acheans, and the basenes of his owne men, caused Sclenus to quit the seige, little to his 40 honour. Such being the qualitie of these Assiques: Philosparen had cause to reli the Romans, That he enuied their victorie. For when Antiochus lay feasting at Chalcis after his martiage, and his souldiors betooke temselues to Riot, as it had beene in a time of great securitie: a good man of war might have cut all their throtes, euens time of great (ccuritie: a good man of war might have cut all their throtes, even as they were tipling in their victualing houles, which Philopamen faid that hee would have done, had He bin General of the Asham, & nor, as he then was, a private man.

Antiochus was full of busines: and turning his care from one thing to another, with a great deale of travaile, brought almost nothing to passe. He had beene at Pergamus: into which Eumenes, leaving the Romans, did put, himselfe with a few of his Horse and light armature. Before Pargamus he left his sonne as before hard of his Horteand light armature. Before Pergamus ne lett his sonnies a betroe part, 50 beene (hewed, and went to Elas; whither hee heard that £ mylius the Røman Admirall was come, to bring fuccour to Eumenes. There hee made an Ouerture of peace: about which to confult, Eumenes was fent for by £ mylius; and came from Pergamus. But when it was confidered, that no conclution could be made without the Conful; this Treatic brake off. Then followed the Ouerthrow newly mentioned; which caused Seleucus to give over the leige of Pergamus, Afterwards, foure or fine Townes of scarce any worth or note were taken by the King; and the Syrian Fleet, being of seuen and thirtie Saile, was beaten by the Rhodian which was of like number. But of this victorie the Rhodians had no great cause to reioyce : for that Hannibal the Carthaginian, who, together with Apollonius a Courtier of Antiochus. was Admirall of the Syrians, did them in manner as great hurt as they could docto Apollonius; and having the victorie taken out of his hand by Apollonius his flight. yet made fuch a retrait, that the Rhodians durft not farre adventure vpon him. Now of these Actions which were but as Præfaces unto the war; the last and greatest was a victoric of the Romans by Sea, against Polyxenidas the Kings Admirall. The bat- 10 taile was fought by Myonnesus a Promontoric in Asia: where Polyxenidas had with him fourescore and nine Gallies; and fine of them greater, than any of the Romans. This being all the strength which he could make by Sea: we may note the vanitie of those bragges, wherewith Antiochus vanted the last yeare, That his Armada should couer all the shores of Greece. The Romans had eight and fiftie Gallies the Rhodians, two and twentic: the Roman being the stronger built, and more soutly manned; the Rhodian more light-timberd and thin planckt, having all advantage of speed, and good Sea-men. Neither forgot they to helpe themselves by the same deuice; with which, fine of their Gallies had lately escaped from Samos. For with fire in their prowes they ran vpon the Enemie : who declining them for feare, laid 20 open his fide : and was thereby ingreater danger of being stemmed. After no long fight, the Kings Nauie hoysted saile: and having a faire wind, bore away toward Ephelus as falt as they could. Yet fortic of their Gallies they left behind them: wherof thirteeene were taken : all the rest burnt or sunke. The Romans and their fellows. lost onely two or three ships: but got hereby the absolute Masterie of the Sea.

Thereport of this miliduenture, may feeme to haue taken from Antivelms all vieo for reason. For asi if no hope had beene remayning, to defend those places that hee held in Europe: Hee presently with-drew his Garrisons from Lyssmekine; which might easily haue beene kept, euen till the end of Winter following, and haue reduced the befeigers of the leige had beene continued oblinately) to termes of 30 great extremitie. Hee also gaue ouer the seige of Colophon: and laying aide all thought faue onely of desence, drew together all his Armie; and sent for helpe to his father-in-law, King Aria-rabes the Cappadacian.

Thus the Roman Conful, without impediment, not onely came to the Hellefpont; but had yeelded vnto him all places there, belonging to Antiochus on Europe fide. The Fleet was then also in readines, to transport him ouer into Asia: where Eumenes had taken fuch care before, that He landed quietly at his owne good cafe; cuen as if the Countrie had beene his alreadie. The first newes that hee heard of the Enemie, was by an Embaffadour that came to fue for peace. This Embaffadour declared in his Masters name, That the same things which had hindered him 40 from obtaining peace of the Romans heretofore, did now perswade him, that he should casily come to good agreement with them. For in all disputations heretofore, Smyrna, Lampfacus, and Lyfimachia, had been the places about which they varied. Seing therefore the King had now alreadie given over Lysimachia; and was further purposed, not to striue with the Romans about Lamp facus and Smyrna; what reason was there, why they should neede to trouble him with war? If it was their defire, that any other Townes vpon the Coast of Asia, not mentioned by them in any former Treaties, should be also set at libertie, or otherwise deliuered into their hands: the King would not refuse to gratifie them therein. Breifly, let them take fome part of Asia: fo as the bounds, dividing them from the King, might not be 50 vncertaine; and it should be quietly put into their hands. If all this were notenough: the King would likewife beare halfe the Charges, whereat they had beene in this war. So praying the Romans to hold themselves contented with these good offers, and not to be too insolent vpon confidence of their fortune; Hee expected their answer. These offers which to the Embassadour seemed so great, were indged by the Romans to be verie little. For they thought it reasonable, that the King should beare all the charges of the warre, since it began through his only fault : and that He should not onely depart out of those few Townes, which he held in Aglis and Ionia; but quite out of Asia the lesse, and keepe himselfe on the other side of Mount Taurus. When the Embaffadour therefore faw, that no better bargaine could be made. He dealt with P. Scipio in private: and to him hee promised agreat quantitie of gold, together with the free restitution of his sonne, who (it is vncertaine by what mischance) was taken prisoner, and most honourably entertained by to the King. Scipio would not hearken to the offer of gold: nor otherwise to the reftitution of his sonne, than vpon Condition, That it might be with making such amends for the benefit, as became a private man. As for the publicke busines: Here onely faid thus much, That fince Antiochus had alreadie for laken Lylimachia, and fuffered the war to take hold on his owne Kingdome; there was now none other way for him, than either to fight, or yeeld to that which was required at his hands. Wherefore, faid He, tell your King in my name, that I would adule him to refule no Condition whereby he may have peace.

The King was not any whit moved with this advice. For feeing that the Conful demanded of him no leffe, than if he had beene alreadic fubdued: little reason 20 there was, that he should feare to come to battaile; wherein he could loose, as hee thought, no more, than by feeking to avoid it he must give away. He had with him threefcore and ten thousand Foot, and twelve thousand Horse; besides two and fiftie Indian Elephants, and many Chariots armed with hookes or fythes, according to the manner of the Easterne Countries. Yet was hee nothing pleafed, to heare that the Conful drew neare him apace, as one haltning to fight. But how foeuer he was affected; Hee made so little shew of feare, that hearing P. Scipio to lie ficke at Elea, He fent thither vnto him his fonne without ranfome; as one both defirous to comfort this noble Warriour in his ficknes, and withall not defirous to retaine the yong Gentleman for a pledge of his owne fafetie. Thus ought his boun-30 tie to be constant. Otherwise it might be suspected. That herein he dealt craftily. For fince he could have none other ranfome of Scipio, than fuch as an honourable man, that had no great store of wealth, might pay: better it was to doe such a courtelie before the battell, as would afterwards have been elittle worth; than to flay vntill the Romans, perhaps victorious, should exact it at his hands. P. Scipio was greatly comforted with the recourse of his sonne : so as the joy thereof was thought, to haue beene much auaileable vnto his health. In recompence of the Kings humanitic, He faid onely thus much vnto those that brought him this acceptable Present, I am now able to make your King none other amends, than by adulting him not to fight, untill hee shall heare that I am in the Campe. What he meant by this, it is hard to conic-40 Eture . Antiochus refolued to follow his counfaile : and therefore withdrew himfelfe from about Thyatira, beyond the River of Phrygius or Hyllus, vnto Magnelia by Sipylus: where encamping, He fortified himselfe as strongly as hee could. Thither followed him L. Scipio the Conful; and fate downe within foure miles of him. About a thousand of the Kings Horse, most of them Gallo-Greeker, came to bid the Romans welcome: of whom at first they slue some; and were anon, with some losse driven backe over the River. Two daies were quietly spent, whilest neither the King nor the Romans would paffe the water. The third day the Romans made the aductione: wherein they found no diffurbance; nor were at all opposed, until they came within two miles and an halfe of Antiochus his Campe. There, as they were 50 taking up their lodging, they were charged by three thousand, Horse and Foote: whom the ordinarie Corps du gard repelled. Foure daies together after this, each of them brought forth their Armies; and fet them in order before the Trenches, without advancing any further. The fift day the Romans came halfe way forward, and presented battaile; which the King would not accept. Thereupon the Con-Nnnnnn fultooke aduife what was to be done. For either they must fight vpon what soe uer disduantage, or else resolue to abide by it all Winter, faire from any Countrie of their freinds, and therefore (abiect wno many dissipations: unless they would staine their honour by returning faire backe, to winter in a more contenient place; and so deferre the war until the next Spring. The Roman souldiour was throughly personal contenies based temper. Wherefore it was the general Crie, that this great Armie should be assailed, cuen in the Campe where it lay; as if rather there were so many beasts to be slaughtered, than men to be fought with. Yet a day or two passed, in discouring the fortifications of Anioshus, and the safest way to set you shim, all this while P. Scipic came not. Wherfore the King, being least to to dishearten his men, by seeming to stand in sear of the Enemie; re followed to put the matter to triall. So when the Romans tooke the field againe, and ordered their Battailes: Heals odd the like; and advanced so faire, that they might understand his meaning to shelt.

The Roman Armie confifted of foure Legions, two Roman and two Latine: in each of which were five thousand and foure hundred men. The Latines, as vivally, were in the points: the Romans, in the maine battell. All of them, according to their wonted forme, were divided into Maniples. The Haltati had the leading : after them tollowed the Principes, at fuch distance as was vivall; and last of all, the Triarij. Now beside these, there were about three thousand Auxiliaries; partly 20 Acheans; and partly fuch as belonged to Eumenes: which were placed in an equall Front beyond the Latines in the right wing. Vtmost of all (faue some five hundred Cretians, and of the Trallians were almost three thousand Horse : of which, Eumenes had brought thither eight hundred; the rest being Roman. The left wing was fenced by the banke of the river : yet foure Troups of horse were placed there; though fuch helpe feemed in a manner needleffe. Two thousand Voluntaries, Macedonians and Thracians, were left to guard the Campe. The Conful had with him fixeteene African Elephants, which hee bestowed in his Rere: forasmuch as had they come to fight with those of Antiochus, they only would have served to discourage his men; as being fure to be beaten; the Indian being farre the greater, and more 20 couragious beafts: whereof Antiochus had likewife much aduantage in number.

The Kings Armie being compounded of many Nations, diverfly apointed, and not all accultomed to one manner of fight, was ordered according to the feuerall kinds, in fuch wife as each might be of most vie. The maine strength of his Foot confifted in fixteene thousand, armed all Macedonian-like, and called Phalangiers. These Hee placed in the middest, and divided into tenne Battalions: every one hauing two and thirtie in File, and fiftie in Front. Betweene every Battalion were two Elephants, goodly beafts, and fuch as being adorned with Frontals, high Crefts, Towers on their backes, and befides him that gouerned the Elephant, foure men in cuerie Tower, made agallant and terrible shew. On the right hand of these 40 were fifteene hundred Horse of the Gallo-Greekes: then, three thousand Barbd Horse : and Regiment of almost a thousand Horse, called the Agema, that were all Medians, the choice of the Countrie, and accompanied by some others. All which Troupes of Horfe, divided in their feuerall kinds, doe feeme to have followed one another in depth, rather than to have beene firetched out in Front. Adjoyning to these were sixteene Elephants together in one flocke. A little further to the right hand, was the Kings owne Regiment : called the Argyraspides or Silvershields, by a name borrowed from their furniture, but nothing like fo valiant as those of the same name, that had served vnder Great Alexander: then, twelve hundred Archerson horsebacke, three thousand light-armed Foote, two thousand and fine 50 hundred Archers of Mysia; with foure thousand slingers and Archers of the Cirteans, and Elymeans. On the left hand of the Phalangiers, were placed the like numbers of Gallo-Greekes and Barbd Horse: as also two thousand Horse that were sent from Ariarathes, with two thousand and seuen hundred of divers

Nations; and a Regiment of a thousand Horse more lightly atmed, that were called the Kings Troups, being Syrians, Phrygians, and Lydians. In Front of all these Horse were the Chariots armed with Hooks or Sythes, and the Dromedaries, where on sate Arabians with long Rapiers, that would serve to reach from those high Camels. Beyond these were, as in the right wing, arabble of many Nations, Carians, Citicians, Pemphylians, Pytians, Syrians, Espinaans, and many others, having also with them sixteene Elephants. Antiochus himselfe commanded in the right wing: Sestens in the left and three of his principall Captaines commanded over the Phalancier.

The first onset was given by the Dromedaries, and armed Chariots: of which the one, being like to terrifie the Horse, the other, to breake the Squadrons of the Foot: Eumenes with a few light-armed Cretians, Archers, Darters, and Slingers, eafily made frustrate the danger threatned by them both. For with showtings, and novies, and fome wounds, they were driven out of the field; and running backe voon their owne men, did the same harme which they had intended to the Enemies. Wherefore the Roman Horse following this advantage, charged vpon the left wing : where they found no reliftance ; fome being out of order: others being without courage. It is shamefull to rehearle, and so strange, that it may hardly seeme credible : that the Phalangiers, with such varietie of Auxi-20 liaries, made little or no relistance; but all of them fled, in manner, as soone as they were charged. Onely the King, Antiochus himselfe, being in the lest wing of his owne battaile : and sceing the Latines, that stood opposite vnto him, weakly flancked with Horse; gaue voon them couragiously, and forced them to retire. But M. Emylius, that had the Guard of the Roman Campe, iffued forth with all his power to helpe his fellowes; and, what by perswasion, what by threats, made them renewe the fight. Succour also came from the right wing, where the Romans were alreadie victorious : whereof when Antiochus, discouered the approch; He not onely turned his Horse about, but ranne away vpon the spur without further tariance. The Campe was defended a little while; and with no great valour; though by a 30 great multicude that were fled into it. Antiochus is said to haue lost in this battaile fiftie thousand Foot, and foure thousand Horse; besides those that were taken. Of the Romans, there were not flaine aboue three hundred Foot, and four and twentie Horse of Eumenes his followers flue and twentic.

Antiochus fled to Sardes, and from thence to Apamea, the same night; hearing that Seleucus was gone thither before. He left the custodic of Sardes, and the Castle there, to one whom he thought faithful. But the Townsfmen and Souldiors were fo difmayed with the greatnesse of the Ouerthrow; that one mans faith was worth nothing. All the Townes in those parts, without expecting summons, yeelded vp themselves by Embassadors: whom they sent to the Romans, whilest they were on 40 the way. Neyther were many dayes spent, ere Antiochus his Embassadour was in the Campe: having none other errand, than to know what it would please the Romans to impose vpon the King his Master. P. Scipio was now come to his brother: who obtained leave to make the answere, because it should be gentle. They required no more than they had lately done: which was, That hee should quite abandon his Dominions on this fide of Taurus. For their charges in that warre they required fifteene thousand Talents: fine hundred in hand; two thousand and fine hundred, when the Senate and People of Rome should have confirmed the peace; and the other twelue thouland, in twelue yeares next enfuing by euen portions. Likewise they demanded foure hundred Talents for Eumenes; and some store 50 of Corne, that was due to him vpon a reckoning. Now belides twentie holtages which they required, verie earnest they were to have Hannibal the Carthaginian, and Thous the Atolian, with some others who had stirred up the King to this warre, deliuered into their bands. But any wise man might so easily have perceived, that it would be their purpose to make this one of their principall demaunds; as no great art was needfull to beguile their malice. The Kings Embaffadour had full commission, to refuse nothing that should be enjoyned. Wherefore there was no more to doe, than to fend immediatly to Rome for the ratification of the Peace.

There were new Confuls chosen in the meane while at Rome, M. Fuluius, and Cn. Manlius Volfo. The £tolians defired peace, but could not obtaine it: because they would accept neyther of the two Conditions to them before propounded. So it was decreed, That one of the Confuls should make Warre vpon the Etolians, the other, vpon Antiochus in Asia. Now though shortly there came newes, that Antiochus was alreadie vanquished in battaile, and had submitted himselfe vnto all that could be required at his hands; yet fince the State of Asia was not like to bee 10 fo throughly fetled by one Victoric, but that many thinges might fall out worthic of the Romans care; Cn. Manlius, to whome Asia fell by lot, had not his Province

Soone after this came the Embassadors of King Antiochus to Rome, accompanied with the Rhodians and some others : yea by King Eumenes in person ; whose presence added a goodly suftre to the businesse in hand. Concerning the peace to be made with King Antiochus, there was no disputation: it was generally approued. All the trouble was, about the distribution of the purchase. King Eumenes reckoned up his owne deferts : and comparing himselfe with Masanissa, hoped that the Romans would be more bountifull to him than they had beeneto the Numidian, 20 fince they had found him a King indeed, whereas Masanissa was onely such in title; and fince both he and his father had alwayes beene their friends, even in the worst of the Roman fortune. Yet was there much adoe to make him tell what he would haue: He still referring himselfe to their courtesie; and they desiring him to speake plaine. At length he craued that they would bestow vpon him, as much of the Countrie by them taken from Antiochus, as they had no purpose to keepe in their ownchands. Neyther thought hee it needfull, that they should trouble themfelues with the care of giuing libertie to many of the Greeke Townes, that were on Afia fide, For fince the most of those Townes had beene partakers with the King in his Warre; it was no reason that they should be gainers by his ouerthrow. The 20 Rhodians did not like of this. They defired the Senate to be truly Patrons of the Gracian libertie; and to call to minde, that no small part of Greece it selfe had beene Subject vnto Philip, and served him in his Warre: which was not alleadged against them as a cause why they should not be made free, after that Philip was ouercome. But the maine point whereon they insisted, was this, That the Victoric of the Romans against King Antiochus was so great, as easily might satisfie the desires of all their friends. The Senate was glad to heare of this; and very bountifully gaue away so much, that every one had cause to be well pleased.

Such end had the Warre against King Antiochus : after which, L. Cornelius Scipio, returning home, had granted vnto him the honour of a Triumph: the pompe 40 whereof exceeded in riches, not onely that of Titus Quintius Flaminius, but of anie ten that Rome had beheld untill that day. Now forasmuch as the surname of The African had been given vnto P. Scipio, it was thought convenient by some, to reward L. Scipio with the title of The Aliatick: which the fortune of his Victorie had no leffe descrued; though the vertue, requisite to the purchase thereof, was no way correspondent.

CHAP.5. S.9. of the Historie of the World.

ð. I X.

The Etolians, and the Gallogreekes, vanquished by the Roman Confuls FVLVIVS and MANLIVS. MANLIVS hardly obtaines a Triumph : being charged (among other objections) with attempting to have paffed the bounds appointed as fatall to the Romans by SIBYLL. Of SIBYL'S Prophecies; the Bookes of HER-MES; and that Infeription, SIMONI DEO SANCTO. The ingratitude of Rome to the two Scipios: and the beginning of faction among the Roman Nobilitie.

ARC. FVLVIVS and Cn. Manlies had the fame charge divided betweene them, which L. Cornelius Scipio, now fivled Affaticus, had lately vndergone. It was found more than one mans worke, to looke at once to Greece and to Alia. And for this reason was it apparent, that

L. Scipio had graunted fo long a Truce to the Atolians. But fince, in this long Interim of Truce, that haughtic little Nation had not fought to humble it selfe to the Roman Maiestie, it was now to be brought vnto more lowlie termes than any other of the Greekes. The best was, that so great a storme fell not vnexpected vpon the Atolians. They had forescene the danger, when their Em-20 baffadours were veterly denied peace at Rome; and they had provided the last remedie; which was, to entreat the Rhodians and Athenians to become intercessours for them. Neither, were they so dejected, with any terrible apprehensions, that they could not well deuile, vpon helping themselves, even by repurchase of Countries loft, where they spied advantage.

Poore King Aminander lived in exile among them, whilest Philip of Macedon kept. for him, possession of his Lands and Castles. But the Athamanians (besides that manie of them bore a naturall affection to their owne Prince) having beene long accustomed to serue a Mountaine Lord, that conversed with them after an homelie manner; could not endure the proud and infolent manner of commaund, yfed by 30 the Captaines of Philip his Garrisons. They sent therefore some sew of them to their King, and offered their seruice toward his restitution. At the first there were onely foure of them; neither grew they, at length, to more than two and fiftie, which undertooke the worke. Yet affurance, that all the rest would follow, made Aminander willing to trie his fortune. He was at the borders with a thousand Atolians, upon the day appointed: at what time his two and fiftie aduenturers, having divided themselves into source parts, occupied, by the readic assistance of the multitude, foure the chiefe Townes in the Countrie, to his yfe. The fame of this good fucceffe at first; with letters running from place to place, whereby men were exhorted to doe their best in helping forward the Action : made the Lieutenants of 40 Philip vnable to thinke vpon relistance. One of them held the Towne of Theium a few daies; giving thereby some leifure vnto his King to provide for the rescue. But when he had done his best, he was forced thence; and could onely tell Philip, whom he met on the way, that all was loft. Philip had brought from home fix thousand men; of whom, when the greater part could not hold out, in such a running march, he left all faue two thousand behind him & so came to Athenaum, a little Athamanian Castle, that still was his, as being on the frontier of Macedon. Thence he sent Zeno, who had kept Theium a while, to take a place lying ouer Argithes, that was chiefe of the Countrie. Zeno did as he was appointed : yet neither he, nor the King, had the boldnesse to descend upon Argithea, for that they might perceive the Athamanians,

50 all along the hill fides, readie to come downe vpon them, when they should be bufie. Wherefore nothing was thought more honourable than a fafe retreat; specially when Aminander came in fight with his thousand Atolians. The Macedonians were called back, from-wards Argithea, and presently withdrawne by their King towards his owne borders. But they were not fuffered to depart in quiet, at their pleasure.

The Athamanians and Ætolians way layed them, and purfued them so closely, that their retreat was in manner of a plaine flight, with great loss of men and armes, sew of those scaping, that were lest behind, as to make a countenance of holding somewhat in the Countrey, with I Philip his returns.

The Letoians, having found the businesse of Athamania so easie, made attempt, in their owne behalfe, upon the Amphilachians and Aperantians. These had belonged vnto their Nation, and were lately taken by Philip; from whom they diligently revolved, and became Letoian againe. The Delopians lay next; that had been ever belonging to the Macedonian, and so did still purpose to continue. These tooke armes at first: but soone layed them away, seeing their owne King so hashily gone, as if he meant not to returne.

Of these victories the iou was the leffe; for that newes came of Antiochus his last ouerthrow, and of M. Fuluius the new Confull his hasting with an armie into Greece, Aminander sent his excuses to Rome, praying the Senate, not to take it in despight, that he had recovered his owne from Philip with such helpe as he could get. Neither feemes it that the Romans were much offended to heare of Philip his loffes: for of this fault they neither were sharpe correctors, nor earnest reprouers. Fuluius went in hand with the businesse, about which he came, and layed siege to Ambracia, a goodly Citie, that had beene the chiefe feat of Pyrrhu his Kingdome. 20 With this he began, for that it was of too great importance to be abandoned by the Etolians: yet could not by them be relieued, vnlesse they would aduenture to fight upon equal ground. To helpe the Ambracians, it was not in the Etolians power : for they were, at the same time, vexed by the Illyrians at sea, and readie to be driven from their new conquest, by Perfess the sonne of Philip, who invaded the Countries of the Amphilochians and Dolopians. They were vnable to deale with fo many at once; and therefore as carneftly fought peace with the Romans, as they frontly made head against the rest. In the meane while the Athenian and Rhodian Embaffadors came; who befought the Confull to graunt them peace. It helped well that Ambracia made frong refiftance, and would not be terrified, by any vio- 20 lence of the affaylants, or danger that might feeme to threaten. The Confull had no desire to spend halfe his time about one Citie, and so be driven to leave vnto his fucceffor the honour of finishing the warre. Wherefore he gladly hearkened vnto the Ætolians, and bad them seeke peace with faithfull intent, without thinking it ouer-deare, at a reasonable price; considering with how great a part of his Kingdome their friend Antiochus had made the same purchase. He also gaue leaue to Aminander, offering his feruice as a mediatour, to put himselfe into Ambracia, and trie what good his persuasions might doe with the citizens. So, after many demaunds and excuses, the conclusion was such, as was grieuous to the weaker, but not vnfufferable. The same Embassadours of the Athenians and Rhodians accom- 40 panied those of the Etolians to Rome, for procuring the confirmation of peace. Their eloquence and credit was the more needfull in this intercession, for that Philip had made verie grieuous complaint about the losse of those Countries, which they had lately taken from him. Hereof the Senate could not but take notice; though it hindered not the peace, which those good Mediatours of Rhodes and Athens did carneftly follicite. The Atolians were bound to vphold the maiestic of the people of Rome, and to observe divers articles, which made them lesse free, and more obnoxious to the Romans, than any people of Greece; they having beene the first that called these their Masters into the Countrie. The Isle of Cephalenia was taken from them by the Romans: who kept it for themselves (as not long fince they had gotten Zacynthus from the Achaans, by stiffely pressing their owne right) that fo they might have possession along the coast of Greece, whilest they seemed to forbeare the Countrey. But concerning those places, whereto Philip, or others, might lay claime, there was fet downe an Order fo perplexed, as would necessarily require to haue the Romans Iudges of the controuerfies, when they should arife. And hereof good vse will be shortly made: when want of emploiment essewhere, shall cause a more Lordiie Inquisition to be held, vpon the affaires of Macedon and Greec.

CHAP.5. S.Q.

Cn. Manlius, the other Conful, had at the same time warre in Alia, with the Gallogreekes and others. His Armie was the same that had followed L. Scipio; of whole victorie, his acts were the confummation. Hee visited those Countries on the hither fide of Taurus, that had scarce heard of the Romans; to whom they were abandoned by Antiochus. Among these there were some pettic Lords, or Tyrants, 10 some free Cities, and some that were together at warres, without regard of the great alteration hapned in Asia. From enery of these he got somewhat; and by their quarrels found occasion to visit those Provinces, into which heeshould else haue wanted an errand. He was euen loaden with bootie, when, hauing fetcht a compasse about Asia, he came at length vpon the Gallogreekes. These had long dominiered ouer the Countrie: though of late times, it was rather the fame and terrour of their forepassed acts, than any present vertue of theirs, which held them vp in reputation. Of the Romans they had lately such triall, when they served vnder King Antiochus, as made them to know themselues farre the worse men. Wherefore they thought it no small part of their safetie, that they dwelt vpon 20 the River Halys, in an Inland Countrie, where those enemies were not like to fearch them out. But when such hopes failed; and when some Princes of their owne Nation, that had beene friends of Eumenes, exhorted the rest to yeeld: then was no counfaile thought fo good, as to forfake their houses and Countrie, and, with all that they could carrie or driue, to betake themselnes vnto the high mountaines of Olympus and Margana. These mountaines were exceeding hard of ascent, though none should vndertake the custodie. Being therefore well manned and vichuailed for a long time; as also the naturall strength being helpt, by such fortification as promifed greatest assurance : it was thought, that the Conful would either forbeare the attempt of forcing them, or eafily be repelled; and that finally, 30 when he had staied there awhile, winter, and much want, should force him to diflodge. Yet all this availed not. For whereas the Gallogreekes had beene careleffe of furnishing themselves with casting weapons, as if the stones would have served well enough to that purpose : the Romans, who came farre otherwise appointed, found greater advantage in the difference of armes, than impediment in difaduantage of ground. Archers and Slingers did casily prevaile against casters of stones; especially being such as were these Gallogreekes, neither exercised in that manner of fight, nor having prepared their stones before hand, but catching vp what lay next, the too great, and the too little, oftner than those of a fit fize. Finally, the Barbarians, wanting defensive armes, could not hold out against the arrowes and 40 weapons of the Roman light armature: but were driven from a peece of ground, which they had vindertaken to make good, vp into their campe on the top of the mountaine; and being forced out of their Campe, had none other way left, than to caft themselves headlong downe the steepe rockes. Few of the mene scaped alive: all their wives, children, and goods, became a prey vinto the Romans. In the very like manner, were the reli of that Nation overcome soone after, at the other mountaine: onely more of them saved themselves by slight, as having fairer way at their backes.

These warres being ended: Fulaius and Manlius were appointed, by the Senate, each of them to retaine as Proconsial his Province for another yeare. Fulaius, in his 50 second yeare, did little or nothing. Manlius gave peace to those whom hee had vanquished; as likewise to Ariarathes the Cappadocius, and some others, not by him vanquished, but submitting themselves for seare of the Roman armes. Hee drew from them all what profit he could: and laid vpon them such conditions, as hee thought expedient. He also did finish the league of peace with Aniachus, whereto

he swore, and received the Kings oath by Embassadours, whom hee sent for that purpose, Finally, having set in order the matters of Asia, he tooke his way toward the Hellefont, loaden with spoile, as carrying with him (besides other treasures) all that the Gallogreekes had in fo many yeares extorted, from the wealthic Prouinces that lay round about them. Neither did this Armic of Manlius returne home, rich in money alone, or cattaile, or things of needfull vie, which the Roman fouldier had beene wont to take as the only good purchase; but furnished with sumptuous houlhold-stuffe, and slaues of price, excellent Cookes, and Musitians for banquets, and, in a word, with the feedes of that luxuric, which finally ouer-grew

Liu.l.19.

The Countrie of Thrace lay betweene Hellespont and the Kingdome of Macedon, which way Manlius was to take his journie homeward. L. Scipio had found no impediment among the Thracians: either for that he passed through them, without any fuch bootie as might prouoke them; or perhaps rather, because Philip of Macedon had taken order, that the Barbarians should not stirre. But when Manlius came along with an huge traine of baggage; the Thracians could not fo well containe themselves. Neither was it thought, that Philip tooke it otherwise than verie pleasantly, to haue this Roman Armie robbed, and well beaten on the way. He had cause to be angrie; seeing how little himselfe was regarded, and what great rewards were given to Eumenes. For he vnderstood, and afterwards gave the Romans 20 to understand, that Eumenes could not have abidden in his owne Kingdome, if the People of Rome had not made warre in Afia : whereas contrariwife, Antiochus had offered vnto himselse three thousand talents, and siftie ships of warre, to take part with him and the Ætolians; promiting moreouer to restore vnto him all the Greeke Cities, that had been taken from him by the Romans. Such being the difference betweene him and Eumenes, when the warre began; he thought it no euen dealing of the Romans, after their victoric, to give away not onely the halfe of Alia, but Cher sonne su and Lysimachia in Europe, to Eumenes; whereas vpon himselfe they beflowed not any one Towne. It agreed not indeed with his Nobilitie, to goe to Rome and begge Prouinces in the Senate, as Eumenes and the Rhodians had lately done. 20 He had entertained louingly the two Scipie's, whom he thought the most honourable men in Rome; and was growne into neare acquaintance with Publius, holding correspondence with him by letters, whereby hee made himselfe acquainted with the warres in Spaine and Africke. This perhaps he deemed fufficient, to breed in the Romans a due respect of him. But Eumenes tooke a surer way. For the Scipio's had not the disposing of that which they wanne from Antiochies : as neither indeed had Manlius, nor the ten Delegates affifting him; but the Senate of Rome, by which those Delegates were chosen, and instructed how to proceed. When Philip therefore faw the fe vpftart Kings of Pergamus, whom he accounted as base companions, advanced to highly, and made greater than himfelfe; yea himfelfe vnregar- 40 ded, contemned, and exposed to many wrongs: then found he great cause to wish. that he had not so hastily declared himselfe against Antiochus, or rather that hee had joined with Antiochies and the Atolians, by whom he might have beene freed from his infolent masters. But what great argument of such discontented nesset the Macedonian had, we shall verie shortly be vrged to discourse more at large. At the present it was belocued, that the Thracians were by him set on, to assaile the Romans passing through their Countrie. They knew all advantages: and they fell, vnexpected, vpon the carriages, that were bestowed in the midst of the Armie; whereof part had alreadie passed a dangerous wood, through which the baggage followed; part was not yet fo farre aduanced. There was enough to get, and enough to 50 leave behinde: though both the getting, and the fauing, did cost many lives, as well of the Barbarians as of the Romans. They fought vntill it grew night: and then the Thracians withdrew themselves; not without as much of the bootie as was to their full content. And of such trouble there was more, though lessed dangerous, before the Armic could get out of Thrace into Micedon. Through the Kingdome they had a faire march into Epirus; and fo to Apollonia, which was their handle of Greece. To Manlius, and to Fuluius, when each of them returned to the Citic, was granted the honour of Triumph. Yet not without contradiction : especially to Manliss; whom some of the ten Delegates, appointed to affish him, did very bitterly taxe, as an vnworthie Commander. Touching the rest of their accusation; it sufficeth that he made good answere, and was approued by the chiefe of the Senate. One clause is worthie of more particular consideration. Reprehending his desire to have hindred the peace with Antiochus; they said, That with much adoe he was kept Links

10 from leading his Armieouer T AVRVS, and adventuring vyon the calamitie threatned by SYBYLS verses, unto those that should passe the fatallbounds. What calamitie or overthrow this was, wherewith Sibyls prophecie threatned the Roman Captaine or Armie, that should passe ouer Taurus, I doe not conceiue. Pompey was the first, that marched with an Armie beyond those limits: though the victories of Lucullus had opened vnto him the way, and had before hand wonne, in a fort, the Countries on the other fide of the Mount; which Lucullus gave to one of Antiochus his race, though Pompey occupied them for the Romans. But we finde not, that either Lucullus or Pompey suffered any losse, in presuming to neglect the bounds appointed by Sibyl. Indeed the accomplishment of this prophecie, fell out neare about 20 one time, with the restitution of Ptolemie King of Agypt; that was forbidden vnto the Romans by the same Sibyl. It may therefore seeme to have had reference, vnto the same things, that were denounced, as like to happen vpon the reduction of the Egyptian King. Whether the Oracles of Sibyl had in them any truth, and were not, as Tullie noteth, fowed at randome in the large field of Time, there to take Tullide Dining. root, and get credit by euent; I will not here difforte. But I hold this more proba- 1.2. ble, than that the restitution of Ptolemie to his Kingdome by Gabineus the Roman, should have any way betokened the comming of our Saujour : as some both ancient and moderne Christian Writers, have beene well pleased to interprete Sibyl in that prophecie. Of the Sibyllme prædictions I have sometimes thought reverend-

20 lie: though not knowing what they were (as I thinke, few men know) yet following the common beleefe and good authoritie. But observation of the shamefull Idolatrie, that vpon all occasions was advanced in Rome by the bookes of Sibyl, had well prevailed vpon my credulitie, and made mee suspect, though not the faith and pious meaning, yet the indgement of Eusebius: when that learned and excellent worke of master Casaubon vpon the Annales of Cardinall Baronius, did altogether 1sace. Casaub. free me from mine errour; making it apparent, That not only those prophecies of Exercitat. 1. Sibyl, wherein Christ so plainly was foreshewed, but even the bookes of Hermes, n. 10. 611. which have borne such reputation, were no better than counterfeited peeces, and at first entertained (whosoeuer deuised them) by the vndiscreet zeale of such, as

40 delighted in seeing the Christian Religion strengthned with forreine proofes. And in the same ranke, I thinke, we ought to place that notable Historic, reported by Eusebius from no meane Authors, Of the honour which was done to Simon Magus Euseb Eschill. in Rome; namely of an Altar to him crected, with an inscription Simoni Deo Sancto, 12.6.13. that is, To Simon the holy God. For what can be more strange, than that a thing so memorable, and so publike, should have beene quite omitted by Tacitus, by Suetanius, by Dion, and by all which wrote of those times? Philosophers and Poets would not have suffered the matter to escape in silence, had it beene true; neither can it be thought that Seneca, who then lived and flourished, would have abstained from speaking any word of an Argument so famous. Wherefore I am perswaded, to that this inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, was, by some bad Criticisme, taken amisse in place of SEMONI SANGO: a title foure hundred yeares older than the time of Simon Magus. For the goods of one Vitruuius a Rebell, had many ages before beene consecrated SEMONI SANGO, that is, To the Spirit or Demi god Sangus, in whose Chapell they were bestowed. So as either by the ill shape of the old Roman letters, or by some spoile that Time had wrought vponthem; it might easily come to paffe, that the words should be miffe-read, SIMONI SARCTO, and that some Christian who had heard of Simon Magus, but not of Sangus, thereupon should frame the conjecture, which now passeth for a true Historie. Such conje-Etures, being entertained without examination, finde credit by Tradition, whereby alfo, many times, their fashion is amended, and made more historicall, than was conceined by the Author. But it cannot be fafe, to let our faith (which ought to stand firme ypon a fure foundation) leane ouer-hardly on a well painted, yet rotten, post.

Now concerning the Triumph of Cn. Manlius, it may be numbred among a to few of the richest, which ever the Citie beheld. Out of that which he brought into the Treasurie, was made the last paiment of those monies, which the Common-wealth had borrowed from private men, in the fecond Punicke warre. So long was it, that Rome had fill fome feeling of Hannibal: which being past, there was remaining neither care, nor memoric, of any danger. This Triumph of Manline was deferred by him, even as long as he well could: for that he thought it not fafe, to make his entrance into the Citic, vntill the heat of an Inquilition, then raging therein, should be allayed. The two Scipio's were called, one after other, into judgement, by two Tribunes of the People; men, only by this accusation, knowne to Posteritie. P. Scipio the African, with whom they began, could not endure that 20 fuch vnworthie men should question him, of purloining from the Common Treasurie, or of being hired with bribes by Antiochus, to make an ill bargaine for his Countrie. When therefore his day of answere came; he appeared before the Tribunes, not humbly as one accused, but followed by a great traine of his friends and Clients, with which he passed through the middest of the Assemblie, and offered himselfe to speake. Having audience, he told the People, That vpon the fame day of the yeare he had fought a great battaile with Hannibal, and finished the Punicke Warre by a fignall victorie. In memorie whereof, hee thought it no fit feason to brabble at the Law; but intended to visit the Capitoll, and there give thankes to Jupiter and the rest of the gods, by whose grace, both on that day and at 30 other times, he had well and happily discharged the most weightie businesse of the Common wealth. And hereto he invited with him all the Citizens: requesting them, That if ever fince the feventeenth yeare of his life, until he now grew old, the honourable places by them conferred upon him, had prevented the capacitie of his age, and yes his deferts had exceeded the great neffe of those honourable places; then would they pray that the Princes and great ones of their Citie might flill be like to him. These words were heard with great approbation: fo as all the people, euen the Officers of the Court, followed Scipio; leaving the Tribunes alone, with none about them, excepting their owne flaues and a Crier, by whom ridiculoufly they cited him to judgement, vntill for verie shame, as not knowing what else to doe, they granted him, 40 vnrequested, a surther day. After this, when the African perceived that the Tribunes would not let fall their fuit, but enforce him to fubmit himselfe to a disgracefull triall: he willingly relinquilhed the Citie, and his vnthankfull Romans, that could fuffer him to vindergoe so much indignitie. The rest of his time he spent at Liternum: quietly, with a few of his inward friends, and without any defire of feeing Rome againe. How many yeares he lived, or whether he lived one whole yeare, in this voluntarie banishment; it is vocertaine. The report of his dying in the fame yeare, with Hannibal and Philopamen, as also of his private behaviour at Liternum, render it probable, that he outlined the Tribuneship of his accusers; who meant to have drawne him backe to his answere, if one of their Colleagues (as one 50 of them had power to hinder all the rest from proceeding) had not caused them to delift. Howfoeuer it was : the fame Tribunes went more sharply to worke with L. Scipiothe Aliatique. They propounded a Decree vnto the People, touching monic received of Antiochie, and not brought into the common Treasurie; That the Senate should give charge vnto one of the Prætors, to inquire, and indicially determine, thereof. In fauour of this Decree an Oration was made by Cato, the supposed author of these contentions, and instigator of the Tribunes. He was a man of great, but not perfect, vertue: temperate, valiant, and of fingular industrie; frugall alfo, both of the publike, and of his owne; fo as in this kinde he wascuen faultie : for though be would not be corrupted with bribes, yet was he vn merciful and vn confcionable, in feeking to encrease his owne wealth, by such meanes as the Law did warrant. Ambition was his vice; which being poyloned with enuic, troubled both himselfe, and the whole Citie, whilett he lived. His meane birth caused him to to hate the Nobilitie; especially those that were in chiefe estimation. Neither did he spare to bite at such as were of his owne ranke, men raised by desert, if their adnancement were like to hinder his: but lately before this, when Glabrio, whose Licutenant he had beene at Thermopyla, was his Competitor for the Cenforship. and likely to carrie it, he tooke an Oath against him, which was counted as no better than malicious periurie, That he had not brought into the common Treasurie fome vestels of gold and filuer, gotten in the Campe of Antiochus. Now the hatred which he bare vnto the Scipioes grew partly (belides his generall fpight at the Nobilitie) from his owne first rifing, wherein he was countenanced by Fabius Maximus, who brooked not the African; partly from some checke, that was given vnto

20 himselfe, in the African voyage, by P. Scipio, whose Treasurer be then was. For when Cato did vtter his dislike of the Consuls bad husbandrie (judging Magnificence to be no better) in some peremptoric manner; Scipio plainely told him, That he had no need of fuch double diligence in his Treasurer. Wherefore, either not caring what lies he published, or for want of judgement thinking vnworthily of the vertue that was farre aboue him, Cato filled Rome with vntrue reports against his Generall; whose noble deeds confuted sufficiently the author of such false tales. And thus began the hatred: which being not regarded nor thought vpon by the Scipiaes, whilest it was nourished by their enemie, brake out vpon aduantage, especially against L. Scipio, his brother being dead, or out of the way. A seuere inquirie and

30 judgement being appointed of purpose against Scipio, matters were so carried, that he was soone condemned in a summe of money, farre exceeding his abilitie to pay. For non payment, his bodie should have been elayed up in prison: but from this rigour of the Law he was freed by Tiberius Gracebus, the same Tribune who had caused the suit against the African to be let fall. In his estate, which was confiscated to the vic of the Citie, when there neither appeared any figure of his having beene beholding to Antiochus, nor was found fo much as what he had beene condemned to pay; then fell his accusers, and all whose hands had beene against him, into the indignation of the People. But for this was L. Scipio no whit the better. His kindred, friends, and clients made such a collection for him, as would have set him in better 40 estate than before, if he had accepted it. He tooke no more than such of his owne goods, as were of necessarie vse, being redeemed for him by his necrest friends. And thus began the civile warre of the Tonque, in the Roman pleadings : which had either not beene, or not beene much regardable, vntill now, fince the Punicke Warre. Securitie of danger from abroad, and fome want of fufficient employment, were especiall helpes to the kindling of this fire; which first caught hold vpon that great Worthie, to whose vertue Rome was indebted, for changing into so great securitie her extreame danger. But these factious contentions did no long while contains themselves within heat of wordes and cunning practise. For when the Art of leading the multitude, in such quarrelsome businesse, grew to perfecti-

50 on, they that found them felues ouer-matched by their adverfaries, at this kinde of weapon, began to make opposition, first with clubbes and stones, afterward with fwords; and finally, proceeded from frayes and murders in the streets, vnto battaile in the open field. Cornelia, daughter of Scipio the African, a Ladie of rare vertue, that in honour of her two fonnes was more commonly named Mother of the

Gracely, faw those her two sonnes, whilest they were but yong, slaughtered in Rome, together with some of their friends, by those whom they opposed, and their death not reuenged by order of Law, but rather approved by the Senate. At these times the Senatours began to take vpon them authoritie, more than was to them belonging. They conferred vpon the Confuls all the whole power of the Citie, vnder this forme, Let the Confuls provide, that the Commonweale receive no detriment. By this Decree of theirs, and by their proclaiming any Citizen enemie to the State, they thought to have woon a great advantage over the multitude. But after the death of C. Gracehus, and of Saturninus a popular man, whom by such authoritie they did put out of the way; it was not long ere Marins, a famous Captaine of theirs, was 10 to condemned, who by force of armes returned into the Citie, and murdered all the principall Senatours: whereupon began the civile warres; which giving vnto Sylla, who prevailed therein, meanes to make himselfe absolute Lord of Rome, taught Cafar, a man of higher spirit, to affect and obtaine the like soueraigne power, when by the like Decree of the Senate he was prouoked. It is true, that neuer any Confull had finally cause to rejoyce, of his having put in execution such authoritie to him committed by the Senate. But as the furie of the multitude, in paffing their Lawes, by hurling of stones, and other violence, made the Citic stand in need of a Soueraigne Lord: fo the vehemencie of the Senate, in condemning as enemics those that would not submit themselves, when they were over-topped by voices 20 in the House, did compell Cesar, or give him at least pretence, to right himselfe by armes: wherewith prevailing against his adversaries, he tooke such order, that neither Senate, nor People, should thenceforth be able to doc him wrong. So by intefline difcord, the Romans confuming all or most of their principall Citizens, lost their owne freedome, and became subjects vnto the arbitrarie gouernment of One: suffering this change in three generations, after this beginning of their infolent rule, wherein they tooke vpon them as the highest Lords on Earth, to doe even what they lifted. Yet had not Rome indeed attained hitherto vnto compleat greatnesse, nor beleeved of her felfe as if she had, whilest a King sate crowned on the Throne of Alexander, continuing and vpholding the reputation of a former Empire. 30 Wherefore this confummation of her honour was thought vpon betimes. How it was effected, the fequele will discouer.

CHAP. VI. The second Macedonian Warre.

d. I.
The Condition wherein those Princes and Estates remained, which were associates of the 40 Romans, when the warre with ANTIOCHVS was finished. The Romans quarrell with PHILIP. They deale insolently with the Acheans. The Macedonian, being whreadie for warre, obtaines peace at Rome, by his sonne DEMETRIVS; of whom thenceforth he becomes icalous.

FTER the ouerthrow of Antiochus, although Philip of Macedon, Eumenes King of Pergamus, the Commonweale of the Acheans, and all other the States of Greece, were gouerned by the same Lawes and Magistrates, as they formerly had beene, before the arriuall of the Romans in those parts : yet in verie 50 truth (the publike declaration excepted) they were none other than absolute vasfalls to the People of Rome. For of those five Prerogatives belonging to a Monarch, or vnto Soueraigne power, in whome focuer it reft; namely, To make Lawes, To create Magistrates, To arbitrate Peace and Warre, To beate Monie; and To referue (as the French call it) le dermier refort, or the last Appeales, the Romans had assumed foure; and the greatest of them so absolutely, that is, The Appeale, or last resort, as everie pettic injurie offered to each other by the fore-named Kings or States, was heard and determined either by the Roman Embassadours, or Commissioners, in those places whence the Complaint came, or otherwise by the Senatours themselues within Rome: from whose arbitrement, or direction, if either King, or Commonweales, declined, He or they were beaten, and enforced to obedience; or had their Effates and Regalities vtter-10 ly dissolued. Neuerthelesse it is true, that they had their owne Lawes, and Officers of their owne ordaining: yet so, as neither their Lawes were of force, when the Romans interpoled their will to the contrarie; neither was their election of Magistrates fo free, as that they had not therein especiall regard vnto the good pleasure of these their Masters.

And to such degree of servitude the severall Estates of Greece did bow verice gently: either as being thankefull for their deliuerance from a yoke more fentibly grieuous, or, as being skilfull in the art of flatterie, and therein taking delight, fince therein confifted their chiefe hope of thrining; or, as being more fearefull of dif-

pleasing the strongest, than mindfull of their owne honour. But Eumenes living 20 further off, and being most obsequious vnto the Romans, was not, of long time, questioned about any of his doings: his conformitie vnto them in matter of warre and peace, together with the diuersion of their thoughts another way, giving him leave to vie his owne euen as he lifted, vntill they should otherwise dispose of him. Neither was it a little auaileable to him, that his Kingdome bordered vpon the Nations, by them not throughly subdued. For vpon the same reason (as well as vpon his owne high deferts) were they veric louing vnto Masanissa, and to his House, vntill Carthage was ruined, and their Dominion fetled in Afrike: as likewife afterwards to the Kings of Mauritania, Cappadocia, and others: holding people in subjection vnto themselues, by the ministeric of Kings; especially of such Kings, as were viefull 30 and obsequious vnto them.

Now the Macedonian was of a more noble temper; and showed himselfe not forgetfull of his owne former greatnesse, the honour of his race, or the high reputation of his Kingdome. But fuch magnanimitie was none otherwise construed by the Romans, than as want of due reverence to their Estate, and a valuation of himfelfe against them: which, in the pride of their fortune, they could not endure. Wherefore, notwithstanding that hee had lately given passage to their Armies through his Countrie, prepared the wayes for them, and furnished them both with victuals, and other things needfull, to transport them over the Hellespont into Alia. against Antiochus: yet vpon the complaint of Europeas, and the States of Thessal 40 and Thrace, he was commaunded to abandon the Cities of Anus and Marones, with all Pecces and Places demaunded by any of his neighbours; whereof manie of them he had lately conquered, by direction, or licence, euen from the Romans themfelues.

These Townes of Anus and Maronea had beene part of Lylimachus his Kingdome: who from Thrace Northwards, and to the Northwest, extended his dominion verie farre. He is thought to have made himselfe Lord of Transylvania: in which Province it is faid, * That innumerable Medals of gold have beene found, in the Hift: of Hungaage of our grandfathers, each of them weighing two or three crownes, and flamped it by Mari: with his Image on the one fide, on the other fide with Victorie. Of all these Lord-

50 (hips, the possession, or rather the title (for he lined not to settle his estate in Europe) fell to Seleuens Wicator by right of warre, wherein he vanquished and flue Lysimachus: as alfo, by the like right, Ptolomie Ceraunus thought them his owne, when he had murdered Seleucus. But the inundation of the Gaules, which the Kingdome of Macedon could not sustaine, did shortly and eafily wash away from that Crowne, together with the more part of Thrace, all those heapes of land newly thereto annexed. Somewhat of this was afterwards regained by Antigonus the sonne of Demetrius, and his successours: though not much; for they were otherwise busied. The furie of the Gaules being ouer-past, those Countries which lately had beene oppressed by them, recoursed their libertic; and not only held it, but learned, some of them, especially the Dardanian and wild Thracians, to finde their advantages, and make vie of them, even vpon Macedon. Against the mischiefes commonly done by these. King Philip did prouide the most conucnient remedies: by shutting vp the wayes, whereby the Dardanians might enter into his Kingdome; and by occupying Lyfimachia, with fome other Townes in Thrace, which he fortified, as Bulwarkes of 10 his owne Countrey, against the Barbarians. Now, although it behoued him thus to doe, for the defence of his owne citate: yet for a fmuch as the fe Townes were, in a manner, at absolute libertie, his possession of them was thought to partake more of violence than of justice. And in this respect he was formerly accused by the Atolians, of wrongfull vsurpation and oppression, in his hauing occupied Lysimachia. Hereto he made a good answere, That his Garrison did onely saue it from the Thracians: who, as foone as hee thence withdrew his men, did feize vpon the Towne, and ruine it. The like perhaps he might have laid, touching Anus and Marones; That they were Places vnable to defend themselves, and Gates, by which the Barbarians might haue entrance into his Kingdome. But this Plea had not auayled him, 20 in the disputation about Lysmachia: and in the present question, the Romans were not without their owne title; fince Antiochus had gotten all the Countrie thereabout, whilest Philip was busied in his former warre; and since they, by their victorie had gotten vnto themselues all the title, which Antiochus thereto could pretend. Wherefore he onely submitted his right vnto the good pleasure of the Senate: referring it vnto their disposition, Whether Anus and Marones should be set at libertie, whether left in his hand, or whether bestowed vpon Eumenes; who begged them, as an appendix to Lysimachia and Chersonnesius, that were alreadic his by their gift. What they would determine, he might eafily perceiue, by the demeanour of their Embaffadors towards him: who fitting as Iudges betweene him and all that 20 made complaint vpon him, gaue sentence against him in euerie controuersie. Neuerthelesse, he sent Embassadoursto Rome, there to maintaine his right vnto these Townes; wherein he thought, that equitie (if it might prevaile) was wholly on his fide. For he had holpen their Confuls in the warre against Antiochus and the Atolians: wherein whatfocuer he had gotten for himfelfe, was now taken from him by their Embassadours: and would they now depriue him of those two Townes, lying so fitly for the guard of his Kingdome, which he had gotten to himselfe out of the ruines of Antiochus, like as out of his owne ruines Antiochus had gotten in those quarters a great deale more? By fuch allegations either hee was likely to preuaile, or at leastwife to gaine time, wherein he might bethinke himselfe what he had to 40 doe. It was not long ere he had word from Rome, That the Senate were no more equall to him, than had beene their Embaffadours. Wherefore, confidering how infolently the Maronites had behaued themselves, in pleading against him for their libertie, he tooke counsell of his owne passions; and (as by nature hee was verie cruell) gaue order to Onomassus, that was Warden of the Sea-coasts, to handle these Maronites in such fort, as they might have little joy of the libertie by them fo earnestly defired. Onomassus employed Cassander, one of the Kings men dwelling in Maronea, and willed him to let in the Thracians by night, that they might facke the Towne, and vse all cruelties of warre. This was done, but so ill taken by the Roman Embaffadours, who had better notice, than could have beene 50 feared, of these proceedings; that the King was by them directly charged with the crime, and called more strictly, than became his Majestie, to an accompt. He would have removed the blame from himselfe, and layed it even upon the Maronites; affirming, That they, in heat of their Factions, being some inclinable

to him, other fome to Eumenes, had fallen into such outrage, that they had out one anothers throtes. And hereof hee willed the Embaffadours to inquire, among the Maronites themselues : as well knowing, that they who survived were either his owne friends; or so terrified and amazed by the late execution of his vengeance among them, that they durft not ytter an offenfine word. But hee found the Romans more severe, and more throughly informed in the businesse, than to rest contented with fuch an answere. He was plainly told. That if he would discharge himselfe of the crime objected; he must send Onomastus and Cassander to Rome. there to be examined as the Senate should thinke fit. This did not a little trouble 10 him. Yethe collected his spirits, and said that Cassander should be at their dispofition : but concerning Onomastus, who had not beene at Maronea, nor neare to it, her requested them not to presse him; since it stood not with his honour, so lightly to give away his friends. As for Callander, because he should tell no tales : hee tooke order to have him poisoned by the way. By this weeke, That the do-Etrine, which Machiauel taught vnto Cafar Borgia, To employ men in mischicuous actions and afterwards to destroy them when they have performed the mischiefes was not of his owne inuention. All ages have given vs examples of this goodlie pollicie, the latter having beene apt schollers in this lesson to the more ancient : as the reigne of Henrie the eighth here in England, can beare good witnesse and 30 therein especially the Lord Crommell, who perished by the same vniust Law that himselfe had deuised, for the taking away of another mans life, Suchactions of Philip made an unbleafant noise at Rome, and were like to have brought vpon him the warre which like feared, before hee was readie to entertaine it. Wherefore hee emploied his younger some Demetrius as Embassadour vnto the Senate; giving him instructions, how to make answere to all complaines and withall to deliver his owne griemances, in such wise that is ought were smille, yet might it appears that hee had beene strongly vrged to take such courses. The summe of his Embassage was, to pacific the Romans, and make all eyen for the present. Demetrius himselse was knowne to be veries acceptable vnto the 3° Senate as having beene well approved by them, when he was hostage in Rome, and therefore seemed the more likelie, to prevaile some was hostage in Rome, and therefore seemed the more likelie, to prevaile some west onely in regard that would be borne vnto his person.

Whilest this businesse with the Macedonian hung in suspense, and whilest he, by his readineffe to make submission, seemed likelie to divert from him felfe some other way the Roman armes : the same Embassadours, that had beene Judges betweene him and his neighbours, made their progresse through the rest of Greece; and tooke notice of the controuerlies, which they found betweene some Estates in the Countrie. The greatest cause that was heard before them, was the complaint of the banished Laced amonians against the Acheans. It was objected vinto the Ache-40 ans. That they had committed a grieuous flaughter you many Citizens of Lacedamon: That vnto this crueltie they had added a greater, in throwing downe the walles of the Citie: as also further, in changing the Lawes, and abrogating the famous Institutions of Lycurgus. Hereto Lycortas, then Prator of the Acheans, made answere. That these banished Laced amonians, who now tooke you them to accuse the Nation that had once protected them, were notoriously knowne to be the men, who had themselves committed that murder, whereof shamelesly they laid the blame voon others: the Achaans having onely called those vnto judgement, that were supposed to be chiefe authors of a Rebellion against both them and the Romans; and these plaintifes having slaine them, vpon private, though inst hatred, 50 as they were comming to make an lwere for themselves. Concerning their throwing downe the walles of Lacedamen, hee faid it was most agreeable to Lycurgus his ordinance: who, having perswaded his Citizens to defend their Towne and liber-

Retraits and Nestscither of Cowards, or (whereof Lacedamon had wofull experience) of Tyrants and Viurpers. Further he shewed, how the same Tyrants that had built these walles, and hemmed in the Spartans, had also quite abolished Lycurgu hisordinances; and gouerned the Citie by their owne lawlesse will. As for the Acheans; they communicated their owne Lawes, which they held for the best, or elsewould soone change them and take better, vnto the Lacedamonians; whom they found without Lawes, or any tolerable forme of policie. For conclusion, Lycortes plainly told App. Claudius the chiefe of the Embassadours, That hee and his Countrimen held it ftrange, being friends and faithfull Allies of the Romans, to see themselues thus constrained, to answere and give account of their actions; as vasfals to and flaues vnto the People of Rome. For if they were indeed at libertie: why might northe Acheans as well require to be fatisfied about that which the Romans had done at Capus, as the Romans did busie themselves, to take account how things went at Lacedamon? For if the Romans would fland vpon their greatnesse, and intimate, as they began, that the libertie of their friends was nothing worth, longer than should please themselues to ratifie it : then must the Achaans have recourse vnto those Agreements, that were confirmed by oath, and which without periurie could not be violated; as reuerencing, and indeed fearing, the Romans, but much more, the immortall gods. To this bold answere of Lycortus, Appius found little to replie. Yet taking state voon him, hee pronounced more like a Master than a 20 Judge, That if the Acheans would not be ruled by faire meanes, and carne thankes whileft they might sthey should be compelled with a mischiefe, to doe what was required at their hands, whether they would or no. This altercation was in the Parliament of the Acheans; which ground to heare the Lordly words of Appius. Yet Feare prenailed aboue Indignation: and it was permitted vnto the Romans to doe as they lifted. Hereupon the Embassadours restored some banished and condemned men : but the Roman Senate, verie soone after, did make void all Iudgements of death or banishment, that had beene laid by the Acheans upon any Citizen of Lacedemen; as like wife they made it a matter of disputation, whether or no the Citie and Territoric of Lacedamon, should be suffered to continue a member of 20 the Achean Common-wealth; or taken from them, and made, as it had beene, an Estate by it selfe. By bringing such a matter into question, the Ramans well declared, That they held it to depend spon their owne will, how much or how little any of their confederates should be suffered to enjoy : though by contributing Sparta to the Councell of Achaia, they discovered no leffe, as to them feemed, the love which they bare vnto the Achaians, than the power which they had over

Theo fuch flauerie had the Greekes, and all Kings and Common-weakes what foeuer, bordering vpon any part of the Mediterran Seas, reduced themselves; by calling in the Romans to their fuccour. They wanted not the good counfaile and per- 40 swallons of many wife and temperate men among them; They had also the examples of the Italians, Spaniards, Gaules, and Africans, all fuldued by the Romans, and, by feeking Patronage, made meere vallals; to instruct them, what in the like case they should expect : yet could not the true reasons of Estate and Policie so prevaile with them, but their private paffions, and neighbouring hatred, which hath evermore bought revenge at the price of felfe-ruine, brought them from the honour which they enjoyed, of being free Princes and Cities, into most base and

All this made well for Philip of Macedon: who though he faw the Greekes verie farre from daring to stirre against those, by whom both hee and they were kept in 50 awe; yet was hee not without hope, that (few of them excepted, whom the Roman by freeing from his subjection had made his implacable enemies) in heartie affectionall the Countrie would be his, when source he should take armes, as short-lie he was like to doc. Young Demetrius, comming home from Rome, brought with him the defired ratification of peace; though qualified with much indignitie foone following. He had beene louingly vied at Rome, and heard with great fanour in the Senate. There being confounded with the multitude of objections, whereto his youth, vnskilfull in the Art of wrangling, could not readily make anfwere : it was permitted vnto him, to reade fuch briefe notes as hee had received from his Father, and out of those the Senate were contented to gather satisfaction; more for Demetrius his owne fake, as they then faid and wrote into Macedon, than for any goodnesse in the defence. Such pride of theirs, in remitting his faults at 10 the entreatic of his founc, together with fome infolence of his fonne, growing (as appeared) from this fauour of the Romans; did increase in Philip his hatred vnto Rome, and breed in him aicalousie of histoo forward sonne. To let him forward in these passions, there came daily new Embassadours from Rome; some bringing one commandement; fome another; and fome, requiring him to fulfill those things, which had been imposed upon him by their fore-goers. Neither were there wanting that observed his countenance: and when hee had fulfilled all that was required at his hands; yet laid it to his charge that hee had done things ynwillingly, and would be obedient, no longer than he needs must. With these Embaffadours young Demetrius was converfant : rather perhaps out of limplicitie and 20 for that they made much of him, than for any ambitious respect; yet a great deale more than was pleafing to his father. So the rumour grew current through all Maceden, That Perfeus, the elder fonne of the King, should not succeed vnto his father; but that the Diademe should be conferred upon Demetrius, if not by some other pretence, yet by meere fauour of the Romans. This offended not onely Perfeus, but Philip himselfe : who suspected his younger sonne, as more Roman than his owner, and accordingly misconstruct all his doings. But ere wee proceed vnto the bitter fruits of this sealousie; it will not be amisse, to speake of some memorable accidents that were in the meane time.

ð. I I.

The death of PHILOPOEMEN, HANNIBAL, and SCIPIO. That the militarie profession is of all other the most unhappie : not withstanding some examples, which may seeme to product be contrarie.

He Romans, wanting other matter of quarrell in the Continent of Greece, had of late beene so peremptorie with the Acheans; that they feemed not valikely to take part against them, in any controuersic that should be moued. Hereupon the Messem, who against their will were annexed vato the Ashean Common-wealth, having long beene of a contrarie Faction thereto; grew bold to withdraw themselues from that Societie, with purpose to set vp againe an Estate of their owne, seucred from communion with any other. This was the deuice of some that were powerfull in their Citie; who finding the multitude onely inclinable to their purpole, and not ouer-firongly affected in the bufineffe; were carefull to fecke occasion of reducing things to fuch paffe, that al their Citizens might be entangled in a pecellitie of flanding out, and of not returning to the Achean League. And hereupon they began to doe fome acts of hostilitie; whereby it was probable that bloud should bee 50 drawne, and either fide fo farre exasperated, that little hope of agreement would be left. Upon the fame of their commotion and proceedings; Philopamen, then Pretor of the Acheans, levied fuch forces as hee could in hafte, and went against them. Many principall gentlemen of the Acheans, especially of the Megalopolitans, were foone in a readinesse to wait upon him. Besides these, which were all, or for the most part, Horse; he had some Auxiliaries out of Thrace and Crete, that vsually were kept in pay. Thus accompanied, hee met with Dinocrates, Captaine of the Messenians; whom hee charged, and forced to runne. But whilest his horsemen were too carnest in following the chace; there arrived, by chance, a supplie of fine hundred from Messene, which gaue new courage vnto those that fled. So the Enemics began to make head againe; and with the helpe of those, who very seasonably came to their aide, compelled Philopamens Horsemen to turne backe. Philopamen himselse had long beene sicke of an Ague, and was then very weake: yet the greatnesse of his courage would not suffer him, to bee negligent of their safetie, which had fo willingly aduentured themselues under his conduct. He tooke upon him to make the Retrait: and fuffering his horsemen to passe along by him in a narrow lane, he often turned about against the Messenians; whom his reputation, and the knowledge of his great worth, did terrific from approaching ouer-neare to him, But it fell out vnhappily, that being cast to ground by a fall of his horse, and being withall in very weake plight of bodie, he was vnable to get vp againe. So the Enemies came vpon him, and tooke him; yet fearce beleeued their fortune to bee fo good, although their cies were witneffes. The first messenger that brought these newes to Messene, was so farre from being beleeved, that he was hardly thought to be in his right wits. But when the truth was affirmed by many reports, all the Citie ran forth to meet him, and behold the spectacle seeming so incredible. They 20 caused him to be brought into the Theater, that therethey might satisfie themfelues with beholding him. The greatest part of them had compassion on his misfortune : and in commemoration both of his vertue, and of the fingular benefits by him done vnto them, especially in deliuering them from Nabis the Tyrant; began to manifest their good will for his deliuerie. Contrariwise, Dinocrates and his Faction were desirous hastily to take away his life : because they held him a man implacable, and one that would never leave any difgrace, or injurie, done to him, vnreuenged. They durst not one trust another with the keeping of him : but committed him into a strong vault under ground, that had beene made for the custodie of their Treasure. So thither they let him downe fast bound, and with an engine 20 laid an heavie stone vpon the mouth of the vault. There hee had not staied long, ere his enemies had concluded his present death. The Hangman of the Citie was let downe vnto him, with a cup of poison, which Philopamen tooke in his hand: and asking no more than whether the Horsemen were escaped, and particularly whether Lycortas was fafe, when he heard an answere to his minde, he faid it was well: and so with acheerefull countenance, dranke his last draught. Hee was seuentie yeares old, and weakned with long fickneffe, whereby the poison wrought the sooner, and casily tooke away his life. The Acheans, when they missed him in their flight, were maruelloufly offended with themselves, for that they had beene more mindfull to preserve their owne lines, than to looke vnto the safetie of so excellent 40 a Commander. Whilest they were denising what to doe in such a case: they got aduertisement of his being taken. All Achaia was by this report vehemently afflieted: fo as Embaffadours were forthwith dispatched vnto Meffene, crauing his enlargement : and yet preparation made withall, to obtaine it by force, in case that faire meanes would not serue. Lycortas was chosen Generall of the Armie against Messene: who comming thither, and laying siege to the Towne, enforced it in short space to yeeld. Then Dinocrates, knowing what he was to expect, laid hands vpon himselfe, and made an end of his owne life. The rest of those that had beene partakers in the murder, were compelled to wait in bonds vpon the ashet of Philopamen, that were carried home in folemne pompe to Megalopolis; where they were all 10 of them flaine at his funerall, as facrifices to his Ghost whom they had offended. Q. Martius, a Roman Embassador, was then in Greece; whence, vpon one occasion or other, the Roman Embaffadors were seldome absent. He would have entermedled in this busines of Messene, had not Lycortas made short worke, and left him nothing to doc.

About the same time was T. Quintius Flaminius sent Embassador to Prusias King of Bithypia: not fo much to withdraw him from profecuting the warre against Eumenes, as to entreat him, that he would deliver Hannibal, the most spiehtfull enemie in all the world vnto the Senate and People of Rome, into his hands. Prufias (therein vnworthie of the Crowne he ware) did readily condifcend: or rather (as Linie thinkes) to gratifie the Romans, he determined either to kill Hannibal, or to deliver him aliue to Flaminius. For you the first conference betweene the King and Flaminius, a troupe of Souldiors were directed to guard and enuiron the lodging where Hannibal lay. That famous Captaine having found cause before this to sul-10 pect the faith of Prulias, had deuiled some secret sallies under ground to sauchimfelfe from any treasonable and sudden assault. But finding now that all parts about him were fore-closed, he had recourse to his last remedie; which he then was constrayned to practife, as well to frustrate his enemies of their triumphing over him, as to faue himselfe from their torture and mercilesse hands; who, as he well knew. would neither respect his famous enterprises, his honour, nor his age. When therefore he faw no way of escape nor counsell to refort vnto, he tooke the poylon into his hand, which he alwayes preserved for a sure Antidote against the sharpest difeafes of aduerse fortune; which being readie to swallow downe, he vttered these wordes: I will now (faid he) deliver the Romans of that feare, which hath fo many yeares

20 possess than scare, which makes them impatient to attend the death of an old man. This victorie of I. a m is it was our me, which am dissipated into his hand; fold mener be numbred among the reits of his beroical deeds: No, it shall make it manifest to all the Red into of the World, how farre the auncient Roman vertue is degenerate and corrupted. For such was the noblenesse of their foresathers, as, when P x m. it was in used them in Italia, and was readie to give them bataile at their owne dores, they gave him knowledge of the treason intended against him by posson: whereas these of a later race have employed F x M in x v x, and who had be vertofore been ene of their consills, to practife with P x v x 1 x x, contrarie to the honour of a King, contrarie to his Faith given, and contrarie to the Lawes of Hospitalitic, to say the consideration who were Guest. The then cur30 since he reston of Prusa, and all his, and desting the immortal quest to reunne bus insti-

In this yeare alfo (as good Authors haue reported) to accompanie Philopamen and Hannihal, died Scipio the African: thefe being, all of them, as great Captaines as euer the world had, but not more famous, than vnfortunate. Certainely, for Hannihal, whole Tragedie we haue now finished, had he beene Prince of the Carthaleginiss, and one who by his authoritie might haue commanuded such singleys, as the Warre which he vndertooke, required, it is probable, that he had torne up the Reman Empire by the roots. But he was so strongly cross by a cowardly and enuious Faction at home, as his proper vertue, wanting publike force to sultaine it, did 40 lastly dissolucit selfe in his owne, and in the common miserie of his Countrey and Commonweale.

Hence it comes, to wit, from the enuic of our equals, and jealouse of our Masters, be they Kings, or Commonweales, That there is no Profession more vaprosperous than that of Men of Warre, and great Captaines, being no Kings. For besides the enuic and jealousie of men; the spoyles, rapes, famine, slaughter of the innocent, vastation, and burnings, with a world of miseries layed on the labouring man, are so hatefull to God, as with good reason did Monlue the Masshall of France consteller. That were not the mercies of Go or infinite, and without refliction, it were in vaine for the following of the profession to hope for any portion of them. Jeing the westient, by them person mitted and committed, were also missine. How society, this is true, That the victories, which are obtayined by many of the greatest Commanunders, are commonly either ascribed to those that serve worder them, to Fortune, or to the cowardise of the Nation against whome they serve. For the most of others, whose vertues have rayled them about the levell of their inferiours, and have furnounted their enuic yet

haue they beene rewarded in the end, either with difgrace, banishment, or death. Among the Romans we finde many examples hereof; as Coriolanus, M. Liuisu, L. Amylius, and this our Scipio, whom wee have lately buried. Among the Greekes we reade of not many, that escaped these rewards. Yealong before these times, it was a Legacic that Danid bequeathed vnto his victorious Captaine Ioab. With this fare Alexander feafted Parmenio, Philotas, and others; and prepared it for Antipater and Cassander. Hereto Valentinian the Emperour innited Atim: who, after many other victories, ouerthrew Attila of the Hunnes, in the greatest battaile, for the well fighting and resolution of both Armies, that ever was strucken in the world; for there fell of those that fought, besides runne-awaies, an hundred and 10 fourescore thousand. Hereupon it was well and boldly told vnto the Emperour by Proximus. That in killing of Atius, he had cut off his owne right hand with his left : for it was not long after that Maximus (by whose perswasion Valentian flew Atius) murdered the Emperour, which hee never durft attempt, Atius living. And, besides the losse of that Emperour, it is true, That with Atim, the gloric of the Westerne Empire was rather dissoluted, than obscured, The same vnworthie destinie, or a farre worse, had Belli farius; whose undertakings and victories were so difficult and glorious, as after-ages suspected them for fabulous. For he had his eies torne out of his head by Justinian : and he died a blinde begger. Narfes also, to the great prejudice of Christian Religion, was disgrac'd by Justine. That Rule of Cato 20 against Scipio, hath beene well observed in enerie age since then, to wit, That the Common-weale cannot be accounted free, which standeth in awe of any one man. And hence have the Turkes drawne another Principle, and indeed a Turkilb one. That enerie warlike Prince should rather destroy his greatest men of warre, than suffer his owne glorie to be obscured by them. For this cause did Baiaret the fecond dispatch Bassa Acomat; Selm strangle Bassa Mustapha; and most of those Princes, bring to ruine the most of their Villers. Of the Spanish Nation, the great Gon-Jaluo, who draue the French out of Naples : and Ferdinando Cortefe, who conquered t Maxiga: were crowned with nettles not with Lawrell. The Earles of Egmond and Horn, had no heads left them to weare garlands on. And that the great Captaines 30 of all Nations, have been epaid with this copper coine 3 there are examples more than too many. On the contrarie it may bee faid, That many have acquired the State of Princes, Kings, and Emperours, by their great abilitie in matter of warre. This I confesse. Yet must it be had withall in consideration that these high places haue beene giuen, or offered, vnto verie few, as rewards of their militarie vertue; though many haue vsurped them, by the helpe and fauour of those Armies which they commanded. Neither is it vnregardable, That the Tyrants which have oppreffed the libertie of free Cities : and the Lieutenants of Kings or Emperours. which have traiteroufly cast downe their Masters, and stepped vp into their seats; were not all of them good men of warre : but have vied the advantage of some 40 commotion, or many of them, by base and coward lie practises, have obtained those dignities, which yndefernedly were afcribed to their personall worth. So that the number of those, that have purchased absolute greatnesse by the greatnesse of their warlike vertue; is farre more in feeming, than in deed. Phocas was a fouldiour, and by helpe of the fouldiours, hee got the Empire from his Lord Mauritius: but hee was a coward; and with a barbarous crueltie, feldome found in any other than cowards, hee flue first the children of Mauritius, a Prince that never had done him wrong, before his face, and after them Mauritius himfelfe. This his bloudie aspiring was but as a debt, which was paid vnto him againe by Heraelius: who tooke from him the Imperiall Crowne, vniuftly gotten, and fet it on his owne head. Le- 50 ontius laid hold vpon the Emperour Instine, cut off his nose and cares, and sent him into banishment : but Gods vengeance rewarded him with the same punishment, by the hands of Tiberius; to whose charge hee had left his owne men of warre, Infline, having recovered forces, lighted on Tiberius, and barbed him after the fame fallion. Philippicus, commanding the forces of Iustine, murdered both the Emperour and his sonne. Anastasius, the vassall of this new T yrant, surprised his Mafter Philippious, and thrust out both his eyes. But with Anaflafius, Theodofius dealt more gently: for having wrested the Scepter out of his hands, hee enforced him to become a Priest. It were an endlesse, and a needlesse worke to tell, how Leo rewarded this Theodofius; how many others have beene repayed with their owne crueltie, by men alike ambitious and cruell; or how many hundreds, or rather thousands, hoping of Captaines to make themselues Kings, have by Gops justice miserably perished in the attempt. The ordinarie, and perhaps the best way 10 of thriuing, by the practife of armes, is to take what may bee gotten by the spoyle of Enemies, and the liberalitie of those Princes and Cities, in whose service one hath well descrued. But scarce one of a thousand have prospered by this course. For that observation, made by Salomon, of vnthankfulnesse in this kind, bath been found belonging to all Countries and Ages : A little Citie, and few men in it, and a great King came against it, and compassed it about, and builded Forts against it: And Eccles 2.9.14. there was found a poore and wife man therein, and he delivered the Citie by his wildome: 515. but none remembred this poore man. Great Monarchs are vnwilling to pay great thankes, least thereby they should acknowledge themselves to have been undebted for great benefits: which the vnwifer fort of them thinke to fauour of fome im-

potencie in themselues. But in this respect they are oftentimes cousened and abufed : which proues that weakeneffe to be in them indeede, whereof they fo gladly shunne the opinion. Contrariwise, free Estates are bountifull in giving thankes; yet fo, as those thankes are not of long endurance. But concerning other profit which their Captaines have made, by enriching themselves with the spoile of the enemie, they are very inquisitive to search into it, and to strip the wel-descruers out of their gettings: year most injuriously to rob them of their owne, ypon a false suppolition that even they whose hands are most clean from such offences, have purloyned somwhat from the common Treasurie. Hereof I need not to produce examples: that of the two Scipioes being folately recited.

In my late Soueraignes time, although for the warres, which for her owne safetie face was conftrained to vndertake, her Majestie had no lesse cause to vse the fernice of Martiall men both by Sea and land, than any of her Predeceffors for many yeares had, yet, according to the destinie of that profession, I doe not remember. that any of hers, the Lord Admiral excepted, her eldest and most prosperous Commander, were either enriched, or otherwise honoured, for any service by them performed. And that her Majestie had many admised, valiant, and faithfull men, the prosperitie of her affaires did well witnesse, who in all her daies neuer received difhonour, by the cowardife or infidelitie of any Commander, by her felfe chofen

40 For as all her old Captaines by Land died poore men, as Malbey, Randol, Drewrie, Reade, Wilford, Layton, Pellam, Gilbert, Cunstable, Bourchier, Barkeley, Bingham, and others: so those of a later and more dangerous imploiment, whereof Worice and Vere were the most famous, and who have done as great honor to our Nation (for the meanes they had) as euer any did: those (I say) with many other braue Collonels, haue left behinde them (befides the reputation which they purchased with many travailes and wounds) nortitle nor estate to their posteritie. As for the L. Thomas Burrough, and Peregrine Berty L. willoughbie of Eresby, two very worthy and exceeding valiant Commanders, they brought with them into the world their Titles and Effates.

That her Majestie in the advancement of her Men of warre did sooner beleeve other men than her selfe, a disease vnto which many wife Princes, besides her selfe. have beene subject, I say that such a confidence, although it may seeme altogether to excuse her Noble Nature, yet can it not but in some fort accuse her of weakenesse. And exceeding strange it were, were not the cause manifest enough, that where the profectous Actions are so exceedingly prized, the Actors are so vaprosperous and so generally neglected. The cause, I say, which hath wrought one and the same effect in all times, & among all Nations, is this, that those which are nearest the person of Princes (which martial men sildome are) can with no good grace commend, or at least magnifica a Protession farre more noble than their own, seeing therein they should onely mind their Maisters of the wrong they did vato others, in gitting less honour and reward to men of sarre greater deserving, and of sarre greater vs. I han themselues.

But his Majelite bath alreadie payed the greatest part of that debt. For besides the relicuing by Pentions all the poorer fort, he bath honored more Martiall men 13 than all the Kings of England have done for this hundred yeares.

He hath given a Coronet to the Lord Thomas Haward for his chargeable and remarkeable fervice, as well in the yeare 1 585, as at Calirs, the limits, and in our owne Seas, having first commanded as a Captaine, twice Admirall of a Squadron, and twice Admirall in chiese. His Majestie hath changed the Baronies of Mention and Barley into Earledomes, and created Sidney Vicount, Knollys, Russel, Caren, Denners, Arvanded of Warder, Gerald, and Chiehesse, Farones, for their governments and services in the Newborkins, France, Ireland, and elsewhere.

δ. III.

PHILLE making provision for ware against the Romans, deales hardly with manic of his owne fubicets. His regolation with the Basturne. His crucitie. He fulfecteth his fonne Debug talva. Debug talva socujed by his brother Perseva, and flority after flaine, by his fathers appointment. Piller repented him of his formes deals; whome he findeth to have been encocent; and intending to reuenge it on Perseva, he dietih.

VINTUS MARTIUS the Roman Embassador, who travailed up and 30

downe, feeking what worke might be found about Greece, had receiucd infruction from the Senate, to vie the most or ms ungented with infruction from the Estate of Attachen. At his returne home, that he looking into the Estate of Attachen to the Associated nothing, hee told the Estaters, might not feemeto have discovered nothing, hee told the Fathers, That Philip had done what focuer they enjoyed him; yet fo, as it might appeare, that fuch his obedience would last no longer, than meere necessitie should enforce him thereunto. He added further, That all the doings and fayings of that King did wholly tend vnto rebellion, about which he was denifing. Now it was fo indeed, that Philip much repented him of his faithfull oblequiousnesse to the Romans, 40 and forefaw their intent, which was, to get his Kingdome into their owne hands, with fafetie of their honour, if they could finde convenient meanes; or otherwise (as to him feemed apparant) by what meanes focuer. He was in an ill case: as haning been alreadic vanquished by them; having lost exceedingly both in strength and reputation; having subjects that abhorred to heare of Warre with Rome; and having neither neighbour nor friend, that, if he were thereto vrged, would aduenture to take his part: yet he prouided as well as he could deuife against the necesfitte which hee daily feared. Such of his owne people as dwelt in the maritine Townes, and gaue him cause to suspect, that they would doe but bad service against the Romans, hee compelled to for sake their dwellings, and removed them all 50 into Emathia. The Cities and Countrey, whence these were transplanted, he filled with a multitude of Thracians, whose faith he thought a great deale more assured, against those enemies that were terrible to the Macedonians. Further, be deuised vpon alluring the Baffarne, a strong and hardie Nation, that dwelt beyond the river of Danubius, to abandon their feat, and come to him with all their multitude: who belides other great rewards, would helpe them to root out the Dardanians and take possession of their Countrey. These were like to doe him notable service against the Romans: being not onely sout fighting men; but such, as being planted in those quarters by him, would beare respect vnto him alone. The least benefite that could be hoped by their arrivall, must be the vtter extirpation of the Dardanians, a People alwayes troublesome to the Kingdome of Macedon, when soeuer they found aduantage. Neither was it judged any hard matter, to perswade those Bafrance, by hope of spoyle, and other incitements, vnto a more desperate Expedition 10 on, through Illyria, and the Countries vpon the Adriaticke Sca, into Italie it selfe. It was not knowne who should withfland them vpon the way: Rather it was thought, that the Scordsfei, and peraduenture fome others, through whose Countries they were to palle, would accompanie them against the Romans, were it onely in hope of fooyle. Now to facilitate the remoue of these Bastarna from their owne habitations, into the Land of the Dardanians, vpon the border of Micedon; a long and tedious journey vnto them, that carried with them their wives and children: Philip with gifts did purchase the good will of some Thracian Princes, Lords of the Countries through which they were to paffe. And thus hee fought meanes to firengthen himselfe, with helpe of the wilde Nations, which neither knew the Ro-20 mans, nor were knowne vnto them; fince he was not like to finde affiffance from anie ciuile Nation, about the whole compasse of the Mediterranean Seas. But these deuices were long ere they tooke effect : fo as the Bastarne came not before such time as he was dead; his death being the overthrow of that purpose. In the meane time he neglected not the trayning of his men to warre, and the exercise of them in fome small Expeditions, against those wilde people that bordered upon him, and ftood worst affected toward him. But these his counsailes and proceedings were miserably disturbed by the calamities that fell vpon him, both in his Kingdome, and in his owne house. The Families and whole Townships, which he had caused much against their wills to for sake 30 their auncient dwellings, and betake themselues to such new habitations, as he in his discretion thought meeter for them, were vehemently offended at the change. Yet their anger at first contained it selfe within wordes; he having done them no great wrong in that alteration, otherwise than by neglecting their affection to the places wherein they had long liued: which also he did vnwillingly, being himselfe ouer-ruled by necessatic, that seemed apparent. This cuill therefore would soone haue beene determined, had not his cruell and vindicatine nature made it worfe. He could not pardon words proceeding from just forrow: but imputed all to traiterous malice; and accordingly fought reuenge where it was needlesse. In his rage he caused many to die: among whome were some eminent men; and sew or none 40 of them deferuedly. This encreased the hatted of the people, and turned their former exclamations into bitter curses. Which grew the more generall; when the King in a barbarous and base furie, mistrusting all alike whome hee had injuried, thought himselfe vnlike to be safe, vntill he should have massacred all the children of those parents, whome tyrannically he had put to death. In the execution of this his vnmanly pleasure, some accidents, more tragicall than perhaps he could have defired, gave men cause to thinke (as they could not in reason thinke otherwise) that, not without vengeance powred on him from Heauen, he felt the like miserie in his owne children. It is hard to fay what the Romans intended, in the extraordinarie fauour which they shewed vnto Demetrius, the Kings younger sonne. It may to well be (though it may be also suspected) that they had no purpose to make and nourish diffention betweene the brethren, but onely to cherish the vertue and towardlinesse of Demetrius; like as we finde it in their Histories. But their notable fauour towards this young Prince, and his mutuall respect of them, bred extreame jealousie in the fathers head. If any custome of the Romans, the manner of their life, the fashion of their apparrell, or the vnsightly contriuing and building (as then it was) of the Towne of Rome, were jefted at in ordinarie discourse and table-talke. Demetrius was fure to be prefently on fire, defending and prayling them, even in fuch points as rather needed excuse. This, and his daily conversation with their Embassadours, as often as they came, gaue his father cause to thinke, that he was no fit partaker of any counfaile held against them. Wherefore he communicated all his deuices with his elder sonne Perseus: who fearing so much least his brother should step betweene him and the succession, converted wholly, vnto his destruction that grace which he had with his father. Perfeus was then thirtie yeares olde: of a stirring spirit, though much defective in valour. Demetrius was younger by five 10 yeares, more open and vinwarie in his actions, yet thought old and craftie vinough. to entertaine more dangerous practifes, than his free speeches discouered. The jealous head of the King having entertained fuch suspitions, that were much encreafed by the cunning practife of his elder fonne, a flight occasion made the fire breake out, that had long layne smothered. A Muster, and ceremonious lustration of the Armie, was wont to be made at certaine times with great folemnitie. The manner of it at the present was thus. They cleft in twaine a bitch; and threw the head and fore-part, with the entrailes, on the right hand, and the hinder part on the left hand of the way, which the Armie was to paffe. This done, the Armes of all the Kings of Macedon, from the verie first originall, were borne before the Armie. Then fol- 201 lowed the King betweene his two fonnes; after him came his owne band, and they of his guard; whome all the rest of the Macedonians followed. Having performed other ceremonies, the Armie was divided into two parts; which, under the Kings two fonnes, charged each other in manner of a true fight, vling poles, and the like, in stead of their pikes and accustomed weapons. But in this present skirmish there appeared some extraordinarie contention for the victorie: whether happening by chance, or whether the two Captaines did ouer-carneftly feeke each to get the vpper hand, as a betokening of their good successe in a greater triall. Some small hurt there was done, and wounds given, even with those stakes, untill Perseus his side at length recoyled. Perfeus himselfe was sorrie for this, as it had beene some bad pre- 30 fage: but his friends were glad, and thought, that hereof might be made good vie. They were of the craftier fort: who perceiuing which way the Kings fauor bent, and how all the courses of Demetrius led vnto his owne ruine, addressed their services to the more malicious and craftic head. And now they faid, that this victorie of Demetrius would affoord matter of complaint against him; as if the heat of his ambition had carried him beyond the rules of that solemne pastime. Each of the brethren was that day to feast his owne companions, and each of them had spyes in the others lodging, to observe what was faid and done. One of Perfess his Intelligencers behaued himselfe so indiscreetly, that he was taken and well beaten by three or foure of Demetrius his men, who turned him out of dores. After some store 40 of wine, Demetrius told his companions, that he would goe vifit his brother, and fee what cheare he kept. They agreed to his motion, excepting such of them as had ill handled his brothers man: yet he would leave none of his traine behind, but forced them also to beare him companie. They, fearing to be ill rewarded for their late diligence, armed themselues secretly to preuent all danger. Yet was there such good espiall kept, that this their comming armed was forthwith made knowne to Perseus: who thereupon tumultuously locked up his dores, as if he stood in feare to be affaulted in his house. Demetrius wondered to see himselfe excluded, and fared verie angerly with his brother. But Perfeus, bidding him be gone as an enemic. and one whose murderous purpose was detected, sent him away with entertaine- 50 ment, no better than defiance. The next day the matter was brought before the King. The elder brother accused the yonger vnto the father of them both. Much there was alledged, and in effect the fame that hath beene here recited, faue that by misconstruction all was made worse. But the maine point of the accusation, and which did aggrauate all the rest, was, That Demetrius had undertaken this murder, and would perhaps also dare to vindertake a greater, vpon confidence of the Romans; by whom he knew that he should be defended and borne out. For Perfeus made shew, as if the Romans did hate him; because he bore a due respect vnto his father, and was forrie to fee him spoiled, and daily robbed of somewhat by them. And for this cause he said it was, that they did animate his brother against him : as also that they sought how to winne vnto Demetrius the love of the Macedonians. For proofe hereof he cited a letter, lent of late from T. Quintins to the King himfelfe: whereof the contents were, That he had done wifely in fending Demetrius 10 to Rome; and that he should yet further doe well to fend him thither againe, accompanied with a greater and more honorable traine of Macedonian Lords. Hence he enforced, That this counsell was given by Titus, of purpose to shake the allegeance of those, that should wayt vpon his brother to Rome; and make them, forgetting their dueties to their old King, become feruants to this yong Traytor Demetrius. Hereto Demetrius made answere, by rehearing all passages of the day and night foregoing, in fuch manner as hee remembred them, and had conceived of them: bitterly reprehending Perfess, that converted matters of Pastime, and what was done or spoken in wine, to such an accusation, whereby he sought his innocent brothers death. As for the love which the Romans did beare him; Hee faid that it 20 grew, if not from his owne vertue, at least wife from their opinion thereof: so as by any impious practife, He were more like to lofe it wholly, than to encrease it. In this wretched pleading there wanted not fuch passions, as are incident to fathers, children, and brethren; besides those that are common to all Plaintiffes and Defendants, before ordinarie Iudges. The King pronounced like a father, though a icalous father, That he would conclude nothing upon the excelle of error, whatsoeuer it were, of one day and night, nor vpon one houres audience of the matter, but vpon better observation of their lives, manners, and whole carriage of themfelues both in word and deed. And herein he may feeme to have dealt both justly and compassionately. But from this time forward, he gave himselfe over wholly 30 to Perfeus: vling to little conference with his yonger fonne, that when he had matters of weight in hand, such especially as concerned the Romans. He liked neither to haue him present, nor neare vnto him. Aboue all, he had especiall care, to learne out what had passed betweene Demetrius and T. Quintius, or any other of the Roman great ones. And to this purpose he sent Embassadors to Rome, Philocles and Apelles; men whom hee thought no way interested in the quarrells betweene the brethren; though indeed they altogether depended on the elder, whom they faw the more in grace. These brought home with them a letter, said to be written by Titus (whose seale they had counterfeited) vnto the King. The contents wherof were, A deprecation for the yong Prince; with an intimation, as by way of 49 granting it, That his youthfull and ambitious defires had caused him to enter into practifes uniustifiable, against his elder brother; which yet should never take effect. for that Titus himselfe would not be author, or abettor, of any impious deuice. This manner of excuse did forcibly perswade the King, to thinke his some a dangerous traytor. To strengthen him in this opinion, one Didas, to whom he gaue Demetrisk in custodie, made shew as if he had pitied the estate of the vnhappie Prince; and so wrung out of him his fecret intentions, which he shortly discouered vnto Philip. It was the purpose of Demetrius to flie secretly to Rome; where he might hope not onely to liue in safetie, from his father and brother, but in greater likelihood, than he could finde at home, of bettering such claime as he had in repersion vnto the 50 Crowne of Macedon. What focuer his hopes and meanings were, al came to nought through the fallhood of Didas; who playing on both hands, offered vnto the Prince his helpe for making the escape, and in the meane while revealed the whole matter to the King. So Philip resolued to put his sonne to death, without further expence of time. It was thought behouefull to make him away prinily, for feare left P ppppp

the Romans should take the matter to heart, and held it as proofe sufficient, at least. of the Kinge despight against them, if not of his meaning to renew the warre. Di das therefore was commanded to rid the vnhappie Prince out of his life. This accurfed Minister of his Kings vnaduifed sentence, first gaue poyfon to Demetrius: which wrought neither so hastily, nor so fecretly, as was defired. Hereupon hee fent a couple of Ruffians, to finish the tragedie: who vilanously accomplished their worke by fmothering that Prince, in whose life consisted the greatest hope of Ma.

In all the race of Antigonus there had not been found a King, that had thus cruelly dealt with any Prince of his owne blond. The houses of Lysimachus and io Callander fell cyther with themselues, or even vpon their heeles; by intestine discord and iealousies, grounded on defire of soueraigne rule, or feare of loosing it. By the like vnnaturall hatred, had almost beene cut off the lines of Ptelemie and of Seleners: which though narrowly they escaped the danger, yet were their kingdomes thereby grieuously distempered. Contrariwise, it was worthic of extraordinarie note, how that voilart family of the Kings of Pergamus had raised it selle to maruclous greatnesse, in verie short space, from the condition of meere slauerie; whereof a principall cause was, the brotherly loue maintained by them, with singular commendation of their pictic. Neyther was Philip ignorant of these examples; but is faid to haue propounded the last of them, to his owne children, as a patterne 20 for them to imitate. Certainly he had reason so to doe : not more in regard of the benefit which his enemies reaped by their concord, than in remembrance of the tender fosterage, wherewith King Intigonus his Tutor had faithfully cherished him in his minoritie. But Hee was himselfe of an unmercifull nature; and therefore vnmeet to bee a good perswader vnto kindly affection. The murders by him done upon manie of his friends, together with the barbarous outrages, which for the fatiating of his bloud-thirftie appetite hee delightfully had committed upon manie innocents, both ftrangers, & fubiects of his own; did now procure vengcance downe from Heauen, that rewarded Him with a draught of his owne Poyfon. After the death of his sonne, He too late began to examine the crimes that had bin 30 objected; and to weigh them in a more equal ballance. Then found he nothing that could give him fatisfaction, or by good probabilitie induce him to thinke, that malice had not been contriuer of the whole processe. His only remaining Son Perfew could fo ill diffemble the pleafure which her tooke, in being freed from all danger of competition; as there might eafily be perceived in him a notable change, proceeding from some other cause, than the remoue of those dangers, which he had lately pretended. The Romans were now no leffe to be feared than at other times, when he, as having accomplished the most of his delires, left off his viuall trouble of mind, and carefulnesse of making provision against them. He was more diligently courted, than in former times; by those that well understood the difference, be- 40 tweene a riling and a fetting Sunne. As for old Philip, hee was left in a manner defolate: some expecting his death; and some scarce enduring the tediousnesse of such expectation. This bred in the King a deep melancholy; and filled his head with suspitious imaginations; the like whereof hee had neuer beene flow to apprehend. He was much vexed:and so much the more, for that he knew, neyther well to whom, nor perfectly whereof to complaine. One honourable man, a Cofen of his, named Antigonus, continued fo true to Philip, that hee grew thereby hatefull to Perfeus : and thus becomming fubicst vnto the same icalous impressions which troubled the King, became also partaker of his fecrets. This counsailour, when hee found that the anger conceived against Perfeus would not vent it selfe, and give 50 ease to the King, vntill the truth were knowne Whether Demetrius were guiltie or no of the treason objected; as also that Philoeles and Apelles, (the Embassadours which had brought from Rome that Epiffle of Flaminius, that ferued as the greatest cuidence against Demetrius) were suspected of forgerie in the busines:made diligent inquirie after the truth. In thus doing, hee found one xychus, a man most likely to have understood what false dealing was vsed by those Embassadors. Him hee apprehended, brought to the Court, and prefented vnto the King: faying that this fellow knewall, and must therefore bee made to ytter what hee knew. Ayehus for feare of torture, vttered as much as was before suspected : confelling against himfelfe, that hee had bin employed by the Embaffadors in that wicked prece of businesse. No maruell, if the Fathers passions were extreame, when hee vnderflood, that by the vinaturall practife of one fonne, he had fo wretchedly cast away another, farre more vertuous, and innocent. Hee raged exceedingly, against himto felfe, and withall against the Authors of the mischiefe. Vpon the first newes of this discoucrie, Apelles fled away, and got into Italie. Philodes was taken; and either for almuch as he could not denie it when xychus confronted him, yeelded himfelle guiltie, or elfe was put to torture. Perfeus was now growne fronger, than that he should need to flie the Countrie; yet not so stout as to adventure himselfe into his fathers presence. He kept on the borders of the kingdome, towards Thrace, whilest his father wintered at Demetrias, Philip therefore, not hoping to get into his power this his vngracious fonne; tooke a refolution to aliene the Kingdome from him, & conferre it vpon Antigonus. But his weake bodie, and excelling greife of minde, fo disabled him in the trauell hereto belonging; that ere hee could bring his purpose

20 to effect, he was conftrained to yeild to nature. He had raigned about two & fortie yeares: alwayes full of trouble; as vexed by others, and vexing himfelfe, with continuall wars; of which that with the Romans was most vnhappic, and few or none of the rest found the conclusion, which a wife Prince would have defired, of bringing forth together, both honour and profit. But for all the cuill that befell him, he might thanke his owne peruerse condition: since his vncle King Antigonus, had left vnto him an estate, so great, and so well setled, as made it easie for him, to accoplish any moderate defires, if he had not abhorred all good counsaile. Wherefore he was justly punished: by feeling the difference betweene the imaginarie happineffe of a Tyrant, which hee affected, and the life of a King, wherof he little cared 30 to performe the dutie. His death, even whileft yet it was only drawing neare, was forelignified vnto Perfeus, by Calligenes the Philitian; who also concealed it awhile from those that were about the Court. So Perseus came thither on the suddaine, and tooke poffession of the kingdome: which in fine he no lesse improvidently lott,

d. IIII.

How the Bastarna fell upon Dardania. The behaviour of PERSEVS in the beginning of his Reigne. Some warres of the Romans : and how they suffered MASANISS A cruelly to oppresse the Carthaginians. They quarrell with PERSEVS. They allow not their Confederates to make warre without their leave obtained. The Treason of CAL-LICRATES; whereby all Greece became more obnoxious to Rome, than in former times. Further quarrels to PERSEVS. He feekes friendship of the Acheans, and is withflood by CALLICRATES. The Romans discouer their intent of warring upon

Mmediately vpon the death of Philip, came the Ballarna into Thrace: where order had bin taken, long before, both for their free paffage, and for the indemnitie of the Countrie. This compact was friendly observed, as long as none other was knowne than that Philip didline, to recompence all that should be done, or sustained, for his feruice. But when it was heard, that a new King raigned in Macedon; & not heard withall, that he tooke any care what became of the enterprize; then was all dalla Pppppp 2 and confounded. The Thracians would no longer afford fo good markets vnto these strangers, as formerly they had done. On the other side, the Baslarna would not becontented with reason, but became their owne carpiers, Thus each part hauing lost the rich hopes reposed in Philip: grew carefull of thriuing in the presents with little regard of right or wrong. Within a while they sell to blowes; and the Baslarnahad the vpper hand, so as they chased the Thracians out of the plaine Countries. But the victors made little vseof their good fortune. For whether by reason of some ouerthrow, received by them in atlaulting a place of strength; or whether because of extreame bad weather, which is said to have affilied them as it were miraculously: all of them returned home, saue thirtie thousand, which pierced on 10 to Dardania. How these thirtie thousand speed in their voyage, I doe not find. It seemes that by the carelesse with some of some victories, they drew loss they one themselves and simally tooke that occasion, to follow their companions backe into their own Countrie.

As for Perfeus he thought it not expedient, in the noueltie of his Reigne, to embroyle himselfe in a warre so dangerous, as that with the Romans was likely to proue. Wherefore he wholly gaue his mind to the fetling of his Estate: which well done, he might afterwards accommodate himselfe, as the condition of his affaires should require, eyther for war or peace. To preuent all danger of rebellion: he quickly tooke:away the life of Antigonus. To winne loue of his people; hee fate 20 personally to heare their causes in judgment (though herein hee was so over-diligent and curious, that one might have perceived this his vertue of justice to be no better than fained) as also he gratified them with many delightfull spectacles, magnificently by him fet forth. Aboue all he had care to avoide all necessitie of warre with Rome: and therefore made it his first worke, to send Embassadours thither, to renew the league; which hee obtained, and was by the Senate saluted King, and friend vnto the State. Neyther was he negligent in feeking to purchase good will of the Greeks, and other his neighbors: but was rather herein so exceffinely bountiful, that it may feeme a wonder, how in few yeares, to his vtter ruine, hee became so griping and tenacious. His feare was indeed the mastring passion, which ouer-ru- 30 led him, and changed him into so manie shapes, as made it hard to discern which of his other qualities were naturally his owne. For proofe of this, there is requilite no more, than the relation of his actions patt and following.

The Romans continued, as they had long, busic in wars against the Sparines and Ligarians, speeps leef from vanquished, and as often breaking for thinto new rebellion. They allo conquered //fira, subdued the rebelling Sarainians; and had some quarrels, though to little effect, with the illyrians and others. Ouer the Carliagnians they bore (as euer finer the visitorie) a heauic hand: and suffered Massaille to take from them what he listed. The Carliagnians, like obdient vassals to Rome, were assail, though in defence of their owne, to take Armes: from which they were 40 bound by an article of peace, except it were with leave of the Romans. Massailla therefore had great advantage ouer themsand was not ignorant how to vie it. Hee could get possession by force, of what soever he desired, cre their complaining Embassaours could be eat Rome; and then were the Romans not hardly entreated, to

So had Hee once dealt before, in taking from them the Countrie of Emporial and fo did hee vie them againe and againe; with pretence of title, where he had nois; otherwise, without it. Gala the Father of Majanija had wonne fome land from the Carthaginians; which afterward Syphax wanne from Gala, and within a while, refored to the right owners, for lone of his Wife 50 Sophoniba, and of Manula his Father-in-law. This did Majanija take from them by force: and by the Romans, to whose judgment the case was referred, was permitted quiedly to hold it. The Carthaginians had now good experience, how beneficiall it was for their Eslate, to vicall manner of submissione of some.

The had fearcely digefted his iniurie, when Mafaniffs came vpon them againe, and tooke from them aboue feuentie townes and Gallet's, without any colour of right. Hereof by their Embaffadors they made lamentable complaint vinto the Roman Senate. They showed how grieuously they were oppressed by reason of two articles in their League: That they should not make warre, out of their owne lands; nor with any Confederates of the Romans. Now although it were 60, that they might lawfully withstand the violence of Masaniffs, inuading their Countrie, how-source he was pleased to call it his; yet since hee was confederate with the Romans, they durft not presume to beare defensue arms against him, but suffered them

10 felies to be eaten up, for feare of incurring the Romans indignation. Wherfore they entreated, that cyther they might have fairer indice, or be liftered to defend their owne by firong hand, or at leaft, if right must wholly give place to favour, That the Romans yet would bee pleafed to determine, how farre forth \(\sigma_{in}\) in Jahan [Ja hould bee allowed, to proceed in these outrages. If none of these petitions could be obtained, then delired they, that the Romans would let them understand, wherein they had offended since the timethat Seipio gave them peace; and vouch fast to inflict on them such punishment, as they themselves in honour should think e meeter for that better and more to their comfort it were, to suffer at once what should bee appointed by such ludges; than continually to live in searc, and none otherwise draw

20 breath than at the mercie of this Namidian Hangman. And herewithall the Embalfadours threw themfoluse profitate on the ground weeping in hope to moue compafficion. Here may we behold, the fruites of their enuie to that valiant boule of the Burchines, of their irrefolution, in profecuting a war fo important, as Hannibal made for them in Italies and of their halfepennie worthing, in matter of expense when they had aduentured their whole clate, in the purchase of a great Empire. Now are they feruants, cuen to the feruants of those men, whose fathers they have often chased, flaine, taken, and fold as bondflaues in the streets of Carthage, and in all Cities of Assick and Greece. Now have they enough of that Roman peace, which Hanns of other and so carnelly delired. Only they want peace with Majanissis.

30 their mercinarie, and now their maßer; or rather their tormentor; out of whose cruell hands, they beseech their maßers to take the office of correcting them. In such case are they, and adore the Romans, whom they see flourishing in such prospectite as might haue bin their own. But the Romans had farre better entreated Varro, who lost the battella Cannes; then stambad that wanne it was vsed by the Carthoginism, they had freely bestowed, euerie man of them, all his private riches, vpon the Common-wealth; and employed their labours for the publike, without crauing recompense; as also they had not thought it much, though being in extreme want, to set out an armie into Spaine, a twhat time the enemie lay vnder their owne wals. These were no Carthoginian vertues; and therefore the Carthogi-

40 nians, hauing fought againft their betters, mult patiently endure the miferies belonging to the vanquilided. Their pitifull behauiour bred peraduenture fome commiferation, yet their teares may feeme to have been entirufied, as proceeding no leffle from enuie to the Romans, than from any feeling of their owne calamitic. They thought themselves able to fight with Massail's: which estimation of their forces was able to make them, after a litle while, enter into coparitions with Rome. Wherfore they obtained no such leave as they sought, of defending their owne right by armos: but cotrariwise, when without leave obtained they prefumed so far, the defruction of Carthage was thought an easie punishment of that offence. At the prefent, they received agentle answer; though they had otherwise little amends.

50 Gulussathe sonne of Masaissathen in Rome; and had not as yet craued audience. Hee was therefore called before the Senate; where hee was demanded the reason of his comming; and had related vnto him the complaint made the Carthaginians against his Father. Hee answered, That his Father not being throughly aware of anie Embassadours thinker sent from Carthage.

had therefore not given him instructions, how to deale in that busines. Only it was knowne, that the Carthaginians had held counfell diverse nights, in the Temple of Afaulapius: whereupon he himfelfe was dispatched away to Rome, there to entrear the Senate, that these common enemies of the Romans and of his Father might not bee ouermuch trufted; especially against his Father, whom they hated most malitiously, for his constant faith to the People of Rome. This answere gaue little fatisfaction. Wherefore the Senate replied, that for Mafanissa his fake, they had done, and would doe, what focuer was reasonable; but that it stood not with their inflice, to allow of this his violence, in taking from the Carthaginians those lands, which by the couenants of the league, were granted vnto them freely to enion. With this milde rebuke they difmissed Galussa, bestowing on him friendly prefents (as also they did on the Carthaginians) and willing him to tell his father. that he should doe well to send Embassadors, more fully instructed in this matter. This happened when the Macedonian marre was even ready to begin; at which time the Romans were not willing, too much to offend, either the Carthaginians, (for feare of viging them vnfeafonably to rebellion) or Mafaniffa, at whose hands they expected no little helpe. So were they aided both by the Carthaginians, and Malaniffa: by the Carthaginians, partly for feare, partly for hope of better viage in the future, by Masanisa, in way of thankfulnesse; though if it had happened (which was vnlikely) that they should bee vanquished; hee made none other account, than 20 that all Africke round about him and Carthage therewithall should bee his

In the midft of all these cares, the Romans had not been evnmindfull of Perseus. They visited him daily with Embassadours; that is, with honourable spies to obferue his behauiour. These Hee entertained kindly at first, vntill (which fell out ere long) hee perceived whereto their diligence tended. First they quarrelled with him about the trobles in Dardania: neyther would they take any fatisfaction. untill the Bastarne were thence gone; though hee protested, that hee had not sent for them. Afterward they pried narrowly into his doings; and were no leffe ill contented with good offices, by him done to fundrie of his neighbours, than with 20 those wrongs, which they said (that he did vnto other some. Where he did harme to anie; they called it, making warre vpon their friends: Where he did good; they called fuch his bountie, feeking friends to take his part against them. The Dolopians. his subjects, vpon what ocasion it is vncertaine) rebelled, and with exquisite torments flew Euphranor, whom he had appointed their gouernour. It feemes that Euphranor had played the Tyrant among them. For they were a people without firength to relift the Macedonian: and therefore vnlikely to have prefumed fo farre, vnleffe eyther they had bin extreamly provoked or elfe were fecretly animated by the Romans. Whatfocuer it was that bred this courage in them: Perfess did foone allay it, and reclaime them by strong hand. But the Romans tooke verie angrily, 40 this prefumption of the King: euen as if he had inuaded some Countrie of their Italian confederates, and not corrected his owne Rebels at home. Faine they would have had him to draw in the same yoake with the Carthaginians; whereto had he humbled once his necke, they could themselves have done the part of Mafanissa, though Eumenes, or some other fit for that purpose, had beene wanting. And to this effect, they told him, That conditions of the league betweene them were such, as made it vnlawfull, both to his father heretofore, and now to him, to take armes without their license first obtained.

To the same passe they would also faine have reduced the Greekes, and generally all their adherents even fuch as had entred into league with them vpon equall 50 tearmes: whom viually they rewarded with a frowne, when soeuer they prefumed to right themselues by force of Armes, without seeking first the Oracle at Rome. Hercofthe Acheans had good experience: whose condence in their proper strength made them otherwhiles bold to be their owne carners; and whose hope of extraor-dinarie fauour at Rome caused them the more willingly to referre their causes to arbitrement. For when they went about to have challifed the Meffenians by warre; T. Quintius rebuked them, as too arrogant, in taking fuch a worke in hand, without hisauthoritie: yet by his authoritie he ended the matter, wholly to their goodliking. Semblaby at other times were they reprehended even with Lordly threates. when they tooke voon them to carrie any businesse of importance, by their owne power, without standing vnto the good grace of the Romans. Who neverthelesse, vpon fubmiffion, were apt enough to doe them right. Thus were they tamed by little and little, and taught to forget their absolute libertie, as by which they were to not like to thriue; especially in vsurping the practise of armes, which belonged only to the Imperiall Citie. In learning this hard leffon, they were fuch vntoward Polyb. legat, 51. schollars, that they needed, and not long after felt, verie sharp correction. Yet was $53. there no small part of blame to be imputed vnto their Masters. For the Roman Senate, being delirous to humble the Acheans; refused not only to give them such aide as they requested, and as they challenged by the tenour of the League betweene them; but further, with a careleffe infolencie, rejected this honest and reafonable petition, That the Enemie might not be supplied from Italie, with victuals or armes. Herewith not content, The Fathers, as wearied with dealing in the affaires of Greece, pronounced openly, That if the Argines, Lacademonians or Corin-20 thians, would reuolt from the Achaans; they themselves would thinke it a businesse no way concerning them. This was presently after the death of Philopamen: at what time it was beleeved, that the Common wealth of Achaia was like to fall into much distresse; were it not vpheld by countenance of the Romans. All this notwithstanding; when Lycortas Prætor of the Acheans had vtterly subdued the Mesfenians farre sooner than was expected; and when as not only no Towne rebelled had streightly forbidden all manner of succour to bee carried to Messene. Thus 30 thinking, by a fained granitie, to have ferued their owne turnes: they manifested their condition; both to fet on the weaker, against the stronger and more suspeeted; and also to assume vnto themselves a Soueraigne power, in directing all matters of warre, which diffemblingly they would have feemed to neglect. In like mannerdealt they with all their confederates:not permitting anie of them to make warre, whether offensiue or defensiue; though it were against meere strangers; without interpoling the authoritic of the Senate and People of Rome: vnleffe peraduenture sometimes they winked at such violence, as did helpe towardes the accomplishment of their owne secret malice. Now these Roman arts how socuer manie (for gainfull or timerous respects) would seeme to understand them; yet were from the Acheans, but manie entred into their corporation : then did the Romans, with an ilfauored grace, tell the same Embassadours, to whose petition they had made fuch bad answere (and who as yet were not gone out of the Citic) That they

40 generally displeasing vnto all men endued with free spirits. Only the Athenians, once the most turbulent Citic in Greece, having neyther subjects of their own that might rebell, now power wherewith to bring anie into Subjection; for want of more noble argument wherein to practife their cloquence that was become the whole remainder of their ancient comendations, were much delighted in flattering the most mightie. So they kept themseldes in grace with the Romans, remained free from all trouble, vntill the warre of Mithridates : being men unfit for action, and thereby innocent; yet bearing a part in many great actions, as Gratulators of the Roman victories, and Pardon-crauers for the vanquished. Such were the Athenians become. As for those other Common-weales and Kingdomes, that with ouer

50 nice diligence strong to preserve their liberties and lands, from consuming by piecemeale: they were to be denoured whole, and swallowed up at once. Especially the Macedonian, as the most ynpliant, and wherein manie of the Greekes beganne to have affiance, was necessarily to bee made an example, how much better it were better to bow than to breake.

Neyther

Neyther Perfeus, northe Romans were ignorant, how the Greekes atthistime stood affected. Perfess by reason of his neare neighbourhood, and of the daily commerce betweene them and his subjects, could not want good information, of all that might concerne him, in their affaires. He well knew, that all of them now apprehended the danger which Philopeman had long fince foretold of the miferable. fubication, Whereinto Greece was likely to be reduced, by the Roman patronage. Indeed they not only perceived the approaching danger: but as being tenderly sensible of their libertie, selt themselves grieved with the present subjection, wherto alreadie they were become obnoxious: Wherefore though none of them had the courage, in matters of the publike to fall out with the Romans: yet all of them had in the care, to choose among themselves none other Magistrates, than such as affected the good of their Countrie, and would for no ambition, or other servile respect, bee flatterers of the greatnesse which kept all in feare. Thus it seemed likely, that all domesticall conspiracies would soone beeat an end; when honestie and love of the Commonweale, became the fairest way to preferment. Of this carefull prouifionfor the lafetic of Greece, the Romans were not throughly aduertifed: cyther because things were diligenly concealed from their Embassadours, whom all men kne w to be little better than Spies, or because little account was made of that intelligence, which was brought in by fuch Traytors (of whom eueric Citie in Greece had to manie) as were men vnregarded among their owne people, and therefore and more like to speake malitiously than truly; or perhaps because the Embassadours themselues, being all Senators, and capable of the greatest Office or charge, had no will to find out other matter of trouble, than was fitting to their ownedefires of employment. But it is hard to conceale that which manie know, from those that are feared or flattered by manie. The Acheans being to fend Embaffadours to Rome, that should both excuse them, as touching some point wherein they refused to obey the Senate; and informe the Senate better in the same businesse; chose one Callierates, among others, to goe in that Embassage. By their making choise of fuch a man; one may perceive the advantage, which mischieuous wretches, who commonly are forward in pursuing their vile defires, have against the plaine fort of 20 honest men , that least earnestly thrust themselves into the trouble some bufinesse of the weale publike. For this Callierates was in such wise transported with ambition; that hee chose much rather to betray his Countrie, than to let any other bee of more authoritie than himselfe therein. Wherefore instead of well discharging his credence, and alleadging what was meetest in instification of his people: hee vttered a quite contrarie tale; and strongly encouraged the Romans, to oppresse both the Acheans, and all the rest of Greece, with a farre more heavie hand. He told the Senate, that it was high time for them, to looke vnto the fetling of their authoritie, among his froward Countrimen; if they ment not wholy to foregoe it. For now there was taken vpa custome, to stand vpon points of con- 40 federacie, and lawes: as if these were principally to bee had in regard; any iniunction from Rome notwithanding. Hence grew it that the Achaens both now, and at other times, did what best pleased themselves, and answered the Romans with excuses: as if it were enough to say, That by some condition of League, or by force of some Law, they were discharged, or hindred, from obeying the decrees of the Senate. This would not be so, if He, and some other of his opinion, might have their wils: who ceased not to affirme, That no Columesor Monuments erected, nor no folemne oath of the whole Nation, to ratific the observance of Confederacie or statute, ought to be of force, when the Romans willed the contrasie, But it was even the fault of the Romans themselves, That the multitude refused to give 50 eare, vnto such perswasions. For howsoeuer in popular Estates, the sound of libertie vsed to bee more plausible, than any discourse tending against it: yet if they which undertooke the maintenance of an argument, seeming never so bad, were fure by their fo doing, to procure their owne good; the number of them would in-increase apace, and they became the prevalent faction. It was therefore strange, how the Fathers could so neglect the advacement of those, that sought wholly to enlarge the amplitude of the Roman maiefty. More wifely, though with feditious & rebellious purpole, did the Greeks: who many times, yea & ordinarily, conferred great honors upon men otherwise of little account or defert; only for having uttered some braue words against the Romans. The Fathers, hearing these & the like reasons, wherwith he exhorted the to hadle roughly those that were obstinate. & by cherishing their friends, to make their partie throng; refolued to follow this good counfaile, ih cuery point; yea to depresse al those that held with the right, & to set up their own

10 followers, were it by right or by wrong. And to this end, they not only dealt theceforth more peremptorily with the Acheans, than had been their manner in former times; but wrot at the prefent vnto alcities of Greece; requiring them to fee that their mandate (which was concerning the restitution of those that were banished out of Lacedemon) should be fulfilled. Particularly in behalfe of Callicrates; they advised all men, to be fuch, and so affected, as he was, in their fenerall comon-weales. With this dispatch, Callierates returned home a joyfull man; having brought his Countrie into the way of ruine, but himfelfe into the way of preferment. Nevertheleffe hee forbore to vant himfelfe, of his eloquence yfed in the Senate. Only he foreported his Embaffage, that all men became fearefull of the danger, wherwith he threatned 20 those that should presume to oppose the Romans. By such arts hee obtained to bee made Pretor of the Acheans: in which Magistracy, as in al his courses following hee omitted nothing, that might ferue to manifest his readie obsequiousnes vnto those whom he had made his Patrons.

Now as the Romans by threatning termes wan manie flatterers, and loft as many true friends: fo Perfeus on the other fide, thinking by liberall gifts, and hopefull promifes, to affure vnto himfelfe those that ill could brooke his enemies; got indeed a multitude of partakers, though little honester than his enemies had. Thus were all the Cities of Greece distracted with factions; some holding with the Romans; some with the Macedonian; and some few, respecting only the good of the Estates wher-

- 30 in they lived. Hereat the Lords of the Senate were highly offended; and thought it an indignitic not sufferable, That a King, no better than their vasfall, should dare to become head of a faction against them. This therefore must be reckoned in the number of his trespasses; wherof if not any one alone, yet all of them together, shall affoord them iust occasion to make war vpon him. Perfess having finished his businesse among the Dolopians, made a journie to Apollo his temple at Delphi. He tooke his armie along with him, yet went, and returned, in such peaceable and friendly wife, that no place was the worfe for his journie, but the good affectio towards him generally increased thereby. With those that were in his way, hee dealt himselfe; to fuch as lay further off, he fent Embaffadors or letters : praying them, That the
- 40 memorie of all wrongs whatfoener, done by his father, might bee buried with his father; fince his own mening was to hold friend thip fincerely with al his neighbors. The Romans perhaps could have beene pleased better, if he had behaved himselse after a contrarie fashion, and done some acts of hostilitie in his passage. Yet as if he ought not to have taken such a journie, without their licence; this also was made a valuable matter, and cast into the heap of his faults. He laboured greatly to recouer the loue of the Acheans: which his father had fo loft, that by a folemne decree, they forbad any Macedonian to enter their territories. It was jealousie perhaps, no lesse than hatred, which caused them, at the first, to make such a decree. For howsoeuer Philip had by manie vile acts, especially by the death of the two Arati, given them
- 50 cause to abhor him: yet in the publike administration of their estate, he had, for the more part, bin to them so beneficiall, that not without much adoe and at length, without any generall confent, they refolued to for fake him. Wherefore it was needful, even for preservation of concord among them, to vse all circumspection; that he might not, by his agents, negotiate, and hold intelligence with any, in a Countrie towards him fo doubtfully affected: especially when by hearkening to his messages, they might make themselves suspected by their new friends. But the continuance of this accree, beyond the time of war, and when all danger of innovation was pall; was vnciuill, if not inhumane, as nourithing deadly hatred, without leaving meanes of reconciliation. And hereof the Achains reaped no good fruit. For although they were not, in like fort, forbidden the Kingdome of Macedon: yet vnderstanding what would be due to them, if they should adventure thither, none of them durft set foot therein. Hence it came to paffe, that their bondmen, knowing a fafe harbour, out of which their mafters could not fetch them, ranne daily away, in great numbers: ex-few tooke hold vpon this occasion: as fitly ferning to pacific those, whose enmitte

faine he would have changed into loue. He therfore apprehended al these sugitives, to fend them home againe; and wrote vnto the Acheans, That as for good will vnto them, he had taken paines to reftore back their feruants; fo should they do very wel to take order for keeping them, that hereafter they might not runne away againe. His meaning was readily understood, and his letters kindly accepted by the greater part; being openly rehearfed by the Pretor, before the Councell, But Callierates took the matter very angrily; and bad them be admited what they did; for that this was none other, than a plaine device, to make them depart from the friendship of the

before hand acquainted with the war, that was comming upon Perfew, from Rome.

He told them, how Philip had made preparations for the same wars how Demetrius bad bin made away because of his good affection to the Romans; and how Perseus had, fince his being King, done manie things, tending to the breach of peace. Briefly

Here hearfed all those matters, which were afterwards alleaged by the Romans; the inualion of the Baftarne, upon the Dardanians; the Kings journie against the Dolopi-ans, his voyage to Delphi, and finally his peaceable behaviour, which was (he faid) a dangerous temptration of men to his partie. Wherefore he admifed them, to expect

Callierates was too earnest, in so light a matter; and that, being neyther one of the Kings cabbinet, nor of the Roman Senate, he made himselfe too well acquainted with all that had passed, or was like to follow. For it was well knowne, that Perfeus had renewed his league with the Romans; that hee was by them faluted King, most reasonable and conucnient. But when Perseus, herewith not contented, would

nie good pretence, to put on a countenance of anger, and denie to give audience:

which was proofe fufficient (to one that could understand) of the condition wherin

they lived. For hearkning to this advice of Callierates, they were foone after highly commended by a Roman Embassador: whereby it became apparent, that the Ro-

How EVMENES King of Pergamus was buffed, with PHARNACES, the Rhodoians and others. His hatred to the Macedonian: whom hee acculeth to the Roman Senate. The Senate honours him greatly , and contemnes his enemies the Rhodians : with the causes thereof. The unusuall soutnesse of the Accedonian Embassadours. PERSEVS bis attempt upon EVMENES. The brotherly loughetweene EVME-NES and ATTALVS. PERSEVS his device to poyfon fome of the Roman Senatours: whereupon they decree warre against him, and fend him defiance. Other thinges, concerning the inflice of this warre.

V MR MES King of Pergamus had beene troubled, about these times, by the Kings Pharmaces and Authridates his neighbours. Hee had taken the right course; in making first his complaint to the Romans: by whom he was animated with cosortable words. & promise, man: by whom ne was animated with corortable words, or product.

But in conclusion, by the helpe of the Kings Prustas and Ariarathes, hee ended the warre himfelfe; and brought his Enemies to feeke and accept peace, on fuch condi-20 tions as pleased him to give them. After this being at good leisure; hee beganne to confider, how the affaires of Macedon flood under Perfeus. His hatred to Perfeus was verie great: and therefore hee was glad to understand, that the hatred of the Romans, to the same his Enemie, was as great, and withall notorious. Now belides his ancient and hæreditarie quarrell with the Macedonian; it vexed him exceedingly, That his owne honours (whereof the Greekes, prodigall in that kind, had heaped immoderate flore on his father and him) began to wex eneric where stale: whilest Perfeus, either by his currying fauour, or by the enuic borne to the Romans, had gotten their best liking and wishes. For despight of this indignitie, Hee stirred up the Lycians against the Rhodians his old friends: and in helping these rebels 30 was so violent, that he proceeded, in a manner, to open warre. But small pleasure found hee, in these poore and indirect courses of revenge. The Lycians could not bee faued by his patronage, from feuere and cruell chastifement, given to them by the Rhodians. This rendred him contemptible: as likewife, his acts of hostilitie, litle different from robberies, made him hatefull to those which loued him before. As for his honours in the Cities of Greece; they not only continued falling into Pobly Legal, 74: neglect; but were abrogated by a decree of the Acheans, as too vnmeasured, misbefeeming them to give, and affected by him beyond the proportion of his deferuings. All this (which hee needed not to have regarded, had hee not beene too Linke lib. 42-vainly ambitious) befell him, especially for his being ouer-serviceable to the Ro-40 mans, and for his malice to that noble Kingdome, which if it fell the libertie of Greece was not like to stand. Now for the redresse hereof; hee thought it vaine to striue any longer with bountie, against such an aduersarie, as by hopefull promises alone, without any great performance, had ouer-topped him in the general fauour. And therefore hee resolued even to overturne the foundations of this Popularitie, by inducing the Romans vtterly to take away from the eyes of men, this Idoll, The Macedonian Kingdome, which all so vainly worshipped. Neyther would it proue a difficult matter, To perswade those that were alreadie desirous:rather hee was like to bee highly thanked, for fetting forward their wifnes; and perhaps to be recompensed with some peece of the Kingdome, as he had bin rewarded, for the 50 like fernice, when Antiochus was vanquished.

To this end, He made a second voyage to Rome: where though hee had little to fay which they knew not before; yet his words were heard with such attention, as if they had contained some strange noueltic, and so pondered by the Fathers, as if the weight of them were to turne the ballance, that before was equall. of Demetricus; the expedition of the Bastarna into Dardania; that of Perfeus himfelfe against the Dolopians, and to Delphi; the great estimation of the Macedonian in Greece; his intermedling in bufineffe of his neighbours; his riches; and his great prouisions : were all the materiall points of Eumenes his discourse. Only He descended vnto particulars, having searched into all (as he professed) like vnto a Spie. Hee faid, That Perfess had thirtie thousand foot, and five thousand Horse of his owne; monic in a readinesse to entertaine tenne thousand mercinaries for tenne yeares; armes, to furnish a number thrice as great; The Thracians his friends at hand, readie, at a call, to bring him foldiours as manie as he should require; and that hee prepared victuals for tenne yeares, because he would not bee driven, eyther to live to vpon spoile, or to take from his owne subjects. Herewithall Hee prayed them to consider, that King Seleucus the sonne and successor of Antiochus the great, had given his daughter Landice in marriage to Perfeus; Perfeus not wooing, but Seleucus offering the match; That King Prufias of Bithynia, by earnest suite, had gotten to wife the fifter of Perfeus; and that these mariages were solemnized with great concourse of Emba flagesfrom all quarters. Neyther spared Hee to tell them, (though seeming loath to viter it plainly) That even the envie to their Estate was the cause. why many that could not endure to heare of amitie with Philip, were now growne maruelloufly well affected to his fonne. All this, and fome facts of Perfeus, which might eyther bee denied, or iustified (as that hee had procured the death of some 20 which were friends to the Romans; and that hee had expelled Abrapolis the Illy. rian, who inuaded Macedon, out of his Kingdome or Lordship) Eumenes failed not to amplifie vnto the most: faying that hee thought it his dutie to forewarne them : fince it would bee to Himfelfe a great shame, if Perfess got the start of him, and were in Italie making war vpon the Romans, ere Eumenes could come thither to tell them of the danger.

It were too great follie, to belowe that the Romans flood in feare of Perfeus, leaft he should set vpon them in Italie. Neuerthelesse forasmuch as they loued not to make war without faire pretence, not only of wrong done to them or their affociates, but of further hurt intended great thankes were given to Eumenes, who had 20 euery way furnished them with such goodly colour, to beautific their intendment. Now though it were so, that He told them litle else than what they knew before: yet his person, and the manner of his comming, made all seeme greater. For if vpon anie relation made by their owne Embaffadours, or vpon tales deuifed by their flatterers and spies, they had warred against Perseus, ere Hee had committed any open act of hostilitie against them, their injustice, and oppression, would have beene most manifest. But when the wrongs to them done were so notorious, and the danger threatning them fo terrible; that fuch a Prince as Eumenes, came out of his owne Kingdome, as farre as from Asa, to bid them looke to themselues: who could blame them, if they tooke the speediest order to obtaine their own right and 40 securitie? Toward this justification of the warre, and magnifying the necessitie that enforced them thereto, their more than viuall curiofitie, in concealing what Eumenes had vttered in the Senate, when they could not but understand that his errand was well knowne; helped not a little. The Macedonian and Rhodian Embaffadours were at Rome, prouided of answeres to the words, which they knew before hand that hee would speake; and with matter of recrimination. The vanitie, either of Him, or of some about him, seemes to have disclosed all: when the warineffe of the Fathers, in hiding that which all men knew, made a notable fliew of some searefull apprehension; against which, it behooved their wisdome to neglect no possible remedie. Wherefore carelesse audience was given to the Rhodian Em- 50 baffadours; who accused Eumenes, as one more troublesome to Asia, than Antiochus had ever beene, and a provoker of the Lycians to rebellion. The Rhodians had with great pompe, conneighed by Sea unto Perfeus, his bride Laodice; which friendly office as the Macedonian bountifully requited, fo the Romans despightfully acCHAP. 6. cepted. Hence it grew, that when the Lycians, as alreadic vanquished, were setling Polish Locate. themselves in their obedience to the people of Rhodes; Embassadours came from 60.00 61. Rome with ftrange newes which gave new life to the rebellion. For the Senate pronounced, That it flood not with the manner of the Romans, to aliene quite from their owne protection anie people or Nation by them vanquilhed; and that the Lycians were by them affigned vnto those of Rhodes, not as meere vassals, but as dependants and affociates. For proofe hereof, they referred themselves ynto the commentaries of the ten Embaffadors, whom they had fent to dispose of things in Alia. after the victoric against King Antiochus. Hereat Eumenes, M: fanissa, The Atolians,

10 and all other Kings or Estates, that were beholding to Rome for increasing the number of their subjects, had cause to find the selected agricult if they wel contidered the matter: fince by force of this or the like decree, those their subjects might easily bee mide their fellowes, when focuer it should please the Senate: though it were so, that al men knew the prefent meaning of the Senate, which was only to plague the Rho. dians, for their good will to Perfeus, by fetting them and the Lycians together by the cares. The Fathers could therefore fee no reason to dislike Eumenes, vpon this complaint made by the Rhodian Embaffadours,; which indeed more nearely touched themselves. Rather they honoured the King so much the more for that others (as they would needes take it) conspired against him, because of his love to

But the Micedonian Embassage they heard not so carelessely as angrily: though peraduenture it well contented them to find cause of anger. For whereas at other times all care had been taken, to pacifie them with gentle words and excuses now heard they plainer language, and were told, That King Perfess defired much to give them fatisfaction, concerning any deed or word of his, that might favour of hostilitie; but that, if his traugile in this kind proued vaine, then would he be ready to defend himselfe by armes, and stand to the chance of warre, which often falles out contrarie to expectation. These big words may seeme to have proceeded from the vehemencie of Harpalus, that was chiefe of the Embaffadors; rather than from 30 instruction given by the King, with whose faint heart they agreed not. Yet was there good reason, why Perleus himselfe might, at this time, thinke to speed better by a shew of daring, than be was like to doe by any submission. For the eyes of all Greece being now cast upon him, as on the greatest hope of deliverance from the Roman seruitude; it was not expedient, that he should lessen, or perhaps veterly cut off, the generall expectation, and the good affection borne to him, which thereon depended, by discourring his too much weaknesse of spirit, vnanswerable to a

Fortune, which might have beene his, had he knowne how to vie it. 40 New that this brauerie (as better it may bee termed than courage) proceeded from the Kings owne heat; it appeares by his daring to aduenture foone after, on a practife that more justly might anger the Romans, and give them fairer shew of reason to make war voon him. It was knowne that Eumenes, in returning home, would take Delphi in his way, and there doe facrifice to Apollo, Perfeus deadly hating him, and thirsting after his bloud, resolved to way-lay him, and by making there of him a facrifice, to rid his owne hands of a most mischieuous enemie. So there were appointed three or foure flout ruffians to do the murder, who placing themfelues behind a broken mud wal, on the fide of a verie narrow path leading vo from the Seato the Temple, did thence affault the King: whom they forely bruifed

50 with great stones, and left for dead. They might have finished their worke; such was the opportunitie of the place which they had chosen; but feare of being apprehended, made them, without flaying to fee all fure, flee in fuch haft, that they killed one of their owne companions, who could not hold pace with them, because he should not discover them, Eumenes was conveighed away to the little Isle of A-gina, where he was cured being all the while kept fo fecretly, that the fame of his death was current in Alia. Hence it came, that his brother Attalus tooke voon him as king, and either took or would have taken to wife (suppoling it belike a matter of state) Stratonica the daughter of King Ariarathes, whom hee then thought the widdow of Eumenes. It may well be numbred among the rare examples of brotherly loue. That when the King returned aline home, Attalus going forth to meet him and doe his dutie, as in former times, received none other checke, than that He should forbeare to marrie with the Queene, untill Hee were well affured of the Kings death. Morethan this, Eumenes never spake of these matters; but bequeathed at his death, vito the same brother, both his wife and Kingdome. As likewife At- 10 talus forbore to attempt anything to the prejudice of the King his brother: though the Romans (with whom he continued and grew in especiall fauour, when Eumenes felinto their hatred) were in good readinesse, to have transferred the Kingdome from his brother to Him. By fuch concord of brethren was the Kingdome of Pergamus rayled and upheld: as might also that of Macedon have beene, if Demetrius had lived and employed his grace with the Romans, to the benefit of Perfetes.

It is likely that Perfess was verie glad when he understood, that his ministers had both accomplished his will, and had faued all from discouerie. But as hee was deceiued in the maine point, and heard fhortly after, that Eumenes lived : fo was Hee 20 beguiled in that other hope, of the concealement; which hee vainly efteemed the leffe materiall. For He had written to one Praxo a Gentlewoman of Delphi, to entertaine the men whom he fent about this busines; and she, being apprehended by C. Valerius a Roman Embassador then attending upon the matters of Greece, was carried to Rome. Thus all came to light. Valerius also brought with him to Rome, out of Greece, one Rammius a Citizen of Brundusium: who comming newly from the court of Macedon, loaden with a dangerous fecret; had prefently fought out the Embaffador, and thereof discharged himselfe. Brundusum was the ordinarie port, for ships palling between Italie and Greece. There had Rammius a faire house; wherein hee gaue entertainment, being a wealthie man, to Embassadours, and other honoura- 30 ble personages, both Romans and Macedonians, journying to and fro. By occasion of fuch his hospitalitie, he was commended to Perfeus, and inuited into Macedon with friendly letters; as one, whose manie courtesies to his Embassadours, the King was studious to requite. At his comming he was much made of; and shortly, with more familiaritie than he expected or defired, made partaker of the Kings fecrets. The fumme of all was, That hee must needs doe a turne, in giving to such of the Romans as the King should hereafter name, a poyson of rare qualitie, sure in operation, yet not to be perceived either in the taking or afterward. He durft not refuse to accept this employment: for feare leaft the vertue of this medicine should bee tryed vpon himselfe. But being once at libertie; he discovered all. Rammius was but one man, 40 and one whom the King had neuer feene before, nor was like to fee againe : and therefore, befides that the Kings deniall ought to be as good as fuch a fellowes affirmation, the acculation was improbable. Thus did Perfess, in time shortly following, answer for himselfe; and in likefort concerning the attempt vpon Eumenes: denying to have had any hand, cyther in the one or other: yet withall professing, That such objections were not to bee made vnto a King, to proue the rightfulnesse of making war vpon him; but rather vnto a subject pleading for his life in judgment. But howfocuer the Romans neglected the getting of stronger proofe (which might have bin easie) than any that we find by them produced: yet the base and cowardly temper of Perfeus was very futeable to these practises. Neyther did the Senate greatly stand 50 to dispute the matter with him these his treacheries being held inexcusable. And as for his Royall Effate, wherin he supposed that they ought not to touch him for fuch private offences, it gave him no priviled get they judging him to have offended in the nature of a King. Herein furely they wanted not good reason. For if hee might not lawfully make warre vpon Eumenes their confederate; that is, if Hee might not fend men, to walt the Kingdome of Pergamus, or to beliege the townes: might he fend Ruffians to murder the King? If it were no leffe breach of the league to destroy the Senators by fire or famine, than by violence of the sword was it lawfull for him to doe it by Poylon? Wherefore they presently decreed warre aeainst him; and sent Embassadors to denounce it vnto him, vnlesse hee would yeeld to make such amends as they should require. He seemes, at this time, to have beene fo confident, in the generall fauour of Greece, and other comfortable appearances; that if he defired not warre, yet he did not feare it or at least he thought by 10 shew of courage, to make his enimies the more calme. He caused the Embassadors to dance attendance, till being wearie they departed without audience. Then called he them back, and bad them doe their errand. They made a tedious rehearfall of all matters, which they had long beene collecting against him, and wherewith Eumenes had charged him: adding thereto, that He had entertained long and fecret conference in the Isle of Samothrace, with Embassadours sent to him out of Asia, about some ill purpose. In regard of all which they peremptorily required satisfaction; as was their manner when they intended to give defiance. Better they might haue flood vpon the cuidence, brought against him by Rummius and Praxo. For if those accusations could be verified, then wanted they not good ground wheron to 20 build: of which otherwise they were destitute; it being no fault in a king, to be strong, welbeloued, and well friended. Perfeus answered, for the present, in a rage, calling the Romans, Greedie, Proud, Infolent, and underminers of him by their daily Embaffadors, that were no better then meere spies. Finally, he promised to give them in writing their full answere: which was to this effect; That hee would no longer ftand to the league, made betweene them and his father, and renewed by himfelfe indeed onely for feare: but wished them to descend to more equal conditions, whereupon he, for his part, would adule, as they might also doe for theirs.

In the forme of the league betweene Philip and the Romans, as it is fet downe Polyb Legat 9.

by Polybius, we finde no condition, binding the Macedonian to any inconvenience 30 in the future; excepting those which he immediatly performed. But Linie inserts Lindb,33. a clause, whereby he was expressely forbidden, to make any warre abroad, without leave of the Romans. It is most likely, that all the Roman confederats were included in this peace: whereby enery one of the neighbours round about Macedon, entring shortly into league with Rome, did so binde the Kings hands, that he could no more make warre abroad, than if he had beene restrained by plaine couenant. And thus might that feeme an Article of the peace, which neuer was agreed vpon, but only was inferred by consequence. Now if the Romans would vrge this point further, and fay, that the Macedonian might not beare defensive armes, without their permission: then had Perseus very instreason to find himself agricued. For 40 fince they had allowed his father, without controlle, to make warre in Thrace, (whilest they themselues were vnacquainted with the Thracians) and elsewhere abroad, though he asked not their licence; why should they now interpret the bargaine after another fashion? Wasit now become vnlawfull for him to chastise his owne R ebels, or to repay an Illyrian that invaded Macedon? By fuch allegations he maintained the right of his cause, in very milde fort; when it was too late. At the present, by disclaiming the league, as vniust; hee ministred occasion vnto the Embassadors, to give him defiance. Having heard the worst of their message; he commanded them to be gone out of his Kingdome in three dayes. But either hee should have beene lesse vehement; or more constant in his resolution. For if his

50 heart could ferue him to vndertake the warre; hee should couragiously have managed it, and have fallen to worke immediatly, whileft the Enemie was vnprepared; not have lost opportunitie, as now and often he did, in hope of obtaining a worse peace than the former.

PERSEVS having the worse in a skirmish. for fakes all the countrey lying without Tempe. The Baotians rebell against the Romans, and are rigorously punished. The Roman Commanders unfortunate in the warre against Perseys. They were the Greekes their friends; for whose ease the Senate makes provision; having heard their complaints. The flattering Alabanders, long had the Romans beene feeking occasion to take in hand this Macedonian warre, that well they might have bin readie for it, when it came; and not (as they were) behinde hand in prouisions. But it was on a fudden that they met with a confluence of good pretences 20 to make the warre, : whereof, if no one alone had weight enough, yet all of them together, seemed more than sufficient. This opportunitie of making their cause benefit in common opinion, was not to be neglected: though otherwise they were unprepared for the action. Wherefore knowing, or having reason to beleeue, that their owne firength was fuch as would preuaile in the end; they haftily embraced the faire occasion of beginning, and referred other cares to the diligence of Time, Neither was thistheir vnreadinesse a small helpe, towards examining the disposition of the Greekes, and others; who must afterwards dearely pay for any backwardnesse found in their good will. There was not indeed any cause to feare, that all of the Greekes or other Easterne people should conspire together, 30 and take part with the Macedonian: fuch was the diffension betweene their severall estates; howsoeuer the generalitie of them were inclined the same way. Neuertheleffe Embassadors were sent to deale with them all; and to craue their helpe against Perseus, or rather to demand it, in no lesse ample manner, than heretofore they had yeelded it against Philip and Antiochus, in warres pretending the liberty of Greece. The Embassadors vsed as gentle words, for fashions sake; as if they had flood in doubt, that their request might happen to be denied. But the Greeks were now growne well acquainted with fuch Roman courtefie : and vnderstood, that not only fuch as made refusall, but cuen they who might seeme to hauegranted halfe vnwillingly; were like to heare other manner of words, when once this businesse 40 was ended. Wherefore none of them were ferupulous in promifing the best of their helpe to the Romans; * the Acheans and Rhodians, which were chiefe among them, being rather doubtfull, euen when they had done their best, lest it should bee ill taken, as if they had halted in some part of their dutie. It is strange that men could bee so carnest to set up the side, whereof they gladly would have feenetheruine. The vulgar fort was every where addicted to Perfeus; of the Nobles and Rulers, if some were vehemently Roman, they wanted not opposers, that were wholly Macedonian; yea the wisest and most honest, who regarded onely the benefit of their Countrey, wished better to Perseus then to the Remans. And of this number, Polybius the chiefe of Historians was one : who 50 * Polithitez:t. though Hee * iudged the victorie of Perfeus, like to prooue hurtfull vnto Greece; yet wished hee the Romans ill to thrine, that so the Greekes might recour perfect libertie : for his endeuours in which course, hee was at length tyrannically handled, as shall be shewed hereafter. This considered, it appeares, that an extraordinary feare, and not onely reuerence of the Imperiall Citie, made the Acheans, and other Effates of Greece, thus conformable to the Romans. The occalion of this their feare, may be justly imputed vnto the timorous demeanour of Perfess himfelfe. He had vndertaken a war, whereof the benefit should redound, not only to his own kingdom, but vnto all that were oppressed by the Romans. Yet no fooner were fome few companies brought ouer fea, to make a countenance of meaning forme what against him; than he began to speake the enemie faire, and sue for peace at Rome. Since therefore it was knowne, that every small thing would ferue to terrifie him; and confequently, that it should at all times be in the Romans

10 power, by giving him any tolerable conditions of peace, to take revenge at leifure yoon thole which had affilted him: little cause was there, why any should aduenture to partake with him. He made indeed a great noise; leading about his armie; taking by force or composition, some few townes; and soliciting all to joyne with him. But wife men could not be fo beguiled. For at the fame time, he fought all meanes of pacification; and to that end, made humble fuit vnto the Roman Embaffadors. O. Martins, the chiefe of those Embassadors, and a man of more finenes in cunning then was vivall among the Romans made thew of inclination to the Kings defire; and gaue out such comfortable words, that the King intreated, and obtained a meeting at the River Peneus. There did Muritus very gently rebuke the King, 20 and charge him with those crimes that are before mentioned. Wherto though Perfew made none other answer, than the same which they could have made for him; vet the Embaffadors, and especially Martin, tooke it in good part, as therewith fatisfied; and aduised him to give the like fatisfaction to the Senate. That this might conveniently bee done; a truce was agreed upon. Thus had Martins his defire; which was to make the King lofe time. For Perfeus had all things then in readines, and might have done much, ere the Koman armie could have bin in Greece. But by the interpolition of this truce, he no way increased his forces; he suffred a most couenient feafon, of winning vpon the enemies to flip away; and obtained in recompence nothing elfe, than leifure and vaine hope. Yet was he pleafed herewith, as it

30 had bin with fome victory: publishing a copic of the disputation between him and the Romans, whereby he gaue men to understand, how much he had the better, and what great hope there was of peace. Hee fent Embaffadorsaifo to the Rhodians, of whose good will to him he was best perswaded; not onely to let them know how much he was superiour in cause; but to intreat them, that they would take vpon them, as moderators, to compound the differences betweene him and the Romans, if perhaps, not with standing the goodnes of his cause, hee should be denied peace. These were poorehelps. For hereby it appeared, that his late standing vpon point of Honor, was no better than meere vanity: his owne fafety being the vtmoft of his ambition. This his fearefulnes might feeme excusable, and the blame therof to ap-40 pertaine vnto the Greekes; who deceined his expectation, by being wanting to him in time of a necessitie, that was partly their own; had it not bin his office, who took you him as their Champion, to give fuch a manly beginning to the warre, as might incourage al others to follow him. But his timorous quality being found, men grew daily more and more auerse from him, and were carefull, not to put their shoulders to a falling wall. The Rhodians, among whom he had many flout partizans, defired him not to craue any thing at their hands, in which they might feem to do against the good liking of the Romans. The Baotians also, who had entred of late into a Arich fociety with the Macedonian; renounced it now, and made the like with the Romans; to whom further, in a fort, they yeelded themselves as valials. Neither was 50 Martius contented to accept their submission under a generall forme; but caused their feuerall towns to make couenant apart, each for it felfe; to the end, that being thus diffracted into many little common-weales, they might not (were they neuer fo defirous to rebell) have such force to doe hurt, as when they agreed and were incorporated in one, under the Citic of Thebes. This work, of separating the Bactians from Thebes their their head; was more than Agefilaus could effect, or Epaminondas would fuffer then when all Greece followed the Laced emonians. So far more availeable to Thebes, being destitute of helpe from abroad, was the vertue of Epaminondas and a few brane Citizens; than was the focietie with King Perfeus, against a number not fo great as followed the Lacedemonians.

Martius brought this to effect, whilest the King sate still, as being bound by the truce: and having done this, he returned to the Citie; where vaunting what hee had wrought by his craft, he was commended, and (though some reproued it as dishones) employed againe by the Senate, with commission to deale as be should thinke expedient. Touching the Embaffadors which Perfess had fent; audience 10 was given to them, for that they should not plainly see how their Master was deluded; but neither excuse, nor intreatie, would serue their turne; the Senate being resolved before hand what to doe. It was enough that they were admitted into the Citie, and had thirtie daies respite allowed them to depart out of Italy : whereas they who came last on the same errand, did their message without the walles, in the Temple of Bellona (the viual) place of giuing audience to open Enemies, or to fuch Commanders, as might not, by reason of some custome, enter the Citie) and had only the short warning of cleuen dayes, to be gone out of Italy. Neither did this poore courtefie serue alone to hide the craft of Martine, as if hee had meant none other than good carreft: but it was a likely mean, both to keep a long while 20 of his bulineffe, and to flagger his refolution, when he from Perfess the know should need it most fit

And accordingly it was out. For Licinius, the Roman Conful, was at Apollonia, in a manner as foone, as the Macedonian Embaffadors were with their king at Pella. Which though it were crough to have rouzed Perfess, and have made him lay afide all cowardly hope of getting pardon: yet was hee content to deliberate a while, Whether it were not better to offer himselfe tributary to the Romans, and to redeeme their good will with some part of his kingdome, that so he might enjoy the reft; than to put all at once to hazard. But finally, the floutest counsaile preuailed: which also was the wifest; and so would have proued, had it beene soutly 30 and wifely followed. He now began, as if the warre had not begunne vntill now, to doe what should have bin done long afore. He caused all his forces to be drawn together; and appointed their Rendeuous at Citium, a towne in Macedon. All being in readines, he did royall facrifice, with an hundred beafts, to I know not what Minerna, that was peculiarly honored in his Country: and then, with all his Courtiers, and those of his guard, set forward to Citium. His armie he found consisting of nine and thirtie thousand foot and foure thousand horse: whereof about twelve thoufand foot, and a thouland horse, were strangers, of fundry Nations, most part Thracians; the rest his owne Macedonians. These hee animated with lively speeches; laying before them the glory of their ancestors, the insolencie of the Romans, the 40 goodheile of his caufe, the greatneffe of his prouifions, and the many aduantages which they had of the Enemie, especially in numbers. They answered him cheerefully, with loud acclamations, and bade him be of good courage. From all Cities of Macedon there came likewise messengers, offering to helpe him with money and victuals, according to their feuerall abilities. He gaue them thanks : but answered, That his owne prouisions would abundantly suffice, willing them only to furnish him with carts, for his engines and munition.

Out of his owne kingdome he iffued forth into Theffalie: knowing that the Romans were to passe through that countrie, in their journey towards him. Some townes of Thessalie opened their gates vnto him, without making offer to defend 50 themselves; some he balked, thinking them too strong or well manned; and some he wanne by force. Of these last was Myle; a townethought impregnable, and therefore, not more floutly then proudly defended by the Inhabitants, who gaue contumelious language to the affailants. It was taken by reason of a salie; which the Townsfmen rashly made, and being driven backe, received the Macedonians, that entred pell mell with them at the gate. All crueltie of warre was practifed heere: to the greater terror of the oblinate. So Velatic and Connus (towns of much importance, especially Connus, which stood in the streights of Offa, leading into Tempe) yeelded at the first. Having well fortified this paffage, the king marched onwards to Sycurium, a towne feated on the foot of mount offa; where he rested a while, expecting newes of the Enemie.

CHAP. 6.S.6. of the Historie of the World.

Licinius the Conful brought with him only two Roman Legions: being promifed other strength of auxiliaries, which was thought sufficient. Enmenes and Atta-10 lus his brother, came to him in Theffalie, with foure thousand foot, and a thousand horse. Thither also came, from enery part of Greece, such aide as the severall Estates could afford, or thought expedient to send; which from the most of them was very little. Of the kings abroad; Masanissa sent thither his sonne Misagenes, with a thousand foot, as many horse, and two and twentie Elephants. Ariarathes the Cappadocian, by reason of his affinitie with Eumenes, was friend to the Romans, and had fent to Rome his yong fonne, there to be brought up : yet hee did little or nothing in this warre; perhaps because Eumenes himselfe began within a while, but when it was too late, to be otherwise aduised than he had beene in the beginning. Prussas was content to be a looker on : as being allied to Perseus, and yet fea-

20 ring the Romans. Antiochus, and Ptolemie (though Ptolemie was then yong, and vnder Tutors) had busines of their owne; the Syrian meaning to inuade the A. gyptian: yet each of them promifed helpe to the Romans, which they cared not to performe. Gentius the Illyrian was inclinable to the Macedonian: yet made good countenance to the Romans, for feare. It was a prettie tricke, wherewith M. Lucretius, the Roman Admirals brother, serued him, for this his counterfeit good will. This king had foure and fiftie shippes, riding in the hauen of Dyrrachium, vnccrtaine to what purpose: all which Lucretius tooke away, after a very kind fort; making shew to beleeue, That for none other end than to serue the Romans, their good friend Gentius had fent thither this fleet. But what focuer Gentius thought in 30 the beginning; he foolishly lost both his kingdome and himselfe, in the end of this war; by offering, rather then giving, his helpe to Perfeus. With none other company than what he brought ouer the fea, Licinius came into Theffalie: fo tyred with a painfull journey, through the mountainous country of Athamania, which flood in his way from Epirus; that if Perfeus had been ready, attending his descent into the Plaines, the Romans must needs have taken a great ouerthrow. He refreshed himselfe and his wearied armic, by the river Peneus; where he encamped, attending his auxiliaries, that came in as fast as they could. It was not any flender helpe, that could enable him to deale with Perfeus. Therefore he resolued, to abide where he then was, and keepe his trenches, vntill his numbers

40 were sufficiently increased : contenting himselsein the meane while, to have gotten quiet entrance into the Country. The land of Theffalie, in which thefe two armies lay, was better affected to the Romans, than any part of Greece belides: as hauing beene freed by them from a more heavie yoake of bondage to the Macedonian, when there was little hope or expectation of fuch a benefit. It was generally rich, fruitfull, and abounding in all things needfull to mans life. In the midft of it, but somewhat more to the East, was that beautifull valley of Tempe, so exceedingly ful of all delights, that the name was often vsed at large, to fignific the most pleafant and goodly places. This valley of it felfe was not great: but adding to it those huge mountaines, Off a and Olympus (famous in Poeffe) with their Spurres or bran-

50 ches, by which it was on all sides enclosed; it occupied the better part of Thessalie. And this way were the Romans to enter into Macedon; vnleffe they would make an hungrie iourney, thorow the countrey of the Daffaretians, as in the former warre with Philip, they had long, in vaine, attempted to doe. Perfeus therefore had no small aduantage, by being master of the streights leading into Tempe: though far greater he might have had, if by miffpending of time he had not loft it. For if in defending the ragged paffages of these mountaines, he were able to put the Romans often to the worle; yea to winne vpon them (for a while) cuery yeare more than other, both in strength and reputation: questionlesse he might have done far greater things, had he feized upon the streights of which his father once kept, and defended all the countrie behinds the Mountaines of Pindus, Surely not without extreame difficultie, must the Romans have either travelled by land, with all their carriages and impediments, through places wherein was no reliefe to bee found; or elfe have committed their armies, and all things thereto needfull, vnto the mercie of feas that were very dangerous; if they would have fought other way 10 into Macedon, than through the heart of Greece: vpon neither of which courses they once deuifed, not with it and ing any trouble which they found in this prefent warre. It may perhaps be faid, that the Greekes, and others, whom the King must have left on his backe, would have made him vnable to defend any places too farre from his owne home. But they were all, excepting the Thellalians, better affected now to him, than they had bin to his father in the former warre. The Etolians, vpon whom the Athamanians depended, grew into fulpition with the Romans (as we shall finde anon) even as soone as they met with Fersew. The Bacotians, how politikely focuer Martius had wrought with them, aduentured themselves desperately in the Macedonians quarrell : what would they have done, if he at first had done 20 his boil? The Rhodians, Illyrians, yea and Eumenes himfelfe, after a while began to water, when they faw things goe better with Perfew, then they had expected. So that if in itead of discouraging his friends, by suing basely for peace; he had raised their hopes, by any braue performance in the beginning; and encreased the number of his well willers, yea and bought downe with money (as hee might have done) some of his enemies, and among them Eumenes, who offered for good recompence, to forget his broken head : then might the Romans perhaps have bin compelled to forfake their imperious patronage over Greece; and to render the libertie, by them giuen, entire; which otherwise was but imaginarie. Such benefit of this warre, fince it was hoped for afterwards, might with greater reason haue beene ex- 32 pected at first, from greater advantages. But as a searefull companie running from their enemies, till some river stay their slight; are there compelled by meere desperation to doe such actes, as done, while the battell lasted, would have wonne the victorie: fo fell it out with Perfeus. In feeking to avoid the danger of that war, whereof he should have sought the honor; hee left his friends that would have flood by him, and gaue them cause to provide for their owne safetie: yet being ouertaken by necessitie, he chose rather to set his back to the mountaines of Tempe. and defend himfelfe with his proper forces; than to be driven into fuch miferie, as was incuitable, if he gauea little further ground. What was performed by him or the Romans, all the while that he kept his footing in Thessale, it is hard to shew 40 particularly; for that the historie of those things is much perished. Wherefore we must be contented with the summe.

The Conful hauing no defireto fight, vntill fuch time as all his forces were arrived; kept within his trenches, and lay fill encamped by the River of Peneura, a hout three miles from Larifa. That which perforated the Conful to protract the time; did contrarivale incite the King, to put the matter vnto a hafty triall. Wherfore he inuited the Romans into the field; by waling the land of the Phereams their confederates. Finding them patients of this indignitie; he grew hold to aducenture euen vnto their trenches: out of which if they islued, it was likely, that his aduantage in horse would make the victoric his sowne. At his comming they were trou-50 bled; for that it was sudden; yet no way terrified; as knowing themselves to bee safely lodged. They sent our a sew of King Eumens his horse, and with them some light armed soot, to entertaine skirmish. The Captaine, and some other of these were slaine; but no matter of importance done; for that neither Litinius, nor Emmenes, found itreasonable to hazzard battaile. Thus day after day, a while together, Person wontinued offering battaile: which they still refused. Hereby his boldness much encreased; and much more, his reputation: to the griefe of those, who being so farre come to make a conquest, could ill digest the shame, that fell vpon them by their enduring these brauadoes. The towne of Syanisms, where Person then lay, was twelue miles from the Romas: neither was there any connenient watering in that long march, which we'd to take vp soure houres of the morning; but he was fainet o bring water along with him in carts, that his men might not be both wearie and thirstie when they came to fight. For remedie of these inconne

10 niences, he found out a lodging, seuen miles neerer to the Enemie: whom he visited the next day by the Sunne rising. His comming at such an vaussall houre, filled the Campe with tumult: in 6 much as though hee brought with him onely his horse and light armature, that were vnsit to assail the trenches, yet the Consul thought it necessary, and resoluted to giue checke to his pride. Wherefore he sent forth his brother C. Lizinius, King Eumenes, Attalus, and many braue Captaines, with all his power of horse, his Velites, and all the rest of his light armature, to trie their fortune; he himselfe remaining in the Campe, with his Legions in readinesse. The honor of this morning, was the Macedonian Kings; for he obtained the victoric in a manner entire, (though the Thessalans made a good retrait) with little solfe

20 of his owne. But he discourred his weaknesse re night, by hearkening, as Princes commonly doe, to counsaile given by one of his owne temper. For whereas the Romans were in great feare lest he should affault their Campe; and to that purpose, you the first newes of his successe, his Palanx was brought vnto him by the Captaines, though vnsent for: he neuerthelesse cookens for sound aduice, which indeed was timorous and base, To worke warily, and moderate his victorie; by which meanes it was faid, That either he should get honest conditions of peace, or at least will many companions of his fortune. Certainly it was like, that his good fortune would exalt the hope and courage of his friends. Yet had it bin greater; and had he wonse the Roman Campe, his friends would have been the more, and the bol-

30 der. But ouer-great was his folly, in hoping then for peace: and in fuing for it, euen when he had the victory, what elfe did he, than proclaim wrot all which would become his partakers, that neither good nor had fortune should keepe him from yeelding to the Romans, whensouer they would be pleased to accept him? At this time the 109 of his victorie would admit none of these considerations. Hee had slaine of the Roman horse two hundred, and taken of them prisoners the like number. Of their foot he had slaine about two thousand: losing of his owne no more than twentie horse and fortie soot. The Roman Campe, after this desatter, was full of heauinesse and searce: it being much doubted that the enemie would set vponit. Emmense gaue counsaile to dislodge by night, and remoue to a surer place beyond

Emmets gaue countaile to dillodge by night, and remoute to a lurer piace beyond of the Riture Presents. The Conful, though afiamed to profelfe, by fo doing, in what feare he flood; yet thought it better to acknowledge the loffe paft, than by flanding on proud tearmes, to draw yoon himfelfe a greater calamitie. So hee paffed the Rituer in the dead of the night, and incamped more firongly on the further fide. The **Etolians* were forely blamed for this loffe: as if rather a trayterous meaning, than any true feare, had occasioned their flight, wherein the reft of the Greeker blowed them. Five of them, that were men of efpeciall marke, had been observed, to be the first which turned their backes: an observation likely to cost them deare, at a time of better lessure. As for the The flatus, their vertue was bonored with reward: to ask the Greeker might learne, by examples of either kinde, 50 that if they would shunne indignation, or incurre fauour, then must they adactive the state of the content of the content with the property of the property

So that it they would infune indignation, or incurre rations, then must they aductive no left-feor their Lords the Romans, than gladly they would doe for their rown libertie. Thus fared it with the Conful and his armie. Perfess came the next day to correct the former dayes errour; which how great it was, hee not wrill then found. The Romans were gotten into a place of fafetie; whither they could never have attained, if the King had either pressed his victorie, or given better heed to them that night: his light armature alone being sufficient to have rowted them.

whileft they were conveying themselves to the other side of Peneus. But it was vaine to tell what might have been done; fince there was no remedie. The Romans were beaten, even the flower of their Citie, the Gentlemen of Rome; out of whom were chosen their Senators, and consequently the Generals themselves, Pretors, Confuls, and all that bore office or command among them; yea they were beaten fo thamefully, that they stole away by night, and suffered him to gather vp the spoiles of them without relistance, as yeelding themselues ouercome. With among his followers. But there was much wanting within him, to have made his honor found. He came nearer to the Romans, and encamped at Mopfelus, a place in the mid-way betweene Tempe and Lariffa; as if it were his meaning to preffe them fomewhat harder. Neuertheleffe hee was eafily perfuaded to vie the occasion, which he feemed to haue, of obtaining peace. Therefore hee fent vnto the Con-ful, and offered to yeeld winto the fame conditions, wherein his father had beene bound to the Romans; if the war might fo take end. It were needleffe, heere againe to show the folly of this his course. Towards the accomplishment of this desired peace, there was in the Conful no greater power, than to grant a truce, whileft Em-conditions, and ratific the league. And of fuch a truce granted by Martins, he had lately found no small discommodity redounding. But Licinius dealt plainly, and returned answere. That other hope of peace there was none; save that Perseus would yeeld both his Kingdome and Person, simply and absolutely, to discretion of the Senate. A manly part it was of Licinius to bee fo resolute in adversitie. On the other fide, it argued a very faint heart in Perfeus, that having received an answere so peremptorie, he still perfished, making vaine offers of greater tribute. Finding that the peace, which he fo much defired, could not be purchased with money, the king withdrew himselfe backeto Sycurium. There he lay hearkening what the Enemie Masanisa, with the aid before mentioned. This distance between the King and them, caused the Romans to waxe the more bold in making their haruest: about which businesse they ranged ouer all the fields. Their carelesse demeanour gaue him hope to doe some notable exploit: which hee attempted, both vpon their

Campe, and upon those that were abroad. The Campe he thought to have fired on the fudden: but the alarme being taken in good feafon, he failed in the enterprize. As for the forragers; he had a good hand vpon them, if he could have with-drawne it, and given ouer in time. But whileft he stroug to force a gard, he was vifited by the Conful; by whom either in a skirmilh of horse, or (for the report is or fmall, caused Perseus, after a few dayes, to fall backe into Macedon; as being nadiners) in a great battaile, he was ouercome. This miladuenture, whether great 40

did; whose forces were well repaired by the comming of Misagenes the sonne of 20

fuch braue words did the King fet out the glory of hisaction; dividing the spoiles 10

pendants were taken by the art of Martius; were more true to Rome, than other pettie townes, which by that fame distraction of the Baotians, became within themselues more absolute, than formerly they had beene. The causes hereof were to have beene fought among the changes happening in their variable factions: wherof the knowledge is now loft. Some of them rebelled, and were throughly punished by Lucretius the Roman Admirall: who got so much by spoiling them, that hee would have brought others to rebell in like fort, if by extreame oppression hee to could have driven them fo farre, Neither was Licinius the Conful vndiligent in the fame kinde. What his doings were, after fuch time as he was at leifure from Per/eus. I finde no where mentioned. Onely this is faid in generall; That in the warre owne will, should not be afraid of a Roman armie, then on foot in Greece, and a Na-nic on their coast. But more strange it is, that the Thebans, from whom their de-which he made, he * cruelly and couetoully demeaned himselfe.

CHAP. 6. S.6. of the Historie of the World.

After the same fashion dealt they, that commanded in the yeare following; Ho-Stilius the Conful, and Hortensius the Admirall, or Pretor of the Fleet. Hostilius flewd more of his industrie, in picking quarrels with the confederats of Rome, than in prosecuting the warre against the Macedonian. For concerning the Roman war voon his kingdome, after that the Conful had fought passage in vaine ouer certain mountaines, Perseus seemed, in a manner, * free from it. He was troubled indeed * Polyb. Leget.

20 on that fide which looked towards Illyria, by Ap. Claudius, whom the Conful fent 70. thither with an armie of foure thousand, and who, by leauies made upon the Confederates, doubled this his armie. But Claudius thinking to have taken Vicana, a border towne of Illyria, by treason, came thither in such carelesse order, that the inhabitants which had made shew of treason, with purpose onely to traine him in-to danger; salied forth vpon him, ouerthrew him, and chased him so farre, that hardly hee escaped with a fourth part of his company. Yet this towne of V/cana shortly after became Roman: which howsoeuer it happened, Perfeus very soone recouered it, and many other places therewithall: Cotys; a Thracian king, securing him on the one fide of Macedon; and Cephalus an Epirote, revolted from the Romans, on 30 the other. Perfeus likewife made a painfull journey into Ætolia: where hee was promifed to be admitted into Stratus, that was the strongest Citie in that Region. Of this hope though he were disappointed by those of the Roman faction; yet in his returne home, hee tooke in Aperantia; and shortly heard good newes, That Ap. Claudius was againe throughly beaten by Cleuas, one of his Lieutenants. Such fucceffe had the Micedonian war vnder Hostilius. The same Consul offended much the Greekes, by the strict inquisition which his Embassadors made into mens affection towards Rome. For these Embassadors trauelling thorow all the Cities of Peloponnesus, gaue out speeches tending to shew, That they liked no better of those who fought not by might and maine to aduance their busines, than of those which

40 were of the Macedonian faction. Their meaning was, to baue accused by name, in Polyb Legal 1744 the Parliament of Achaia, Lycortas that worthy Commander, who nobly followed the steps of Philopamen; and together withhim, his sonne Polybius, who soone after was Generall of the Achean horse, but more notable by that excellent historie which he wrote, than by his great employments, which hee well and honorably discharged. The summe of the accusation should have beene; That these were notheartic friends vnto the Romans, but fuch as abstained from raising troubles, more for lacke of opportunitie, than for any loue to the common quiet. But fince no colour of truth could bee found, that might give countenance to fuch a tale; it was thought better, for the present, to let it alone, and give gentle words, as if all 50 were well. In like manner dealt they among the Ætolians: They demanded hostages; and found some in the Councell that approoued the motion: as also among the Acarnanians, there were that entreated to have Roman garrisons bestowed in their townes. But neither the one nor the other of these propositions tooke effect. They of the Roman faction, accused not only such as were inclinable to the Mace-turally given to feare danger, even where none was : whereby what loffe he felt will appeare hereafter. Heleft all behinde him, faue only Tempe, weakly guarded: and confequently an easie prey to the Romans. After the Kings departure, Licinius went straight vnto Connus; hoping to have taken it, and fo to have gotten entrance into Tempe. But finding the work too hard, he returned backe upon the Perrhabians and others; from whom hee wanne fome townes, and among the rest, Lariffa. There were fundrie townes thereabout, bearing the same name of Lariffa: so that this which the Consul tooke, may seeme, not to have belonged vnto the Theffalians; vnleffe, perhaps, after his victorie, Per. 50 Jeus did greater actes than we finde recorded, and got some part of Thessalie.

Of matters happening in Greece at this time, it is hard to give a precise account: for that the histories of them are greatly defective. One may thinke it strange, that the Baotians, whom a Roman Embassador could terrifie, and bring altogether to his denian, but also the good Patriotes; making it no lesse then a matter of treason, to be a Gregian in Greece. On the contrary fide, there wanted not fome, who roundly to'd these pick thankes of their base flatteric; rating them openly in such fort, that one of them hardly escaped being stoned, even in presence of the Embassadours. Thus was all full of accufations and excufes: among which the Embaffadors caried themselves, as men that could beleeve none ill; though it were well enough knowne what they thought. The belt was, that an order from the Senate was brought into Greece, and published, to this effect: That it should be free for all men, to refuse obedience to any Roman Magistrate, imposing any burthen for the present warre, vnlesse it were such, as the Senate had likewise thought meete. To Of this decree the whole countrie was glad : for it was, or feemed, a good remedie of many inconveniences. But they that standing on priviledge hereof, refused to fulfill every commandement, were numbered among the Patriotes; which in the end of this warre, proued little better, if not worfe, than to haue beene traytours. The Senate was driven to fet downe this order; by reafon of the many and vehement complaints brought to Rome, concerning the wrongs done by Roman Magistrates, and especially by the Admiralis, Lucretius and Hortenlius, Lucretius was condemned in a great function of money, for the wrongs by him done: highly to the commendation of the Romans, in that they loued not to have their fubicets oppreffed. Hortenfins being still in office, had warning to amend.

Among the great number of Embaffages that came to Rome about this time, either to feeke redreffe of injuries, or to offer their fernices: it is note-worthy, that from Alabanda, a towne of the leffer Ala, there was prefented vnto the Senate, and well accepted, a most base peece of flatterie. These Alabanders brought three hundred horsemens targets; and a crowne of gold, to bestow upon tapiter in the Capitol. But having a defire to gratifie the Romans with some exquisite token of their dutifull obedience, wherein they would bee fingular; and being not able to reach vnto any great performance: they built a Temple, vnto the Towne Rome, and appointed anniverfarie games to bee celebrated among them, in honour of that 20 Goddesse. Now who can wonder at the arrogant folly of Alexander, Anticonus, Ptolemie, and the like vainemen, that would bee thought gods; or at the shamelesse flatterie of such as bestowed upon men, and not the most vertuous of men, divine honours; when hee fees a Towne of houses, wherein powerfull men dwell, worthipped as a Goddesse, and receiving (without scorne of the giuers, or shame of the present) the title of Deitie, at the gift of such a rascall Citie as Alabanda?

O. MARTINS the Roman Conful, with extreame difficultie and danger, enters into Tempe. The comardize of PERSEVS in abandoning Tempe. The towne of Dium quitted by MARTIVS; repaired and fortified by the King. The Romans attempt many places, with ill successe. Their affaires in hard estate. MARTIVS a cunning and a bid man. POLYBIVS Cent Embassador to MARTIVS from the Acheans, POLY-BIVS his honest wildome beneficiall to the Acheans. King EV MENES growes anerle from the Romans. PERSEVS negotiates with ANTIOCHUS and EVMENES. His falle dealing with GENTIVS King of Illyria; whom hee drawes into the Roman warre. He fends Embassadors to the Rhodians; who vainly take upon them to be arbitrators betweene him and the Romans. PERSEVS lofeth a mightie succour of the Baflarne, by his wretched parsimonic.

Fter two yeares of the Macedonian warre, things were further out of tune in Greece, than when the warre began 3 wifich had been thought likely to reforme all those Countries, and bring them to what passe the Romans defired; as it did in the end. Perfeus had hitherto the better, and was stronger now, than when he lived in peace. He had

20 enlarged his borders on the Illyrian fide; his friends, in all parts of Greece, took couragedaily; and his reputation grew fuch, as caused those that were before wholly Roman, to suspect what the issue of the war might proue, and therupon to become wife for themselves. Contrariwise, Licinius and Hostilius the Consuls, had one after the other foent their time in vaine, feeking way into Mucdon; and defaced the glorious enterprize of conquelt, by many losses received. The Roman Admiralls had so demeaned themselues, that many towns, euen of the best affected to Rome, kept them out by force. Generally, the feare was great on the Roman fide; and the armie much leffened, not only by cafualties of warre, but by the facilitie of the Tribunes or Colonels, or elfe of the Conful himfelfe (for they laid the blame one

30 vpon the other) in licencing the fouldiers to depart. Quintus Martius the new Conful, who fucceeded vnto Hostilius, was to amend all this; which nevertheleffe was more than he knew how to doe: though he brought with him aftrong supplie of men. He began horly to fet the warre on foot, which a long time had flept. And he began the right way : not feeking to force the freights that were furely garded, but taking paines to clime the mountaines, which were thought able to forbid all paffage ouer them, without helpe or need of any custodie. The King heard of his approch; and being vincertaine what way he meant to take, distributed his owne forces, to the defence of all places which might give entrance, or permit ascent. But the Conful proceeded in his journey: with hope, either not to bee discourred by the Enemic, or to breake through all opposition, or at leastwife, to fight on as conuenient ground, as they should have that lay to stop him, and at length, if all failed, to make a fafe retreat. He fent before him foure thouland of his most expedit foot, to discouer the wayes. Two dayes was this company troubled, in ouercomming the difficultie of no more than lifteene miles: after which they had fight of the Enemie, that lay to deny their passage. They occupied therefore a safe peece of ground; and fent backe word to the Conful, where they were; intreating him to hasten vnto them : which he did. The Macedonians were not a whit dismayed at his arrivall; but met him, and fought with him, two or three dayes together; each returning to their owne Campe at night, with little loffe on either fide. This bic-

io kering was on the narrow ridge of a mountaine, which gaue scarcely roome vnto three to march in front. So that very few hands came to be employed : all the reft were beholders. In this case it was impossible to get forwards: yet a shame to returne. Wherefore Miritus tooke the only courferemaining; and indeed the best: Part of his men he left with Popilius, to attend upon the Macedonians: whileft hee, with the reft, fetcht a compaffe about, and fought out wayes that never had beene troden. Herein he found extreame difficultie; which notwithstanding he ouercame. Besides the troubles commonly incident to fuch journeyes, through places white for habitation: he was compelled, by labour of hand, to make pathes where none were, yea where Nature might feeme to haue intended, that none should be. So fleepe he found the descent of the mountaines, in this way which he took: that of feuen miles, which they trauelled the first day, his men were compelled, for the more part, to rowle themselves downe; as not daring to trust their feet. Neither was this the worft. For they met with rockes, that flood one over another, fo vpright, and cumbersome to get downe; that their Elephants were afraid of the giddie prospect, and cashing their gouernours, made a terrible noise, which affrighted the horses, and bred great confusion. Hauing therefore gone, or wallowed, foure miles of this grieuous iourney, there was nothing more defired by the fouldiours, than that they might be fuffered to creepe backe againe, the fame way which they had come. But fluft was made to let downe the Elephants, by a kinde of bridges. likevnto falling draw-bridges: whereof the one end was joyned to the edge of the cliffe; the other fuftained by two long postes, fastened in the ground below. Vpon thefe two postes, or poles, which indeed (not being very strong, since it was intended that they should be either cut or broken) were fastened two rafters, answerable in length to the diffence, between the higher and the lower fall: so as the end of one 20 bridge might reach to the beginning of another. These were coursed with plankes and turfe; that they might feeme continent with the ground; fo to make the beafts aduenturous, to goe vpon them. If there were a Plaine of any good extent from the foot of arocke, to the next downfall; then might the bridge be shorter. When an Elephant was gone a pretie way, vpon one of these; the postes vpholding the frame were cut afunder; therby caufing him to fincke downe vnto the next bridge; whence he was conveyed, in like manner, to the third, and onward fill, to the very bottome. Thus went they downe fliding, some on their feet, others on their buttockes, till they came to an euen valley. By this irappeares, how throughly provided the Romans vied to be in their journeyes, of things needfull in all occasi- 30 ons : as also what inestimable paines they tooke in this descent, about the conpeyance of themselues and all their carriages downe the mountaines. The next day they refted; flaying for Popilius and his company, who hardly, or perhaps neuer, should haue ouertaken them, if the Enemie had followed, and fet vpon him from aloft. The third and fourth daies iourneyes were like vnto the first faue that custome, and the nearnesse to their wayes end without meeting enemie, caused them the better to endure the labour.

Perfeus could not be ignorant of the Romans comming towards him: fince they fought with his men upon the paffage, three dayes together; he lying fo nigh, that he might wel neare haue heard the noise. Yet was he so possessed with seare; that he 40 neither flirred to helpe his owne men, or to hinder the Conful, nor made any prouision for that which might fall out; but as one void of counsaile, sate hearkening after the event. Four eonly paffages there were, leading into Tempe: the first by Connus; which the Romans were viable to force; the second and third were the fame which Atartius had attempted in vaine, and another like vnto it: the laft, by the Citie of Dium out of Macedon. All these were sufficiently guarded; and whofocuer would feeke any other way, must be faine to take such paines as Martius had undergone. The entrance by Dium was fairer than any of the reft: whereof only the King had benefit; for that his enemies could not get thither, faue through the valley it felfe, into which they must first pierce another way. Dium stood upon the foot of the huge mountaine Olympus, about a mile from the feat of which mile, the river Helicon becomming there a lake, and called Bapbyras, tooke up the one halfe; the rest being such as might easily have beene fortified. Besides all these, there was in the middest of Tempe, a passage which ten men might casily keepe: where the spures of the mountaines, reaching sarre into the valley, drew neare to the verie banks of Penes. agoodly and deepe riner which ran thorow it. Wherefore nothing had beene more easie, than to make the Consider speem in or his trouble-tome ciourney; if Penese would have seene his owne advantages. For the Roman armie was not only in ill case to fight, after the vexation of that misserable traues but must need have either perished for want of visituals, or bin enforced to returne the same way that it came, if the King had made good the streight of Dium. To have returned, and climbed up with their Elephants and carriages, against those rockes, from which, with extreame labour, they could hardly get downe; if seemes a materiate or impossibilities especially considering, how the enemie, from about their heads, would have bestern your them, being now agarage of the past, which them.

to terof impollibilities: especially considering, how the enemie, from about their heads, would have beaten upon them; being now aware of the path which they had taken, though he knew it not when they stole away from him. It may therefore bee thought strange, that the Romans did not rather take their iourney into Musedon, from the side of idpria, whence that kingdome had often him inuaded, as lying open on that part: than put themselves to the trouble of breaking into Tempe; whence, after that they were there arrived, there was no meanes to escape, without forcing one of those passages, which they despaired to winne. But the cowardize of Parsun, did commend the counsalies by them followed, as whise. For he no sooner heard that the Enemie was come ouer the mountaines into Tempe; than he

20 fared like one out of his wirs; faying, That he was vanquilhed, & had loft all without bastaile. Herewithall he began to take out of Diam, what he could carry away in halte; and ftraightwayes abandoned the Towne. In the fame vehemencie of amazement, he fent a ftrait commandement to The flatmics, that the Arfenall there should be fer on fire; and to Pells, that his treafures there should be cast into the feat as if the Remans were like presently to be masters of these two Cities. Nicias, who was appointed to drownethe treasure, performed it hastily as we las he could though soone after, his master grew sorie for the loss; and it was all, in a manner, recourred by Divers from vnder the water. But Andronicus, who had charge to fer fire on the Kings Arsenall, deferred the execution; foreseeing that repentance

30 might follow: and 60 he preuented the damage. Whether Nieis, for his abfolute and blinde obedience, or Andronieus, for his carefull providence, merited the greater commendation, or more afie pardon; it refled in the King to interpret. The reward of their feruice was this. Perfeur growing ashamed of his mad cowardize, that appeared in this haltie direction; caused them both to be slaine. Also those poore men, which had fetche his treasure out of the say their diaing, were payd their wages after the same fort: that so there might be no witnes of the Kings base folly. Such end must they searce, who are printe to dishonourable actions of great Princes. If Perseus would have gone surely to worke, for the hiding of his sault; then must be of royally baue behaued himselfe, that no man might beleeve him to 40 be the author of any vinworthy act or counfaile. But his vertue was of no fitch capacitic. Het shought it enough to lay the blame vpon others. And therefore, hauing called Hippins away (the Capatine which had floopped the Conful on the top of the mountaine) and Aliepinskins, from defence of the palliages, whereto they were by him appointed he tated them openly faying, that they had betrayed vinto the Enemie the gates and baires of Mucelon. Of this reproch if they would difebarge themfelues, by laying it vpon him, to whom of right it belonged: then might they have fixed as did Nation and Andronius.

The Conful Marius had great cause to reioyee, for that the King so hashly relinquilted his possession of Tempe, and all the passages leading thereinto: since the 50 Roman armie, this notwithstanding, was hardly able to subsit, for want of victuals. He tooke Diam without resistance, & thence went forward into Macedon: wherein having travelled about a dayes sourney, and gotten one towner that yeelded, he was compelled, by meere-lacke of food for his men, to returine backe towards Thessale. His siece came to him, in this time of necessitie, well appointed to have holpen him in the war; but having left behinde, at Magnefia, the ships of burthen, which carried the propisions. Wherefore it fell out happily, that one of his Lieutenants had been carefull to occupy the Castles about Tempe, which were for faken by the Macedonians: for by those waies only might come be brought into the army. To meet the fooner with this corne, which was defiroully expected; he for looke Dinm, and went to Phila; by which foolish journey (if not worse than foolish) he lost more, than a little the longer fasting had bin worth. It is probable, that his carts, with all or the most of his store, were lost among the mountaines: for otherwise it had bin madnes to put himself on such an enterprise, so slenderly provided, as that without enforcement.or fight of the Enemie, he should be faine to quit it. Howsoeuer it was:men thought him a coward, or at least a bad man of warre; since he thus recoyled and gaue off, when it most behoued him to have profecuted the action.

By understanding the folly, or cowardize of Martius; the King recollected him. felfe; understood his owne error; fought to hide it by such poore means as haue bin shewed; and laboured to make what amends he could. He quickly reposses the town of Dium, which he hastily repaired, finding it dismantled by the Romans. This done; he encamped strongly by the river Enipeus: meaning there to stop the Enemies proceeding all that Summer. Leffe diligence, more timely yfed, would have bin enough, not onely to have delivered Martius into his hand, who had beguiled bim with an idle hope of peace: but to have given him fuch a noble victory, as might 20 cause the Romans to seek a good end of the war vpon faire conditions, and not to begin againe in halte. Yet this recourry and fortification of Dium, was to the Conful an exceeding hindrance. For little or nothing could afterward be done toward the conquest in hand, in all the continuance of his office. Only the towne of Heracles, standing on the river of Penew, five miles from Diam, was taken by force; or rather by a trick of climing upon mens heads, somewhat after the maner of our tumblers. But it made fuch defence as it could; and was not given up for feare. After this Martius did fet a bold face towards Dium; as if he would have taken it againe, and haue driven the King further off: though his intent or hope was nothing like fo great : his chiefe care, being to prouide for his wintering. He fent the Admirall to 20 makeattempt vpon the fea-townes, The falonica, Caffandrea, Demetrias and others. All these were assayed: but in vaine. The fields about Thessalonica were wasted; and some companies, that fundric times adventured forth of the towne, were fill put to the worfe. As for the towne it selfe; there was danger in comming neere it, either by land or fea; by reason of the engins, which shot from the wals, and reached vnto the fleet. Wherfore the Admirall fetting faile from thence, ranne along by . Ania, and Antigonea (landing neare to each of them, and both doing and receiping hurt) vntill he came to Pallene, in the territory of Callandrea. There King Eumenes ioyned with him, bringing twentie ships of warre: and fine other were fent thither from King Prusias. With this accesse of strength, the Admirall was bold to trie his 40 fortune at Caffandrea: which was bad. There was a new ditch lately cast by Perfeus, before the town: which while the Romans were filling vp, question was made; what became of the earth taken thece, for that it lay not vpon the bank, By this occasion. it was learned, that there were arches in the town wal filled up with that earth, and couered with one fingle row of brick. Hence the Admiral gathered hope of making way into the towne, by fapping the walls. To this worke he appointed fuch as hee thought meetelt: giving an alarme to the other fide of the towne, therby to shadow his attempt. The breach was foon made. But whileft the Romans were shouting for iov. & ordering themselves for the affault: the Captaines within the towne perceiacd what was done; & salying forth vnexpected, gaue a sierce charge on the com- 50 panies that were between the ditch & the wall of whom they flew about fix hundred & fuffred few to escape vnwouded. This defafter, & the want of good successe on that part of the towne which king Eumenes affailed (a supply in the meane while entring the towne by fea) caused the fiege to breake vp. Torone was the next place which the Admirall thought meet to attempt; and thence likewife he was repelled. Finding this too well manned; he made way towards Demetrias: whereinto Euphranor, a Micedonian Captaine, was gotten before his comming, with fuch forces, as were not only sufficient to have defended the Towne, if the Admirall had layed figge to it, but to keepe the land about it from spoyle; or at least (as they did) to make the enemic pay deare for all that he there got. This Euphranor had taken his journey to Demetrias, by Melibaa; whither the Conful (that he might not be quite without worke) had fent his Lieutenant to beliege it: and by the terrour of his appearing fuddainely ouer their heads, caused the beliegers to dislodge in all

Such fortune attended on the Romans; or rather, so farre was their abilitie short of their Enterprifes, ever fince their Conful (whether daftardly or carelefly) most valike a good Commander, had let goe his hold of Macedon, by for faking Dium: Yea, it is to be suspected, that some greater harme befell them, or at least, that they were in some greater danger, than is expressed in the broken remaining Hiflorie of this Warre, For Martins perfuaded the Rhodians, by Agefipelis their Pobleguson Embaffadour, who came to him at Heracles about other bulineffe of leffe importance. That they should doe well to interpose themselves as mediators, and seeke to finish the Warre. Now, although Polybius doe most probably coniecture, that

20 this was rather a malicious device of Martins, craftily feeking to bring the Rhodians in danger (as anon it fell out) by their opposing the resolution of the Senate; than that it proceeded from any true feare in him, either of Perfess, or of Antiochus, who had then an armie on foot: yet fince he made shew of feare, it is like withall, that somewhat had happened, which might make his feare seeme not counterfeit. And fo were the Rhodians moved to thinke of him; not only for that the extraordinary courtefie, both of him and of the Admirall, towards their Embassador, comming from proud natures, did argue diffidence, where there was no ambition to cause it; but much more, for that shortly after the Embassadors of Perfeus, & of Gentius the Illyrian, did fet out their bufineffe at Rhodes, not more with the strength of a good

20 fleet, which the Macedonian had gotten, than with the honor of some victory, wherin he had lately flaine great numbers of the Roman horfe. Thus much we finde inti- Polity, Legal 876 mated:though the time, place, or other circumstances of the fight, be not specified. And hereto may be referred, the report of those that were sent from Rome, to view the effate of Martius his army. For they found the Conful wanting meat; the Admirall, wanting men, and, for those few that he had, wanting both mony and cloths: and Ap. Claudius the Pretor, who lay on the frontire of Elyria, fo vnable to inuade Macedon, that contrariwife, he was in extreame danger, so as either he must quickly be fent for thence, or a new army be fent thither to him. Wherefore it may feeme, that fome blow had bin taken on the Illyrian fide, which made al to halt; or at leaft,

40 that the Romans with greater loffe, than is before spoken of, had been driven from some of the Townes which they belieged.

Now although it were fo, that Martius in very few of his actions, behaued himfelfelike a man of war; yet in exercise of Cunning, which one hath most aptly termed, a crooked or finister kinds of wifedome, he dealt as a craftefmalter, with a reftleffe working diligence. This indeed neither proued his fufficiencie, nor commended his honeftie: fince thereby he effected nothing to his owne benefit; and neuertheleffe, out of enuic, vaine-glory, or such delight as weake and busic-headed men take, in creating inexplicable troubles, he directly made opposition to the good of his country. At such time as Perfeus, by the successe of his doings against Hostilius, had got-50 ten much reputation, and was thought likely to inuade Theffalie; Archo, Lycortas, and other good Patriotes among the Acheans, judged it expedient for their Nation to helpe the Romans, as in a time of aduerlitie, whom in prosperitie they loned not to flatter. Wherefore Archo proposed a decree which passed: That the Aches is should fend their whole power into Theffalie, and participate with Rrrrrr 3

the Romans in all danger. So the armie was levied; and Polybius, with others, fent Embaffadors vnto Martins, to certific him thereof, and know his pleafure. Polybius found the Conful bulied in feeking passage through Tempe into Macedon. Hee went along with the armie; and awaited the Confuls leifure, till they came to 1/eraclea; where finding the time convenient, hee presented the Decree, and offered the service of his Nation, wherein soener it should be commanded. Martine tooke this very kindly; but faid, that he needed now no maner of helpe. Forthwith Polybius dispatched home his companions, to fignifie thus much: tarrying himselfe behind in the Campe. After a while, word was brought to Martius, that Ap, Claudius desired, or rather imperiously required, of the Achaans, five thousand men, to be sent him into Epirus. It was manifest, that Appius had need of these men; and that if he were strong in field, he might doe notable seruice, by distracting the forces of Perfeus. But the Labyrinthian head of Martius could not allow of fuch plaine reason. He called vnto him Polybius, to whom he declared, that Appius had no need of fuch aide: and therefore willed him to returne home, and in any wife take order that the men might not bee fent, nor the Acheans be put to fuch needleffe charges. Away went Polybius; musing, and vnable to resolue, whether it were for loue to the Acheans, that the Conful was so earnest in this busines; or rather for enuic, and to hinder App. Claudius from doing any thing, fince himfelfe could doe nothing. But when Polybius was to deliuer his opinion in the Councell, touching 20 this matter: then found hee a new doubt, that more neerely concerned his owne selfe, and those of his partie. For as he was sure to incurre the great indignation of the Conful, if he should neglect what was given him in charge; so was it manifest on the other fide, that the words by Martins vttered to him in prinat, would proue no good warrant for him and his friends, if openly they should refuse to helpe Claudius, alleaging that he had no need. In this case therefore, he had recourse vnto the decree of the Senate: which exempted men from necessitie of doing what the Roman Commanders should require, vnlesse by special order from the Senate. the same were likewise appointed. So for lacke of warrant from the Senate, this demand of Appius was referred vnto the aduice of the Conful: by whom it was 22 fure to be made fruitrate. Hereby the Achaans were fauers, of more than an hundred and twentie talents: though Polybius himselferanne into danger of Appius his displeasure; and for such honest dealing in his Countries behalfe, was afterwards rewarded by the Romans with many a long yeares imprisonment.

Whether it were by the like policie of Martius, that King Eumenes grew cold in his affection to the Romans; or whether this King began when it was too late, to fland in feare, left the fire, which hee himfelfe had helped to kindle, would fhortly take hold on his owne lodging; or whether the regard of money were able to ouerswey al other passions; it is hard to determine: since they that had better means to know the truth, have not precisely affirmed any certaintie. One report is, that 40 Eumenes did not fo much as give any helpe to Martius : but comming to have ioyned with him, in fuch friendly manner as he did with the former Confuls, was not entertained according to his liking; and thereupon returned home in such anger, that he refused to leave behind him certaine horse of the Gallogreekes, being requefied to have done it. If this were true; and that his brother Attalus tarrying behinde with the Conful, did the Romins good feruice: then is the reason apparant, of the hatted, borne afterwards by the Senate to Enmenes, and the love to Attalus. But it is more generally received; that Eumenes gaue a willing care to Perfeus his defire of accord, for meere defire of gaine. And it might well bee, that couetousnessed rew him on, in the course, whereinto indignation first led him. How- 50 focuer it befell; Perfeus caused Eumenes to be sounded, and found him so tractable, that he was bold to folicite him by an Embassage. The tenour of his aduertisements, both to Eumenes, and to Antiochus, was: That there could be no perfect loue, betweenea King and a free Citie: That the Romans had quarrellalike to all Kings, though they dealt with no more than one at a time, and whethe helpe of one agrainft another; That Philip was oppreffed by them, with the helpe of Authors, Anticohus, with the helpe of Philip and Emmens; and now Perfeux assailed, with helpe of Emmens and Prussa. Herewith he willed Emmens to consider, that when Aisedon was taken out of their way, they would be doing with him in Assailed, which hay next at hand; yea, that alreadie they began to thinke better of Prussa; than of him. In like fort he admonished Anticohus, not to looke for any good conclusion of his warre with the Egyptian, loong as the Romans could make him give over, by denouncing their will and pleasure. Finally, he requested both of them, either

10 to compell the Romans, to furcease from their war upon Macedon; or else to hold them as common enemies vnto all Kings. Anticebus lay farre out of the Romans way: and therfore was little troubled with fuch remonstrances. Enmenes was more nearely toucht; and as hee felt part of this to be etrue, so had he reason to stand in doubt of the rest. Yet when he should give answers, hee began to ofter a bargaine of peace for money. He thought the Romans to be no lefte weary, than Person was afraid. Wherefore he promised, for his owne part, That if he might have fifteene hundred Talents for withdrawing his hand strom this Warre, then would he remaine a Neuter therein: and that for some greater quantitie of money (how much I finde not) he would also bring the Romans to condiscend wnto peace:

20 and for affurance of his true meaning herein, he offered to giue hostages. Perfeus liked well to receiue the hostages: but not to lay out the money; especially before hand, as was required. He would faine haue peace with Rema, and not with Euments only. For procuring of this, he promised to be at any reasonable cost: but hee would lay downe the money in the T emple at Samathrace: whence it should be deliuered wnto Euments, after that the peace was fully concluded and ratified. The sile of Samathrace was Perfeus his owne: and therefore Euments thought the money no nearer to him, being there, than if it remained in Pells. Belides, his labour deserved since the would have part of his wages in press. Thus the two Kings did 30 no more, than looke time; and Euments grew solepeded of the Remans, as a 130.

Travtor. After the same manner dealt Perseus with King Gentius the Illyrian. He had attempted this Illyrian before; who dealt plainely, and faid, That without money he could not flirre. Hercunto Perfess loued not to hearken; thinking, that his Treasures would serue at the last cast, to deliner him from all his seares. But when the Romans had gotten within Tempe, then did his feare vige him to prodigalitie; fo as he agreed to pay three hundred Talents, which Gentius demanded for a recompence. So the bargaine was soone made, and pledges on both sides deliuered for performance. This was openly done by Perfess; to the end that all 40 his armie might haue comfort, by fuch acceffe of firength to their partie. Prefently vpon the bargaine made, Embassadors were sent to Rhodes, from both Perfew and Gentius: who defired the Rhodians, to take vpon them, as arbitrators, betweene Perseus and the Romans, and to bring the Warre to an end. The Rhodians thinking that Martine the Conful was no leffe defirous of peace than the Macedonian, arrogantly promifed, That they, by their authoritie, would make peace; wishing the Kings to shew themselves conformable. But the Roman Senate, hearing prowd words, to the same effect, from the Rhodian Embassadours; gaue an answere, as disdainefull, angrie, and menacing, as they could deuise: so as this vaine glorie of the Rhodium was throughly chalified, and more throughly flould 30 haue beene, if their fubmission had not beene as humble, as their follie was proud. Such vie of Gratina his friendship, made Perfeus; without laying out one onne of Siluer. Now faine he would have hastened this young and rash theyrive to enter with all speed into the Warre: but then must the money be hastened away. Pantaubus, the Meedonium Embassadour, who remained with Gentius, exhorted him daily to begin the Warre by land and fea, whileft the Romans were vnprouided. But finding what it was that made all to flay; he fent word to Perfews. Hereupon tenne Talents were fent to Pantauchus: who deliuered it to the yong King, as earnest of that which followed. More followed indeed; and fealed vp with the feale of the Illrians; but carried by Macedonians, and not too fast. Before this money came into Illyria, Gentius had layed hands vpon two Roman Embaffadors, and call them into prison. Which Perfess no sooner heard, than he recalled his I rea-

fure-bearers, and fent them with their loade to Pellas for that now the Illyrian was of necessitie to make warre with the Romans, whether hee were hyred thereto. There came about the same time, through Illyria, to the aide of Perseus, vnder one Cloudious a pettie King, tenne thousand horse and tenne thousand foot, of the Gaules, which were (as Plutareb hath it) the Bastarna, These had before hand made their bargaine, and were to receive prefent pay at the first. At their entrie into the Kingdome, Perfeus fent one to them; defiring their Captaines to come visit him, whome he promifed to gratific with goodly rewards; hoping that the multitude would take good words for payment. But the first question that their Generall asked, was, Whether the King had fent money to give the fouldiors their pay in hand, according to his bargaine? Hereto the messenger had not what to answere.

further, vntill they have gold, as was agreed, and hoftages. Perfess hereupon tooke

counfaile; if to vtter his owne opinion, before men fo wife that they would not contradict him, were to take counfaile. He made an inuccine against the incivilitie and auarice of the Bastarna: who came with such numbers, as could not but be dangerous to him and to his Kingdome. Five thousand horse of them hee said would be as manie as he should need to vie; and not so manie, that he should need to feare them. It had beene well done, if anie of his counfailors would have told him, That there wanted not employment for the whole armie of them, fince without anie danger to the Kingdome, they might be let out, by the way of Perrabia, into Theffalie: where wasting the Countrey, and filling themselves with spoile, 39 they should make the Romans glad to forsake Tempe, even for hunger and all manner of want; therein doing the King notable feruice, whether they wonne anie victoric, or not. This, and a great deale more, might have beene alledged, if anie man had dared to give advice freely. In conclusion, Antigonus, the same messenger that had beene with them before, was fent againe, to let them know the Kings minde. He did his errand: vpon which followed a great murmure of those manie thoufands that had beene drawne fo farre to no purpofe. But Clondjew asked him now againe. Whether hee had brought the money along with him, to pay those five thousand, whome the King would entertaine. Hereto, when it was perceived, that Antigonus could make no better answere, than shifting excuses; the Bastarna retur- 40 ned prefently towards Danubius, wasting the neighbour parts of Thrace; yet suffering this craftie messenger to escape vnhurt: which was more than he could have Thus dealt Perfew, like a carefull Treasurer, and one that would preserve his money for the Romans, without diminishing the summe. But of this painefull Office he was verie soone discharged by L. Amylius Paulus the new Conful: who in fifteene dayes after his fetting forth from Italie, brought the Kingdome of Macedon to that end, for which Go p had appointed oner it a King fo foolish and so cowardly.

Y the Warre of Micedon, the Romans hitherto had gotten much dishonour. Which, though it were not accompanied with anie danger, yet the indignitie so moued them, that either * they decreed Plutsich.in. that Prouince to L. Æmylius Paulus, without putting it, as was o- vii. Æmy!.

therwise their manner, to the chance of lot, betweene him and his fellow Conful; or at least were gladder that the lot had cast it vpon him, than that so worthie a man was advanced to the dignitie of a second Consulship. Hee refused to propound vnto the Senate anie thing that concerned his Prouince; vn-20 till by Embassadours, thither sent to view the estate of the Warre, it was perfectly vnderstood, in what condition both the Roman forces, and the Macedonian, at the present remained. This being throughly knowne to be such, as hath beene alreadie told; the Senate appointed a strong supplie, not onely to the Consul, but vnto the Nauie, and likewise to the Armie that lay betweene Illyria and Epirus; from which App. Claudius was removed, and L. Anicius fent thither in his place. Amycustome, spake with much grauitic and authoritie. Hee requested those that thought themselves wife enough to manage this Warre, either to accompanie him into Macedon, and there affift him with their advice; or elfe to governe their 30 tongues at home, and not take you them to give directions by hearefay, and cenfure by idle reports: for he told them plainely. That he would frame his doings to occasions; not to the expectation of the multitude. The like speech of his father L. Amylius, who died valiantly in the Battaile of Canne, might well be liuing in some of their memories: which was enough to make them conforme themselues the more gladly vnto the instructions given by a wise and resolute lim, before his departure from Rome, making an Oration to the People, as was the

All his businesse within the Citie being dispatched, Amylius was honourably attended, at his fetting forth on his journey; with an especiall hope of men, that he should finish the Warre: though that he should finish it so soone and happily, 40 was more than could have beene hoped or imagined. He came to Brundusium: whence, when the winde came faire, he fet fayle at breake of day, and arrived fafe. ly at the Isle of Corcyra before night. Thence passed he to Delphi: where, having done facrifice to Apollo, after the fift day he fet forwards to the Campe; and was there in fine dayes more. So are there but fine of the fifteene dayes remaining, in which he finished the Warre.

Perfeus lay strongly encamped at Dium; having spared no labour of men and of women to fortifie the bankes of Enipeus, where it was fordeable in drie weather. So as there was little hope, or none, to force him, and confequently as little poffibilitie to enter that way into Macedon. One great inconvenience troubling the 50 Romans, and much disabling them to make attempt vpon Dium; was lacke of fresh water. For there were tenne myles betweene Dium and Tempe; all the way lying betweene the Sea shoare and the foot of Olympus, without anie Brooke or Spring breaking forth on that fide. But Amylius found present remedie for this, by digging Wells on the shoare; where hee found sweet Springs: as commonly there is no thoare that wants them, though they rife not about the ground. Want of this knowledge was enough to hinder Martius from taking up his lodging anic nearer to the enemic, than the Towne of Heracles, on the River of Peneus; where he had watering at pleafure, but could performe no feruice of anie worth. Yet when the Roman Campe had fuch meanes to lye close to the Macedonian, as it presently did: the paffage on ward, being defended as bath beene shewed, feemed no lesse difficult than before. Wherefore it was necessarie to fearch another way: which by enquirie was foone found out. There was a narrow paffage ouer Olympus, leading into Perrabia; hard of ascent, but slenderly guarded, and therefore promising a faire journey. Martius either had not been informed hereof; or durft not attempt 10 it : or perhaps could not get his fouldiors to make the adnenture; they fearing least it would prone such a piece of worke, as had beene their march oner off into Tempe. But Paulus was a man of greater industrie, courage, and abilitie, to command. He had reformed, even at his first comming, manie disorders in the Roman Campe: teaching the fouldiors, among other good leffons, to be obedient and readie in execution; without troubling themselves, as had beene their manner, to examine the doings and purpoles of their Generall. And now he appointed about fine thousand men to this Enterprise; whereof he committed the charge vnto Scipio Amylianus and Q. Fabius Maximus, his owne fonnes by nature, but adopted: the one of them, by a sonne of Scipio the African; the other, by one of the Fabil. 20 Scipio tooke with him some light-armed Thracians and Cretans; but his maine fireigth was of Legionaries. For the Kings guard, vpon the mountaine, confifted in a manner wholly of Archers and Slingers: who, though, at fome diffance, they might doe notable service against those that should climbe up vnto them; vet when the darkneffe tooke away their ayme, they were like to make a bad nights worke, being to deale with those that were armed to fight at hand. To concease the businesse about which they went, Scipio and Fabius tooke a wrong way, towards the fleet; where victuals were prouided for their journey; it being noyfed, that they were to runne along the coast of Alacedon by sea, and wast the Countrey. All the while that they were passing the Mountaines (which was about 22) three dayes) the Coulul made flew of a meaning to fet upon Perfeus where hee lav; rather to divert the Kings attention from that which was his maine Enterprife, than vpon anie hope to doe good, in feeking to get oner Enipem. The Chanell of Enipeus, which received in Winter time a great fall of waters from the Mountaines, was exceeding deepe and broad; and the ground of it was fuch, as though at the prefent it lay welneare all drie, yet it ferued not for those that were weightily armed to fight vpon. Wherefore Amylius employed none faue his Velites; of whom the Kings light armature had advantage at farre distance, though the Romans were better appointed for the close. The Engines from off the Towers which Perfeus had rayfed on his owne banke, did also beat vpon the Romans, 40 and gave them to understand, that their labour was in vaine, Yet Amilius persifled as he had begun; and recontinued his affault, fuch as it could be, the fecond day. This might have ferued to teach the Macedonian, that fome greater worke was in hand: fince otherwise a good Captaine, as Emyline was knowne to be, would not have troubled himfelfe with making fuch brauadoes, that were fomewhat coffly. But Per/eus looked onely vnto that which was before his eyes: vntill his men, that came running fearefully downe the Mountaine, brought word into the Campe, That the Romans were following at their backes. Then was all full of tumult; and the King himfelfe no leffe (if not more) amazed than anic of the rest. Order was forthwith given to dislodge . or rather, without order, in all tu- 50 multinous haft, the Campe was broken vp, and a speedie retreat made to Pydna. Whether it were so, that they which had custodie of the passage were taken sleeping, or whether they were beaten by plaine force; Scipio and Fabius had verice good successe in their journey. It may well be, that they slept vntill the Romans came somewhat neare to them; and then taking alarme, when their arrowes and flings could doe little feruice, were beaten at handie stroakes: so as the different relations that are cited by Plutarch out of Po'ybius, and an Epiffle of Scipio, may each of them have beene true. Thus was an open way cleared into Micedon: which had beene effected by Martim in the yeare fore going; but was closed up againe, through his not profecuting fo rich an opportunitie.

Perfeus was in extreame doubt what course to take, after this vnhappie beginning. Some gaue aduice, to manne his Townes, and so to linger out the Warre: having beene taught by the last yeares example, how resolute the people were in making to defence. But farre worse counsaile prevailed: as generally it doth in turbulent and fearefull deliberations. The King resolued to put all at once to hazard of battaile: fearing belike to put himselse into anie one Towne, least that should be first of all besieged; and he therein (as cowardly natures alwayes are jealous) not ouer-carefully relieved. This was even the fame that Amylius, or anie inuador, should have desired. So a place was chosen neare vnto Pydna, that served well for the Phalanx, and had likewise on the sides of it some peeces of higher ground, fit for the archers and light armature. There he abode the comming of the enemie; who stayed not long behind him. As soone as the Romans had fight of the Kings Armie; which, with greater feare than discretion, had hasted away from them, forsaking the 20 Campe that was fo notably well fortified: they defired nothing more, than to giue battaile immediately; doubting least otherwise the King should change his minde, and get further off. And to this effect Scipio brake with the Conful ; praying him not to loofe occasion by delay , But Emplus told him , That hee spake like a young man; and therefore willed him to have patience. The Romans were tyred with their journey; had no Campe wherein to rest themselues; nor anie thing there, faue onely the bare ground whereon they trode. For these and the an, who did the like, in order of battaile; gaue charge to haue the Campe measured out and entrenched behinde the Armie; whereinto, at good leyfure, hee fell 30 backe, without anie manner of trouble. After a nights reft, it was hoped, both by the Romans, and by the Macedonians, that the matter should be determined; each part thinking their owne Generall too blame, for that they had not fought the fame day. As for the King, he excused himselfe by the backwardnesse of the enemie; who aduanced no further, but kept vpon ground feruing ill for the Phalans; as on the other fide, the Conful had the reasons before shewed, which he communicated to those about him the next day.

like respects, the Consul made a stand : and shewing himselfe vnto the Macedoni-

That evening (which followed the third of September, by the Roman account) C. Sulpicius Gallus, a Colonel, or Tribunc of a Legion, who had the former yeare beene Prætor, foretold vnto the Conful, and (with his good liking) vnto the armie, 40 an Eclipse of the Moone, which was to be the same night : willing the souldiors not to be troubled therewith, for that it was naturall, and might be knowne long before it was seene. It was the manner of the Romans, in such Eclipses, to beat Pannes of Braffe and Basons, as wee doe in following a swarme of Bees; thinking, that thereby they did the Moone great case, and helped her in her labour. But this prognostication of Sulpicius converted their superstition into admiration of his deepe skill, when they faw it verified. Contrariwife, the Macedonians howled and made a great noyle as long as the Eclipfe lasted: rather perhaps because it was their falhion, than for that they were terrified therewith as with a prodigie betokening their loffe; fince their defire to fight was no whit leffened by it. I will not here 50 stand to dispute, Whether such Eclipses doe signific, or cause, anie alteration in ciuile affaires, and matters that have small dependance on naturall complexion : for the argument is too large. More worthic of observation it is, how superstition captinates the wisdome of the wifelt, where the helpe of true Religion is wanting. Emplius, though hee were sufficiently instructed concerning this defect of the Moone, that it was no supernaturall thing, nor about the reach of humane understanding, so as he should need to trouble himselfe with anic denout regard thereof: yet could be not refraine from doing his dutie to this Moone, and congratulating with facrifice her deliuerie, as foone as the shone out bright againe: for which, hee is commended even by Plutarch, a fage Philosopher, as a godly and religious man. If Sulpicius perhaps did not affilt him in this foolish denotion; yet is it like, that he, being a Senatour, and one of the Councell for Warre, was partaker the next morning in a Sacrifice done to Hercules; which was no leffe foolith. For a great part of the day was vainely confumed, ere Hercules could be pleased with anic Sacrifice, and vouchfafe to thew tokens of good lucke in the entrailes of the beafts. At 10 length, in the bellie of the one and twentieth Sacrifice, was found a promise of victoric to Emylins; but with condition, That hee should not give the onset, Hercules was a Greeke, and partiall, as nearer in alliance to the Macedonian than to the Rom.: v. Wherefore it had beene better to call vpon the new Goddeffe, lately canonized at Alabanda; or vpon Romalus, founder of their Citic, on whom the Romans had beltowed his Deitie; or (if a God of elder date were more authenticall) vpon Mars the father of Romalus, to whome belonged the guidance of militarie affaires; and who therefore would have limited his favour, with no injunctions contrarie to the rules of Warra.

Now concerning the Battaile; Emplius was throughly perfuaded, that the 20 King meant to abide it: for that otherwise hee would not have stayed at Pylna, when, as a little before, his leyfure ferued to retyre whither hee lifted, the Romans being further off. In regard of this, and perhaps of the tokens appearing in the Sacrifices, the Conful thought that hee might wait vpon advantage, without making anie great hafte. Neyther was it to bee neglected, that the morning Sunne was full in the Romans faces : which would be much to their hinderance all the forenoone. Since therefore Per/eus kept his ground, that was commodious for the Phalanx, and Amylius fent forth part of his men to bring in Wood and Rodder; there was no likelyhood of fighting that day. But about tenne of the clocke in the morning, a small occasion brought to passe that, which 30 whereto neither of the Generalls had ouer carneft defire. A horfe brake loofe at watering; which two or three of the Roman fouldiers followed into the riner, wading after him up to the knees. The Kings men lay on the further banke; whence a couple of Thracians ranne into the water, to draw this horse over to their owne fide. These fell to blowes, as in a private quarrell; and one of the Threeians was slaine. His countrimen seeing this, hasted to reuenge their fellowes death, and followed those that had flaine him ouer theriuer. Hereupon company came in to helpe on each part, untill the number grew fuch, as made it past a fray, and caused both the armies to be carefull of the cuent. In fine, each of the Generalls placed his men in order of battaile, accordly as the manner of his Countrie, and the armes, 40 wherewith they ferued, did require. The ground was a flat leuell, faue that on the sides a few hillocks were raised here and there; whereof each part might take what advantage it could. The Macedonians were the greater number, the Romans the better fouldiers, and better appointed. Both the King and the Conful encouraged their men with linely words; which the present condition could bountifully afford. But the King having finished his Oration, and sent on his men, withdrew himselse into Pydna: there to doe sacrifice, as hee pretended, vnto Hercules. It is the leffe maruaile, that hee durst aduenture battaile, since hee had bethought himfelfe of fuch a firatageme, whereby to faue his owne person. As for Hereules, hee liked not the facrifice of a coward : whose vnseasonable denotion could be 50 no better than hypocrifie. For hee that will pray for a good Haruest, ought also to Plow, Sowe, and Weede his Ground. When therefore the King returned to the battaile, hee found it no better than loft : and he, in looking to his owne fafetie, caused it to be lost altogether, by beginning the flight.

The acts of this day, fuch as we finde recorded, are, That the Roman Elephants could doe no manner of good : That the Macedonian Phalanx did fo ftoutly preffe onwards, and beat off all which came before it, as Amylius was thereat much aftonilbed: That the Peligni rulhing desperately on the Phalans, were over-borne, many of them flaine, and the fquadrons following them fo discouraged herewith, as they retired apace towards an hill. These were the things that fell out adverse to the Romans; and which the Conful beholding, is faid to have rent his coat-armor for griefe. If the King with all his power of horse, had in like manner done his denoyre; the victorie might haue bin his owne. That which turned the fortune 10 of the battaile, was the same which doubtlesse the Consul expected, even from the beginning: the difficultie, or almost impossibilitie, of holding the Phalanx long in order. For whilest some of the Romans small battaillons pressed hard upon one part of it, and others recoyled from it; it was necessarie (if the Macedonians would follow vpon those which were put to the worse) that some files having open way before them, should advance themselves beyond the rest that were held at a fland. This comming to to paffe, admonished the Conful, what was to be done. The long pikes of the Macedonians were of little vie, when they were charged in flanke by the Roman Targettiers; according to direction given by Amilia, when hee faw the front of the Enemies great battaile become vnequall, and 20 the rankes in some places open, by reason of the vnequall resistance which they found. Thus was the vie of the Phalanx proued vnauaileable against manie fmall squadrons, as it had beene formerly in the battaile of Cynolcephale: yea, this forme of embattailing was found unferuiceable against the other, by reafor, that being not cuerie where alike distressed, it would breake of it selfe; though here were little fuch inconvenience of ground, as had beene at * Cyno- * chap.4. 5-14. Gephala.

Perfeus, when he faw his battaile begin to route, turned his bridle prefently, and ranne amaine towards Pella. All his horse escaped, in a manner, vntouched, and a great number followed him; the little harme which they had taken, witneffing

30 the little good service which they had done. As for the poore foote; they were left to the mercie of the Enemie: who slew about twentie thousand of them; though having little cause to be furious, as having lost, in that battaile, onely some sourcefcore, or fixfcore men at the most. Some of the foot, escaping from the execution, ouertook the king & his company in a wood; where they fel to railing at the horfemen, calling them cowards, traytors, and fuch other names, till at length they fell to blowes. The King was in doubt left they had ill meaning to himselfe: and therfore turned out of the common way, being followed by fuch as thought it good. The rest of the company dispersed themselues: every one as his owne occasions guided him. Of those that kept along with their King, the number began within

40 a while to lessen. For hee fell to denssing vpon whom he might lay the blame of that daies misfortune, which was most due to himselfe: thereby causing those that knew his nature, to shrinke away from him, how they could. At his comming to Pella, he found his Pages and houshold servants, readie to attend him, as they had bin wont. But of his great men that had escaped from the battaile, there was none appearing in the Court. In this melancholike time, there were two of his Treasurers that had the boldneffeto come to him, and tell him roundly of his faults. But in reward of their vafeafonable admonitions, he stabbed them both to death. After this, none whom he fent for would come at him. This boded no good. Wherefore standing in feare, lest they that refused to come at his call, should shortly dare

50 some greater mischiese; he stole out of Pella by night. Of his friends he had with him onely Euander (who had beene employed to kill Euroenes at Delphi) and two other. There followed him likewise about fine hundred Cretians; more for lone of his money, than of him. To these he gaue of his plate, as much as was worth about fiftic talents, though shortly be cozened them of some part thereof; making shew as if hee would have redeemed it; but never paying the money. The third day after the battaile hee came to Amphipolis; where hee exhorted the townelmen to fidelitie, with teares; and his owne speech being hindered by teares, appointed Enander to speake what himselfe would have vetered. But the Amphipolitans made it their chiefe care, to looke well to themselves. Vpon the first fame of the ouerthrow, they had emptied their towns of two thousand Thracians that lay there in garrison: sending them foorth under colour of againsfull employment, and thutting the gates after them. And now to bee ridde of the King; they plainly bade Evander be gone. The King hearing this, had no minde 10 to tarrie: but embarking himfelfe and the treasure which hee had there, in certaine vessells that hee found in the river Strymon; passed over to the Isle of Samothrace: where he hoped to line fafe, by priniledge of the religious Sanctuarie

These miserable shifts of the King make it the lesse doubtfull, how all the kingdome fell into the power of Amylia, within fo few dayes after his victoric. Prdna which was nearest at hand, was the last that yeelded. About fixe thousand of the fouldiours, that were of fundrie Nations, fled out of the battaile into that Towne; and prepared for defence: the confused rabble of so many strangers hindering all deliberation and confent. Hippius who had kept the passage ouer 20 Offa against Martius, with Pantauchus, who had beene sent Embassadour to Gentius the Illyrian, were the first that came in : yeelding themselves and the Towns of Ber.ea, whither they had retired out of the battaile. With the like message came others from Thessalonica, from Pella, and from all the Townes of Macedon, within two dayes: the loffe of the head bereauing the whole bodie of all sense and strength. Neither did they of Pydna stand out any longer, when they knew that the King had for faken his Countrey: but opened their gates vpon such tearmes, that the sacke of it was granted to the Roman armic. Amyans fent abroad into the Countrey, fuch as hee thought meeteft, to take charge of other Cities : hee himselfe marching towards Pella. Hee found 30 in Pella no more than three hundred talents; the same whereof Perseus had lately defrauded the Illyrian. But within a little while hee shall have

It was foone understood, that Perfeus had taken Sanctuarie, in the Temple at Samothrace: his owne letters to the Conful, confirming the report. He fent thefe letters by perfons of fuch meane condition; that his case was pittied, for that he wanted the service of better men. The scope of his writing was, to defire fanour: which though hee begged in tearmes ill befeeming a King; yet fince the inscription of his Epillic was, King PERSEVS to the Conful PAVLVS; the Conful, who had taken from him his Kingdome, and would not allow him to retaine 40 the Title, refuled to make answere thereunto. So there came other letters. as humble as could be expected: whereby hee craued and obtained, that fome might bee fent to conferre with him about matters of his prefent estate. Neuertheleffe in this conference, hee was maruailous earnest, that hee might bee allowed to retaine the name of King. And to this end it was perhaps, that hee had fo carefully preserved his treasure, vnto the very last: flattering himselse with fuch vaine hopes as these; That the Romans would neither violate a Sanctuarie, nor yet neglect those great riches in his possession; but compound with him for money, letting him have his defire to live at ease, and bee called King. Yea it feemes that hee had indeede, even from the beginning, a defire to live in this 50 Ifle of Samothrace: both for that in one of his confultations about the war he was dehorted by his friends, from feeking to exchange his Kingdome of Macedon, for *fuch a paltrie lland; and for that hee offered to lay vp the money which Eumenes demanded, in the holie Temple that was there. But hee findes it otherwife, They vige him to give place vito necessitie, and without more adoe, to yeeld to the discretion and mercie of the people of Rome. This is so tarre against his minde, that the conference breakes off without effect. Prefently there arrives at Samothrace Cn. Octanius the Roman Admirall, with his fleet : who affayes as well by terrible threats as by faire language to draw the King out of his lurking hole, wherein, for feare of imprisonment, he had imprisoned himselfe. When all would not ferue, a question was moued to the Samothracians; How they durst pollute their Temple, by receiving into it one that had violated the like holte priviledge of 10 Sanctuarie, by attempting the murder of King Eumenes at Delphi? This went to the quicke. The Samothracians, being now in the power of the Romans, take this matter to heart; and fend word to the King, That Euander, who lives with him in the Temple, is accused of an impious fact committed at Delphi, whereof vnlesse he can cleare himselfe in judgement, he must not be suffered to prophase that holie place, by his abiding in it. The reuerence borne to his Majestie, now past, makes them forbeare to fay, that Perfeus himfelfe is charged with the same crime. But what will this auaile, when the minister of the fact being brought into judgement, shall (as is to be feared) appearsh the author? Perfeus therefore willeth Enumber to have confideration of the little favour that can be expected at the Romans hand.

20 who are like to be prefidents and overfeers of this judgement: fo as it were better to die valiantly, fince none other hope remaines, than hope to make good an ill cause; where, though he had a good plea, yet it could not helpe him. Of this motion Euander seemes to like well; and either kills himselfe, or hoping to escape thence, by deferring the time as it were to get poy fon wherewith to end his life, is killed by the Kings commandement. The death of this man, who had flucke to Perfeus in all times of need, makes all the Kings friends that remained hitherto, to for fake him: fo as none are left with him, faue his wife and children, with his Pages. It is much to be suspected, that they which leave him you this occasion, will tell perillous tales, and fay, That the King hath loft the priniledge of this holie

30 Sanctuarie, by murdering Buander therein. Or if the Romans will affirme so much, who shall dare to gainefay them? Since therefore there is nothing but a point of formalitie, and even that also lyable to dispute, which preserves him from captiuitie; hee purpofeth to make an escape, and flye, with his T reasures, vnto Cotys his good friend, into Thrace. Oroandes, a Cretian, lay at Samothrace with one shippe; who easily was perfuaded to wast the King thence. With all secrecie the Kings money, as much as could be fo conveyed, was carried aboard by night; and the King himfelfe, with his wife and * children (if rather it were not true, that hee Plutareh in vit. had with him onely * Philip his elder fonne, who was enely by adoption his Limib.45. fonne, being his *brother by nature) with much adoc got out at a window by Limib.44.

40 a rope, and ouer a mudde wall. At his comming to the Sea fide, hee found no Organdes there: the Cretians had played a Cretian tricke, and was gone with the money to his owne home. So it began to waxe cleare day, whilest Perseus was fearching all along the shoare: who had stayed so long about this, that he might feare to be intercepted ere hee could recover the Temple. Hee ranne therefore amaine towards his lodging : and thinking it not fafe to enter it the common way, leaft he should be taken; hee hid himselfe in an obscure corner. His Pages miffing him, ranne vp and downe making enquirie; till Octanius made proclamation, That all the Kings Pages, and Micedonians whatfocuer, abiding with their maifter in Samothrace, should have their lives and libertie, with all to them 50 belonging, which they had either in that Isle, or at home in Macedon, conditionally, That they should presently yeeld themselves to the Romans. Hereupon they all came in. Likewife 10n, a Theffalonian, to whome the King had given the custodie of his children, deliuered them vp to Octavius. Lastly, Perfess himselfe, 2 11111 2 with his fonne Fhilip, accusing the gods of Samothrace, that had no better protested him; rendered himselfe, and made the Roman victorie complete. If hee had not trufted in those gods of Samothrace, but employed his whole care in the defence of Masedon, without other hope of lining, than of raigning therein; hee might well have brought this Warre to an happier end. Now, by dividing his cogitations, and pursuing at once, those contrarie hopes of sauing his Kingdome by armes, and himfelfe by flight; hee is become a spectacle of miserie, and one among the number of those Princes, that have beene wretched by their owne default. Hee was prefently fent away to Amylius; before whome hee fell to the ground to basely, that hee seemed thereby to dishonour the victorie ouer himfelfe, as gotten upon one of abject qualitie, and therefore the leffe to bee effecmed. Emylius vied to him the language of a gentle Victor : blaming him, though mildly, for having, with fo hoftile a minde, made Warre vpon the Romans. Hereto good answere might have beene returned by one of better spirit. As for Perfeus, he answered all with a fearefull silence. Hee was comforted with hope of life, or (as the Conful tearmed it) almost affurance; for that fuch was the mercie of the People of Rome. After these good words, being inuited to the Confuis Table, and respectively entreated, hee was committed prisoner to Such end had this Macedonian Warre, after foure yeares continuance : and 20 fuch end therewithall had the Kingdome of Macedon; the glorie whereof, that had fometime filled all parts of the World then knowne, was now translated vnto Rome.

GENTIVS, King of the Illyrians, taken by the Bout the same time, and with like celeritie, Anicius the Roman Prætor, who fucceeded vnto App. Claudius, had the like fuccesse against King Gentius the Illyrian. Gentius had an Armic of fifteene thousand; with which hee was at Lissus, readic to affish King Perfew as foone as the money should come, whereof hee had receiused onely tenne Talents. But Anicies arrested him on the way; sought with bim; ouercame him; and draue him into * Scodra. This Towne was verie defensible Linature, besides the helpe of fortification; and strongly manned with all the force of Illyria; which, affifted with the Kings prefence, made it feeme 40 vnpossible to be wonne, in anic not a verie long time. Yet Anicius was considen, in his late victorie; and therefore prefented his Armie before the walls. making countenance to give an affault. The Illyrians, that might eafily have desended themselves within the Towne, would needes iffue forth and fight. They were, it seemes, rather passionate than couragious: for they were beaten; and thereupon forthwith began amazedly to treat about yeelding. The King fent Embaffadours; by whome, at first, hee desired truce for three dayes, that he might deliberate concerning his estate. It ill became him, who had layed violent hand on the Roman Embaffadours, to have recourse to such mediation. But hee thought his owne fault pardonable, in as much as hitherto there was 50 no greater harme done by him, than the cashing of those Embassadours into prison; where they were still aline Haning obtained three dayes respite, hee passed up a River, within halfe a myle of the Roman Campe, into the Lake of Scodra, as it were to confult the more privately; though indeede, to hearken whether the report were true, that his brother Caragantius was comming to his rescue. Finding that no such helpe was toward, it is wonder, that he was so foolish as to returne into Scodra. He fent messengers craving accesse vnto the Prætor: before whome having lamented his follic past (which, excepting the dishonestie, was not so great as his follie present) he fell downe humbly, and yeelded himselfe to discretion. All the Townes of his Kingdome, together with his wife, children, brother, and friends, were prefently given vp. So this Warre ended in thirtie dayes; the People of Rome not knowing that it was begun; vntill 10 Perpennatione of the Embaffadors that had been imprisoned brought word from Anteins how all had paffed.

Ow began the Romans to Swell with the pride of their fortune; and to looke tyrannically upon those that had beene unmannerly toward them before, whileft the Warre with Perfew scemed full of danger. The Rhodian Embassadours were still at Rome, when the tidings of these victories were brought thither. Wherefore it was thought good to call them into the Senate, and bid them doe their errand againe. This they performed with bad grace; faving, That they were fent from Rhodes. to make an overture of peace; for a fmuch as it was thought, that this Warre was no leffe grieuous to the Romans themselves, than to the Macedonians and manie others: but that now they were verieglad, and in behalfe of the Rhodians did con-30 gratulate with the Senate and People of Rome, that it was ended much more happily than had beene expected. Hereto the Senate made answere, That the Rhodians had fent this Embassage to Rome, not for love to Rome, but in favour of the Macedonian; whose partizans they were, and should so be taken. By these threats, and the delire of fome (couetous of the charge) to have Warre proclaymed against Rhodes; the Embassadours were so affrighted, that in mourning apparrell, as humble suppliants, they went about the Citie; beseching all menespecially the great ones, to pardon their indifferetion, and not to prosecute them with vengeance for fome foolish words. This danger of Warre from Rome being knowne at Rhodes, all that had beene anie whit aperfe from the Romans in 40 the late Warre of Macedon, were eyther taken and condemned, or fent prisoners to Rome; excepting some that slew themselves for searc, whose goods also were confiscated. Yet this procured little grace; and lesse would have done, if olde M. Cato, a man by nature vehement, had not vetered a milde fentence, and advertifed the Senate, That in decreeing Warre against Rhodes, they should much dishonour themselves, and make it thought, that *rather the wealth of that Ci- * color in mat. tie, which they were greedie to ranfacke, than anie just cause, had moved them apad Salust, de thereto. This confideration, together with their good deferts in the Warres of line. Philip and Antiochia, helped well the Rhodians: among whome, none of anie marke remained aline, faue those that had beene of the Roman Faction. All 50 which notwithflanding, manie yeares paffed, ere, by importunate fuit, they could be admitted into the focietie of the Romans: a fauour which, till now, they had not effected, but thought themselves better without it, as equall

With the like, or greater feueritie, did the Romans make themselues terrible in all parts of Greece. Amylius himselfe made progresse through the Countrey; vifiting all the famous places therein, as for his pleafure; yet not forgetting to make them understand what power he had ouer them. More than fine hundred of the chiefe citizens in Demetrias were flaine at one time by those of the Roman faction. and with helpe of the Roman fouldiors. Others fled, or were banished, and their goods confiscated. Of which things, when complaint was made to the Conful: the redresse was such, as requited not the paines of making supplication. His friends, that is to fav, those which betrayed vnto the Romans the libertie of their Countrey, he featted like a King, with excelling cheare; yet fo, that hee had all things verie cheape in his Campe: an easie matter, since no man durst be backward in fending prouifions, nor fet on them the due price. Embaffadours likewife were fent from Rome; fome, to give order for fetling the efface of Macedon towards which they had more particular instruction from the Senate than was youll in fuch cases; and some, to visit the affaires of Greece. The Kingdome of Macedon was fet at libertie by Amylus and the Embaffadours, his affiftants, who had order therefore from the Senate. But this libertie was fuch as the Romans v fed to beflow. The best part of it was, That the Tribute which had been paved unto the Kings. was leffened by halfe. As for the reft; the Countrey was divided into foure parts, and they forbidden commerce one with the other. All the Nobilitie were fent captine into Italie, with their wines and children, as manie as were aboue fifteene yeares old. The ancient Lawes of the Countrey were abrogated; and new given by Emplius. Such mischiefe the Senate thought it better to doc at the first alteration of things in this Province, and in the time of Conquest, than otherwise to leaue anie inconvenience that should be worse in the future. But concerning the Greekes, that were not subjects to Rome; the things done to them could descrue no better name than meere tyrannie, yea and shamelesse perjurie; were it not so, that the familiar custome, among Princes and great Estates, of violating Leagues, doth make the Oathes of confederation feeme of no validitie. The Embaffadors that were fent to visit the Greekes, called before them all such men of note, from eneric quarter, as had anie way discouered an unserviceable disposition towards the Ro- 30 mans. These they sent to Rome; where they were made sure enough. Some of these had fent letters to Perseus, which fell at length into the Romans hands : and in that respect, though they were no subjects, yet wanted there not colour, for viling them as traytors, or at least as enemies. But since onely two men were beheaded. for having beene openly on the Macedonian fide; and fince it is confessed, that the good Patriotes were no leffe afflicted in this inquisition, than they that had fold themselves to the King: this manner of proceeding was inexcusable Tyrannie. With the Acheens these Embassadors were to deale more formally: not so much because that Commonwealth was strong (though this were to be regarded by them, having no Commission to make or denounce Warre) and like to proue vn- 40 tractable, if manifest wrong were offered; as for that there appeared no manner of figne, by letters, or otherwise, whereby anie one of the Acheans could be suspitiously charged to have held correspondence with the Macedonian. It was also so, that neither Calliorates, nor anic of his adherents, had beene employed by the Nation, in doing or offering their feruice to the Romans, but onely fuch as were the belt Patriotes. Yet would not therefore the Embaffadours neglect to vie the benefit of the time: wherein, fince all men trembled for feare of Rome, the feafon ferued fitly to ranke the Acheans with the rest. And hereto Callicrates was verte vigent: fearing, and procuring them to feare in behalfe of him and his friends, that if some sharpe order were not now taken, hee and his fellowes should be 50 made to pay for their mischieuous deuices, ere long time passed. So the Embassadours came among the Acheans: where one of them, in open affemblic of the Nation, spake as Callierates had before instructed him. Hee faid. That some of the chiefe among them, had with money and other meanes befriended Perfeus.

This being fo, he defired that all fuch men might be condemned, whom, after fentence giuen, he would name vnto them. After sentence giuen (cried out the whole affembly) what inflice were this? name them first, and let them answere; which if they cannot well doe, we will foone condemne them. Then faid the Roman boldly, that all their Prætors, as many as had led their armies, were guiltie of this crime. If this were true, faid Xenon, a temperate man, and consident in his innocence, then should I hkewise have beene friend to Perseus: whereof, if any man can accuse me, I shall throughly answere him, either here presently, or before the Senate at Rome. Vpon these words of Xenon the Embassador laid hold, and said that even so it were to the best way, for him and the rest to purge themselves before the Senate at Rome. Then began he to name others, and left not vntill he had cited aboue a thousand; willing them to appeare, and answere before the Senate. This might euen be tearmed the captiuitie of Greece; wherein fo many of the honestest and worthiest men were carried from home, for none other cause than their lone vnto their Country; to be punished according to the will of those, who could not endure, that vertue, and regard of the publike libertie, should dwell together in any of the Greekes. At their comming to Rome, they were all cast into prison : as men already condemned by the Acheans. Many Embassages were sent from Achaia (where it is to be wondred, that any such honest care of these innocent men could be remaining: since 20 honestie had beene thus punished as a vice, in so many of the worthiest among them) to informe the Senat, that these men were neither condemned by the Achsans, nor yet held to be offendours. But in flead of better answere it was pronounced; That the Senate thought it not expedient for the Countrie, that the femen should returne into Achaia. Neither could any folicitation of the Acheans, who never ceafed to importune the Senate for their libertie, preuaile at all; vntill after seuenteene vecres, fewer than thirtie of them were enlarged, of whom that wife and vertuous man Polybius, the great Historian was one. All the rest were either dead in prison; or having made offer to cscape, whether vpon the way before they came to Rome, or whether out of jayle, after that they were committed thereto, suffered death 30 as malefactors.

This was a gentle correction, in regard of what was done vpon the Epirots. For the Senate being delirous to preserve the Macedonian Treasure whole; yet withall, to gratifie the fouldiours, gaue order, That the whole Countrey of Epirus should be put to sacke. This was a barbarous and horrible crueltie; as also it was performed by Emylius with mischieuous subtiltie. Hauing taken leave of the Greekes, and of the Macedonians, with bidding them well to vie the libertie be-Rowed upon them by the people of Rome; he fent unto the Epirots for tenne of the · principall men out of cuerie Citie. These hee commaunded to deliver up all the gold and filter which they had; and fent along with them, into everie of their 40 Townes, what companies of men he thought convenient, as it were to fetch the money. But he gaue secret instruction to the Captaines, that vpon a certaine day by him appointed they should fall to sacke, everie one the Towne whereinto hee was fent. Thus in one day were threefcore and tenne Cities, all confederate with the Romans, spoyled by the Roman fouldiors; and belides other acts of hostilitie in a time of peace, a hundred and fiftie thousand of that Nation made flaues. It may be granted, that some of the Epiro's deserved punishment, as having favoured Perfem. But fince they, among this people, that were thought guiltie of this offence, yea, or but coldly affected to the Romans, had been alreadic fent into Italie, there to receive their due; and fince this Nation, in generall, was not onely at the present 50 in good obedience, but had, even in this warre, done good fervice to the Romans:

I hold this act fo wicked, that I should not beleeve it, had anic one Writer delivered the contrarie. But the truth being manifest by consent of all, it is the lesse meruallous, that GoD was pleased to make Amylius childlesse, euen in the glorie of his triumph, how great focuer otherwise his vertues were.

CHAP. 6. S.M. of the Historie of the World.

In fuch manner dealt the Romans, after their victoric, with the Greekes and Macedanians. How terrible they were to other Kingdomes abroad; it will appeare by the efficacie of an Embaffage fent from them to Antiochus: whereof before we speake, we must speake somewhat of Amiochus his foregoers, of himselfe, and of his affaires about which these Embassadors came.

The Warre of ANTIOCH'V & upon Egypt, brought to end by the Roman Embaladours.

Demetrius Soler; and one daughter, Cleapatra, whom he had given in marriage to NTIOCHVS the Great, after his peace with the Romans, did nothing that was memorable in the short time following of his raign and life. He died the fix and thirtieth yeare after he had worne a Crown, and in the feuenteenth or eighteenth of Piolemie Epiphanes: while he attempted to rob the Temple of Bel, or (according to Instine ) of Inpiter. He left behinde him three fonnes, Selencus Philopator, Antiochus Epiphanes.

Piolemie Epiphanes, King of Agypt. Seleucus the fourth of that name, and the el- 20 dest of Antiochus his sonnes; raigned in Syria twelue yeares, according to Eusebius, Appian, and Sulpitius: though Infephius give him but feven. A Prince, who as hee was flouthful by nature, fo the great loffe which his father Antiochus had received: tooke from him the meanes of managing any great affaire. Of him, about three hundred yeares before his birth, Daniel gaue this judgement, Et flabit in loco eius vilifimus & indignus decore regie. And in his place (speaking of Antiochus the father of this man) flatt up a vilde perfon, unworthy the honor of a King. Vnder this Selencis, those things were done which are spoken of Onias the High Priest, in these words, and other to the same effect. What time as the holy Citie was inhabited with all peace, because of the godline fe of ONIA's the Priest, it came to passe, that even the King 30 did honor the place, and garnifhed the Temple with great gifts. And all that is written in the third Chapter of the second of Macchabees, of Simon of Benjamin, who by A. pollonius betrayed the treasures of the Temple: and of Heliodorus fent by the King tofeize them; of his miraculous striking by God; and his recovery at the prayers of Oniss; of the Kings death, and of his successor Antiochiss Epiphenes. It is therefore from the raigne of this King, that the bookes of the Machabees take broinning. Which bookes feeme not to be deliuered by one and the same hand. For the first booke, although it touch vpon Alexander the Great, yet it hath nothing else of his florie, nor of the acts of his fuccessors, till the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. the brother and successour of this Seleucus; from whom downward to the death 40 of Simon Machabeus (who died in the hundred threefcore and feuenteenth yeare of the Greekes in Syria) that first book treateth. The Author of the second book, although he take the Storic fomewhat further off, by way of a Proæme, yet hee endeth with the hundred and one and fiftieth yeare of the Gracian raigne, and with the death of Areanor flaine by Judas: remembring in the fourth Chapter the prachile of Isfon, the brother of Onias, who after the death of Seleucus, prevailed with Antiochus Epiphanes, his successor for the Priesthood. It is also held by Jansenius and Super Edife 5. other grave Writers, that it was in the time of this Onlas, that Arius King of the Spartans fent Embaffadors to the Jewes, as to their brothers and kinfmen. Which intelligence betweene them and the Greekes, Jonathan the brother and fucceffor of 50 Indus, remembreth in the Preamble of that Epiftle, which he himselfe directed to the people of Sparta by Numenius and Antipater his Embassadors, whom hee emploved at the fame time to the Senate of Rome; repeating also the former Letters word by word, which Arius had fent to Onias the High Priest, whereto Iosephus addes, that the name of the Lacedamonian Embaffador was Demoteles, and that the Letters had a fquare Volume, and were fealed with an Eagle holding a Dragon in her clawes.

Now to this Seleucus, the fourth of that name, succeeded Antiochus Epiphanes, in the hundred and seuen and thirtieth yeare of the Greekes in Syrie. Hee was the second sonne of the Great Antiochus: and he obtained his Kingdome by procuring the death of the King his brother; which also hee vsurped from his brothers

10 had beene about feuen yeares King of Agypt.

Ptolemic Epiphanes, the father of this King Philometor, had raigned in Agypt foure and twentie yeares; in great quiet, but doing little or nothing that was memorable. Philip of Mscedon, and the great Antiochus, had agreed to divide his Kingdome between them, whilest he was a childe. But they found such other busines, ere long, with the Romans, as made them give oner their vniust purpose; especially Antiochus, who gaue, with his daughter in marriage, vnto this Ptolemie, the Proninces of Coelestria, Phanice, and Indes, which he had wound by his victorie ouer Scopas, that was Generall of the Agyptian forces in those parts. Neuerthelesse, Ptolemie adhered to the Romans: whereby he lived in the greater fecuritie. Hee left 20 behind him two fons; this Ptolemie Philometor, and Ptolemie Phylcon, with a daughter, Cleopatra. Cleopatra was wife to the elder of her brethren, and after his death to the yonger, by whom the was cast off, and her daughter taken in her stead. Such

Ptolemie Philometor, fo called (that is, the louer of his mother) by a bitter nickname, because he slew her, fell into hatred with his subjects, and was like to be chafed out of his kingdome: his yonger brother being fet vp against him. Physcon hauing a strong partie, got possession of Alexandria; and Philometor held himselfe in Memphis, crauing succour of King Antiochus his vncle. Hereof Antiochus was glad: who vnder colour to take vpon him the protection of the yong Prince, fought by 30 all meanes possible to possesse himselfe of that kingdome. He sent Apollonius the fonne of Mnestheus Embassador into Azypt, and vnder colour to affist the Kings Coronation, hee gaue him instructions to perswade the Gouernours of the yong King Philometer, to deliuer the King his Nephew with the principall places of that kingdome into his hands; pretending an extraordinarie care and delire of his Nephewes fafetie and well doing. And the better to answere all argument to the contrarie, he prepared a forcible armieto attend him. Thus came he alongst the coast of Syria, to Joppe, and from thence on the fudden he turned himselfe towards Iernfalem, where by Iafon the Priest (a Chaplin sit for such a Patron) hee was with all 2.Mar.4. pompe and folemnitie received into the Citie. For though lately, in the time of Se-

40 lenens, the brother and predecessour of Epiphanes, that impious traytor Simon of Macanaga, the Tribe of Beniamin, ruler of the Temple, when he would have delivered the treasures thereof to Apollonius Gouernor of Calesyria and Phanicia, was disappointed of his wicked purpose by miracle from heaven; the said Apollonius being stroken by the Angell of God, and recovering againe at the prayer of Onias: yet fufficed not this example to terrifie others from the like vngodly practifes. Presently vpon the death of Seleneus, this Iason, the brother of Onias, seeking to supplant his brother, and to obtaine the Prichhood for himselfe, offered vnto the King three hundred and threescore talents of filner, with other rents and summes of money. Machines.

So he got his defire, though he not long enjoyed it. 50 This naughtic dealing of Islon, and his being ouer-reached by another, in the fame kinde, calls to minde a by-word taken vp among the Acheans, when as that mischieuous Callierates, who had beene too hard for all worthic and vertuous men, was beaten at his owne weapon, by one of his owne condition. It went

And onen thus fell it out with Ialon: who within three yeares after, was betrayed, and overbidden by Menelaus the brother of Simon, that for three hundred talents more obtained the Priefthood for himselfe: Islon thereupon being forced to flie from lerufalem, and to hide himselfe among the Ammonites.

From Jerusalem, Antiochus marched into Phanicia, to augment the numbers of his men of warre, and to prepare a Fleet for his expedition into Agypt; with which, Macrical and with a mightie armie of land forces. Hee went about to raigne oner Agypt, that he might have the dominion of two Realmes, and entred Egypt with a mightie companie, with Chariots and Elephants, with Horfemen, and with a great Manie, and moved warre against Ptolemaves King of Egypt, but Ptolemaevs was afraid of him and sled, and many were wounded to death. He wanne many firong Cities, and took away the floiles of the Dangell. V.14. Land of Egypt. Thus was fulfilled the Prophecie of DANIEL. He shall enter into the quiet and plentifull Provinces, and he fall doe that which his Fathers have not done nor 20 his Fathers Fathers. Neuer indeed had any of the Kings of Syria fo great a victorie ouer the Emptians, nor tooke from them fo great riches. For hee gaue a notable ouerthrow to the Captaines of Ptolemie, betweene Pelusium and the hill Cassus, after which he entered and fackt the greatest and richest of all the Cities of Agrot. Alexandria excepted, which he could not force. In conclusion, after that A N T 10. CHyshad mitten Egypt, he turned againe and went up towards Ifrael and Ierusalem with a mightie people, and entered proudly into the Santiuarie, and tooke away the golden Altar, and the Candlellicke for the light, and all the Instruments thereof, and the table of the Shew-bread, and the powring Veffels and the Bowles, and the golden Befons, and the Vaile, and the Crownes, and the golden Apparell. He tooke alfo the Silver, and the Gold, and the 30 precious Jewels, and the feeret Treasures; and when he had taken away all, he departed into bis owne Land, after he had murdered many men.

It was about the beginning of the Macedonian warre, that Antiochus tooke in hand this Egyptian bulinesse. At what time he first laid claime to Calefyria; justifying his title by * the fame allegations which his father had made; and stiffely auerring, that this Prouince had not been configned ouer to the Egyptian, or given in dowrie with Cleopatra. Easie it was to approue his right vnto that which he had alreadie gotten, when he was in a faire way to get all Egypt. The Achaans, Rhodidians, Athenians, and other of the Greekes, preffed him, by feuerall Embaffages, to fome good conclusion. But his answere was ; that if the Alexandrians could be con- 40 tented to receive their King his Nephew Philometer, the elder brother of the Ptolemies, then should the warre be presently at an end; otherwise not. Yet when hee faw, that it was an hard peece of worke to take Alexandria by force: he thought it better to let the two brothers confume themselves with intestine warre, than by the terrour of his armes, threatning destruction vnto both of them, to put into them any defire of comming to agreement. He therefore withdrew his forces for the prefent: leaving the Ptolemies in very weake effate; the yonger, almost ruinated by his invalion; the elder hated and for faken by his people.

But how weake focuer these Egyptians were, their hatred was thought to bee so firong, that Antiochus might leaue them to the profecution thereof; and follow, at 50 good leafure his other bufineffe at Ierufalem or ellewhere. So after the facke of Ie-rusalem, he rested him a while at Antioch; and then made a journey into Cilicia, to Suppresse the Rebellion of the Thurstans and other in those parts, who had bin giuen, as it were, by way of dowrie, to a Concubine of the Kings, called Antiochis For

Gouernour

Governour of Syria in his absence, he left one Andronicus, a man of great authoritie about him. In the meane while Menelaus the brother of Simon, the same who had thrust Iason out of the Priesthood, and promised the King three hundred talents for an Income, comitting the charge of the Priefthood to his brother Lylimachus, ftole certaine vessels of gold out of the Temple : whereof he presented a part to Androniess the Kings Lieutenant, and fold the rest at Tyre, and other Cities adjoyning. This he did, as it feemeth, to advance the payment of the three hundred talents promifed; the fame being now by Sostratus eagerly demanded. Hereof when Onias the Prieft (formerly dispossessed by Iason) had certaine knowledge, being moved 10 with zeale, and deteffing the facriledge of Menelaus, hee reproved him for it; and fearing his reuenge, he withdrew himfelfe into a Sanctuarie at Daphne.

Daphne was a place of delight adjoyning as a fuburb to Antioch. In compasse it had about ten miles: wherin were the Temples of Apollo and Diana, with a Groue, fweet Springs, banquetting places, and the like; which were wholly, in a manner, abused to luit, and other such voluptuousnesse. Whether it were well done of oniss, to commit himselfe to the protection of Apollo and Disna, or to claime priviledge, from the holines of a ground confectated to any of the Heathen gods, I will not fland to discourse. Only I say for mine owne opinion: that the inconucuience is far leffe, to hold this book as Apocryphall; than to judge this fearefull shift which

20 Onias (though a vertuous man) made for his life, either commendable, or allowable, as the booke feemes to doe. As for this refuge, it could not faue the life of the poore old man: for Menelavs taking Andronicvs apart, prayed him to flay Maclib.2. ca.4. ONIAS. Sowhen he came to ONIAS, he counfelled him craftily, giving him his right hand with an oath, and perswading him to come out of the Santhuarie; so he slew him incontinently, without any regard of righteousnesse. Hereof when complaint was made to Antiochus after his returne out of Cilicia, Hee tooke away ANDRONICVS his gurment of purple, and rent his clouthes, and commanded him to be led throughout the City, and in the same place where hee had committed the wicked nesse against On 1 As, hee was Macacato 38 flaine as a murderer. In taking revenge of this innocent mans death, I should have

30 thought that this wicked King had once in his life-time done Iustice. But presently after this at the fuite of one Ptolemie, a traytor to Ptolemie Philometor, he condemned innocent ment to death; who justly complained against Menelaus, and his brother Lyfimschus, for a fecond robbing of the Temple, and carrying thence the Veffels of gold remaining. Hereby it is manifest, that he was guided by his owne outragious will, and not by any regard of justice: since hereuenged the death of Onias, vet flew those that were in the same cause with Onias, Who had they told their cause, Versage, yea, before the Scythians, they should have beene heard as innocent. By reason of such his vofteadineffe, this king was commonly tearmed Epimanes, that is, madde, in stead of Epiphanes, which signifieth Noble or Illustrious. After this, Antiochus made preparation for a second voyage into Agypt, and then Mas 2.6.5. 2.1. were there feen throughout all the Citie of Jerusalem, fortie dayes long, hor femen running in the aire with Robes of gold, and as bands of Spearemen, and as troopes of Horsemen (et in aray, incountring and courfing one against another. Of these prodigious signes, or rather forewarnings of Gop, all Histories have delivered vs, some more, some lesse. Before the destruction of Ierusalem by Velpasian, a starre in the forme of a sword appeared in the Heauens directly over the Citie after which there followed a flaughterlike vnto this of Epiphanes, though farre greater. In the Cymbrian warres, Pliny Plindba. 1.57. tells vs that Armies were feene fighting in the aire from the morning till the cue-

Of these and the like prodigious signes, Vipera hath Vipera de Pris collected many, and very remarkable. But this one feemeth to me the most memo- co & facto inrable, because the most notorious. All men know that in the Emperour Nero, the situito.

When Lisia was first married to Augustus, an Eagle let fall into her armes a white Saction, Galba. Henne, holding a Lawrell braunch in her mouth. Linia caused this Henne to be carefully nourilhed, and the Lawrell braunch to be planted: Of the Henne came a faire encrease of white Poultrie, and from the little braunch there sprang vp in time a Groue of Lawrell: fo that afterwards, in all Triumphs, the Conquerors did yfe to carrie in their hands a braunch of Bayes taken out of this Groue; and after the Triumphs ended, to fet it againe in the same ground: which braunches were observed, when they happened to wither, to foreshew the death of those 10 persons who carried them in triumph. And in the last yeare of Nero, all the broodes of the white Hennes died, and the whole Groue of Bayes withered at once. Moreover, the heads of all the Cafars Statues, and the Scepter placed in Magnifus his hand, were firicken downe with lightning. That the lewes did not thinke such strange signes to be vnworthic of regard; it appeares by their calling vpon G o D, and praying, that these tokens might turne to good.

Now, as the first voyage of Antiochus into Agipt was occasioned by discord of the two brethren therein raigning: fo was his fecond Expedition caused by their good agreement. For the elder Ptolemie being left in Memphis, not firong enough to force his brother, who had defended Alexandria against all the power 20 of their vncle; thought it the best way to seeke entrance into that royall Citie, rather by perfugion than by armes. Phylon had not as yet forgotten the terrour of the former flege; the Alexandrines though they loued not Philometer, yet loued they worse to live in scarcitic of victuals (which was alreadie great among them, and like to grow extreame) fince nothing was brought in from the Countrey; and the friends of the younger brother faw no likelyhood of good iffue to be hoped for without reconciliation. These good helpes, and aboue all these, the louing disposition of Cleopatra, who then was in Alexandria, encouraged Philometor in his purpose. But that which made him carnellly desirous to accomplish it, was the feare wherein he flood of his vncie. For though Antiechus were gone out 30 of Agypt with his armie; yet had he left behinde him a strong garrison in Pelufiam; retaining that Citic, which was the Key of Agypt, to his owne vie. This consideration wrought also with Physion, and with those that were about him; so as by the vehement mediation of Cleopatra their sister, the two brethren made an end of all quarrels.

When the newes of this accord was brought to Antiochus, hee was greatly enraged: for notwith@anding that hee had pretended no other thing than the effabijihment of the King Philometer his nephew, and a meaning to subject his yonger brother vnto him, which he gaue in answere to all Embassadours; yet he now prepared to make sharpe warre vpon them both. And to that end hee presently fur- 40 nished and sent out his Nauie towards Cyprus, and drew his Land Armie into Caleforis, readie to enter Leppt the Spring following. When he was on his way as farre as Rhinocornera, he met with Embaffadors fent from Ptolemie. Their errand was partly to yeeld thankes to Antiochus for the chablishing of Philometor in his Kingdome; partly to beseech him, That he would rather be pleased to signific what hee required to have done in Agypt, which should be performed, than to enter it as an enemie with fo puillant an Armie. But Antiochus returned this short answere, That he would neither call backe his Fleet, nor withdraw his Armie, vpon anie other condition, than that Ptolemie frould furrender into his hands, together with the Citie of Pelusiam, the whole Territoric thereto belonging: and that 50 hee should also abandon and sease viito him the life of Cyprus, with all the right that he had vnto either of them for euer. For answere vnto these demaunds, hee fet downe a day certaine, and a fhort one. Which being come and paft, without anie accord made, the Syrian Fleet entred Nilus, and recourred as well those places which appertained to Ptolemie in Arabia, as in Agypt it selfe; for Memphis and all about it received Antiochus, being vnable to refut him. The King having now no stoppe in his way to Alexandria; passed on thitherwards by easie

CHAP. 6. 8:12.

Of all these troubles past, as well as of the present danger wherein Agypt flood; the Romans had notice long agoe. But they found, or were contented to finde, little reason for them to entermeddle therein. For it was a civill warre: and wherein Antiochus seemed to take part with the juster cause. Yet they gaue fignification, that it would be much displeasing vnto them, to have the Kingdome of Agypt taken from the rightfull owners. More they could not, or would not doc; being troubled with Per/ess; and therefore loath to prouoke Antiochus too farre. Neuertheleffe, the Egyptian Kings being reconciled, and standing joyntly in neede of helpe against their Vncle, who prepared and made open warre against them both: it was to bee expected, that not onely the Romans, but many of the Greekes, as being thereto obliged by notable benefits, thould arme in defence of their Kingdome. Rome had beene lustained with food from Agypt, in the warre of Hannibal; when Italy lying waste, had neither corne, nor money wherewith to buy sufficient store. By helpe of the Egyptian, had Aratus laid the foundation of that greatnesse, whereto the Acheans attained. And by the like helpe, had Rhodes beene defended against Demetrius Polioreetes. Neither were these friendly turnes, which that bountifull house of the Ptolemies had done for fundrie people abroad, ill followed or feconded, by other as bad in requitall : but with continuance of sutable beneficence, from time to time encreased. Wherefore the two brothers fent abroad confidently for ayde: especially to the Rhodians and Acheans, who seemed most able to give it effectually. To the Romans, Physicon and Cleopatra had fent, a yeare fince : but their Embaffadours lay ftill in Rome. Of the Achesms they defired in particular, that Ligeortas the braue warriour might be fent to them as Generall of all the Auxiliaries, and his sonne Polybius Generall of the Horse. Hereunto the Acheans readily condescended : and would immediatly 20 haue made performance; if Callierates had not interposed his mischieuous arte. Hee, whether feeking occasion to vaunte his obsequiousnesse to the Romans; or much rather enuying those Noble Captaines, whose service the Kings desired; withflood the common voice; which was, That their Nation should, not with such fmall numbers as were requefted, but with all their power, be aiding vnto the Ptolenies. For it was not now (hee faid) convenient time to entangle themselves in any fuch bufinesse, as might make them the lesse able to yeeld vnto the Romans what helpe focuer should be required in the Macedonian warre. And in this fentence, hee with those of his faction oblimately persisted; terrifying others with bigge words, as it were in behalfe of the Romans. But Polybius affirmed, that Martius the late Conful had fignified unto him, that the Romans were past all need of helpe: adding further, that a thousand foote, and two hundred horse, might well bee spared, to the ayde of their benefactours, the Agyptian Kings, without disabling their Nation to performe any service to the Romans; for as much as the Acheans could, without trouble, raise thirtie or fortie thousand souldiours. All this not with flanding, the resolution was deferred from one meeting to another; and finally broken, by the violence of Callierates. For when it was thought that the Decree should have passed; he brought into the Theater where the assembly was held, a Messenger with letters from Martius; whereby the Acheans were desired to conforme themselves to the Roman Senate, and to labour, as the Senate had 50 done, by fending Embassadors, to set Azypt in peace. This was an aduice against all reason. For the Senate had indeed sent Embassadours to make peace; but as in a time of greater bulineffe elfewhere, with fuch milde words, that nothing was effeeted. Wherefore it was not likely, that the Acheans should doe any good in the Tetttt fame kinde. Yet Polybius and his friends durft not gaine-fay the Roman Councell: which had force of an injunction. So the Kings were left in much diffresse; disappointed of their expectation. But within a while was Perfeus ouercome: and then might the Embassador sent from the Roman Senate, performe as much as any Armie could haue done.

Audience had beene lately given by the Senate, vnto those Embassadors of Phylcon and Cleopatra; which having stayed more then a whole years in the Citie. brought nothing of their businesse to essect untill now. The Embassadours deliuered their message in the name of those that had sent them : though it concerned (which perhaps they knew not) Philometor, no leffe than his brother 10 and fifter.

In this Embassage of Ptolemie, now requesting helpe from Rome; appeared a notable change of his fortune, from such as it had bin before three or foure yeares last past. For in the beginning of these his troubles, which began with the Macedoman warre; either he, or Euleus and Leneus (vpon whom the blame was afterwards laid) which had the government of him, thought his affaires in such good estate, that not only he determined to fet vpon Antiochus, for Calefyria; but would have interposed himselfe betweene the Romans and Perfeus, as a competent Athitrator; though it fell out well, that his Embaffador was by a friend perswaded, to forget that point of his errand. From these high thoughts, he fell on the sudden, by the rebellion of his brother and subjects, to live under protection of the same Antiochw. And now at such time as by attonement with his brother and subjects, hee might haue seemed to stand in no need of such protestion; he hath remaining none other helpe whereby to faue both his Kingdome and life, than what can be obtained by their intercession which were employed against him. This miserable condition of him, his brother and fifter, shewed it selfecuen in the habit of those Embassadors. They were poorely cladde; the haire of their heads and beards ouer-growne, as was their manner in time of affliction; and they carried in their hands, branches of Oliue. Thus they entered into the Senate; and there fell groueling and profirate vpon the floare. Their garments were not so meane and mournefull, nor their 30 lookes and countenances fo fad and dejected, but that their speech was than either of the other farre more lamentable. For having told in what danger their King and Countrey flood; they made a pitifull and grieuous complaint vnto the Senate. befeeching them to have compassion of their estate, and of their Princes, who had alwayes remained friendly and faithfull to the Romans. They faid that the people of Rome had so much heretofore fauoured this Antiochus in particular, and were of fuch account and authoritic, with all other Kings and Nations; as if they pleased but to send their Embassadours, and let Antiochus know, that the Senate was offended with his undertaking upon the King their Confederate; then would he presently raise his siege from before Alexandria, and withdraw his Armie out 40 of Agypt into Syria. But that if the Senate protracted any time or vsed any delav; then should Ptolemie and Cleopatra be shortly driven out of their Realmes, and make repaire to Rome, with shamefull dishonor to the Senate and people thereof, in that, in the extreame dangers of all their fortunes, they had not vouchfafed to relieue them.

The Lords of the Senate moued with compassion, sent incontinently C. Popilius Lenus, C. Decimius, and A. Hostilius, as Embassadours, to determine and end the warre between those Kings. In commission they had first to finde King Ptolemie, and then Antiochus, and to let them both understand, that unlesse they furceassed and gaue over Armes, they would take that King no more for a friend to 50 the Senate and people of Rome, whom they found obstinate or vsing delay. So these Romans, together with the Alexandrine Embassadours, tooke their leave, and went onward their way within three dayes after.

Whilest

Whilest Popilius and his fellowes were on their way toward . Egypt, Antiochus had transported his Armie ouer Lusine, some fortie myles from Alexandria, So neare was hee to the end of his journey, when the Roman Embassadors met him. After greeting and falutations at their first encounter, Antiochia offered his right hand to Populius: but Populius filled it with a Role of paper; willing him to reade those Mandates of the Senate, before hee did anie thing else. Antischus did fo; and having a little while confidered of the bufineffe, hee tolde Popilius, That hee would aduife with his friends, and then give the Embaffadours their answere. But Popilius, according to his ordinarie blunt manner of speech, which hee had by nature, made a Circle about the King with a Rodde which he held in his hand, willing him to make him fuch an answere as hee might report to the Senate, before hee moued out of that Circle. The King aftonished at this fo rude and violent a Commaundement, after hee had flayed and pawfed a while, I will be content (quoth he) to doe what focuer the Senate shall ordaine, Then Popilius gaue vnto the King his hand, as to a Friend and Allie of the Romans.

Thus Intiochus departed out of Egypt, without anic good issue of his costly Expedition; even in fuch manner as * Daniel had prophefied long before: Dan. cap. 11. yea, fulfilling eueric particular circumftance, both of returning, and of doing mif-20 chiefe to Ierusalem after his returne; like as if these things had rather beene historified than fore-told by the Prophet. As for the Roman Embaffadours, they flayed a while, and fetled the Kingdome of Agypt, leaning it vnto the elder brother, and appointing the younger to raigne over Cyrene. This done, they departed towards Cyprus; which they left, as it had beene, in the power of the Egyptian, having first sent away Antiochus Fleet, which had alreadie ginen an ouerthrow to the Egyptian shippes.

Y this peremptoric demeanour of Popilius, in doing his Message, and by the readic obedience of King Antiochus to the will of the Senate; wee may perceive how terrible the Romans were growne, through their conquest of Macedon. The same Popilius had been Senate; wee may perceive how terms.

through their conqueft of Macedon. The fame Popilius has used well contented, a yeare before this, to lay afide the roughness of well-contented, a yeare before this, to lay afide the roughness of Actalians and to give good language to the Achaens and Ætelians and to give good language to the Achaens and Ætelians.

leffe power than the King Antiochus . Likewife , Antiochus had with good wordes, and no more than good wordes, dismissed other Embassadours which came from Rome, in fuch fort, as they complained not, much leife vied anie menacing tearmes, though hee performed nothing of their requeft. But now the case was altered. So found other Kings as well as Antiochus.

50 Eumenes fent to Rome his brother Attalus, to gratulate the victorie ouer Perfeus, and to crave helpe or countenance of the Senate against the Gallogreekes, which molested him. Verie welcome was Attalus, and louingly entertained by most of the Senatours: who bad him be consident, and request of the Senate his brothers Kingdome for himselfe; for it should surely be given him. These hopefull promifes tickled Attalus with fuch ambition, that hee eyther approued. or feemed to approue the motion. But his honest nature was soone reclaymed by the faithfull counfaile of Stratius a Physician; whome Eumenes had fent to Rome of purpose to keepe his brother vpright. So, when hee came into the Senate, hee delinered the errand about which hee had beene fent; recounted his owne fernices done to the Romans in the late Warre, * wherewithall he forgat not to make of his brother as good mention as he could: and finally requefted. That the Townes of Anus and Maronea might be bellowed voon himselfe. * Bv his omitting to fue for his brothers Kingdome, the Senate conceived opinion, To that he meant to craue another day of audience for that businesse alone. Wherefore, to make him understand how gracious hee was, they not onely graunted all his defire; but in the prefents which they gaue to him (as was their custome to Embaffadours that came with an acceptable meffage) they vied fingular magnificence. Neuertheleffe, Attalus tooke no notice of their meaning; but went his way, contented with what they had alreadic graunted. This did so highly difplease the Senate, that whilest hee was yet in Italie, they gaue order for the libertie of Anus and Maronea: thereby making vneffectuall their promise; which otherwise they could not without shame, renoke. And as for the Gallogreekes, which were about to inuade the Kingdome of Pergamus; they fent Embaffa- 20 dours to them, with fuch instructions, as rather encouraged than hindered them in their purpose. The displeasure of the Senate beeing so manifest: Eumenes thought it worthie of his labour to make another voyage to Rome. Hee might well blame the follie of his fecond voyage thither, for this necessitie of the third: fince, by his malice to Perfeus, hee had layed open unto these ambitious Potentates the way to his owne dores. No fooner was he come into Italie, than the Senate was readie to fend him going. It was not thought expedient to vie him as an enemie, that came to visit them in loue: neyther could they, in so doing, haue auoided the note of fingular inconstancie; and to entertaine him as a friend, was more than their hatred to him, for his ingratitude, as they deemed it, would per- 30 mit. Wherefore they made a Decree, That no King should be suffered to come to Rome; and by vertue thereof fent him home, without expence of much further complement.

Prusias King of Bithynia had beene at Rome somewhat before; where he was welcommed after a better falhion. Hee had learned to behaue himfelfe as humbly as the proud Romans could expect or defire. For entring into the Senate, hee lay downe, and killed the threshold, calling the Fathers his gods and sauiours: as also hee yied to weare a Cappe, after the manner of flaues newly manumifed, professing himselfe an entranchised bondman of the People of Rome. He was indeede naturally a flaue, and one that by fuch abject flatterie kept himselfe 40 fafe; though doing otherwife greater mischiefe than anic wherewith Perseus had beene charged. His errand was, belides matter of complement, to commend vnto the Senate the care of his sonne Wicomedes, whome he brought with him to Rome, there to receive education. Further petition he made, to have fome Townes added to his Kingdome: whereto, because the graunt would have beene vnjust hee received a cold answere. But concerning the Wardship of his sonne, it was undertaken by the Senate: which, vaunting of the pleasure lately done to Agypt, in freeing it from Antiochus, willed him thereby to confider, what effectuall protection the Romans gaue vnto the children of Kings, that were to their patronage commended.

But aboue all other Kings, Mafaniffa held his credit with the Romans good. His quarrels were endlesse with the Carthaginians: which made the friendship of the Romans to him the more assured. In all controuersies they gave judgement on his side: and whereas hee had inuaded the Countrey of Emporia, holding the Lands, but vnable to winne the Townes; the Romans (though at first they could finde no pretext, whereby to countenance him in this oppression) compelled finally the Curthsginians both to let goe all their hold, and to pay sine hundred Talents to the Namidian, for having hindered him of his due so long. Now indeed had Rome good leysure to deusle you the ruine of Carthage: after which, the race of Majanish himselie was shortly by them rooted yp. But heereof the olde King neuer dreamed. Hee sent to Rome one of his sonnes, to congratulate the victorie ouer Persons, and offered to come this to their himselie, there to sacrifice for joy vnto Jupiter in the Capitol. His good will was louingly accepted; his sonne rewarded; and hee entreated to say

CHAP. 6. S.12. of the Historie of the World.

Coys the Thracian fent Embassadours, to excuse himselse touching the aide by him guen to Perseus, for that the Macedourn had him bound by hosses; and to entereat, That his sonne, which was taken with the children of Perseus, might be set at libertie for convenient ransome. His excuse was not taken; since hee had voluntarily obliged himselse to Perseus, by guing hosses, without needs him to be the machine free; with admonition, to carrie himselse better toward the Romans in time following. His King-20 done lay betweene Macedour and some barbarous Nations; in which respect, it was evod to hold him in faire tearmes.

As for those whappie Kings, Perseus and Genius, they were ledde through Rows, with their children and triends, in the Triumphs of Emplius and Onterius. Perseus had often made fuite to Emplius, that hee might not be put to such disgrace: but hee still received one skornefull answere, That it lay in his owne power to preuent it; whereby was meant, that hee might kill himselfee. And surely, had hee not hoped for greater mercie than hee sound, hee would rather have sought his death in Asaesson, than have beene beholding to the courtesse of his infolent enomies for a wretched hie. The issue of the Roman 30 elemencie, whereos Emplius had given him hope, was no better than this: After that hee, and his fellow King, had beene ledde in claynes through the streets, before the Charlotts of their triumphing Vistors, they were committed.

ted to prison, wherein they remayned without hope of release. It was the manner, that when the Triumpher turned his Chariot vp towards the Capital, there to doe sacrifice, hee should command the capitues to be had away to prison, and there put to death: so as the honour of the Vanquisher, and miferie of those that were ourcome, might be both together at the vtmost. This last sentence of death was remitted into Person yet set so, that hee had little joy of his life; but eyther famished himselfe, or (for it is diuersly reported) 40 was kept watching perforce by those that had him in custodie; and so died for want of sleepe. Of his sonnes, two died; it is vncertaine how. The youngest called Ackander (onely in name like vnto the Great, though destined sometimes perhaps by his father, vnto the fortunes of the Great) became a loyner, or Turner, or, at his best preferement, a Serube vnder the Roman Officers. In such poucretie ended the Royall House of Macedon: and it ended on the suddaine; though some eightscore yeares after the death of that Monarch, vnto whose ambition this whole Earth seemed too narrow.

If Perfus had knowne it before, that his owne fonne fhould one day bee compelled to earne his Jiuing by handie-worke, in a painefull Occupation; it is 50 like, that he would not, as in a wantonneffe of Soueraignetic, haue commanded those poore men to be flaine, which had recoured his treasures ont of the sea, by their skill in the seat of diving. He would rather have been veriegentle, and would haue considered, that the greatest oppressions, and the most vudertoden wretches, are all fubject wnto One high Power, gouerning all alike with absolute command.

But such is our vnhappinesse; in stead of that blessed counsaile, Doe as yee would be done vnto, a fentence teaching all moderation, and pointing out the way to felicitie; wee entertaine that arrogant thought, I will be like to the Most High: that is, I will doe what shall please my selfe. One bath said truly:

Euen they that have no murdrous will. Would have it in their power to kill.

All, or the most, have a vaine desire of abilitie to doe evill without controlle: which is a dangerous temptation vnto the performance. Go p, who best can judge what is expedient, hath graunted fuch power to verie few: among whome alfo, verie few there are, that vie it not to their owne hurt. For who fees not, that a Prince, by racking his Soueraigne authoritie to the vtmoft extent, enableth (befides the danger to his owne person) some one of his owne somes or nephewes to root up all his progenie? Shall not manie excellent Princes, not with standing their brotherhood, or other neareneffe in bloud, be driven to flatter the Wife, the Minion, or perhaps the Harlot, that gouernes one, the most vinworthic of his whole 20 house, yet raigning ouerall? The vntimely death of manie Princes, which could not humble themselves to such flatterie; and the common practise of the Turkish Emperours, to murder all their brethren, without expecting till they offend; are too good proofes hereof. Hereto may be added, That the heire of the same Roger Mortimer, who murdered most traiterously and barbarously King Edward the fecond; was, by reason of a marriage, proclaimed, in time not long after sollowing, heire apparent to the Crowne of England: which had he obtained, then had all the power of Edward fallen into the race of his mortall enemie, to exercise the fame upon the Line of that unhappie King. Such examples of the inflabilitie whereto all mortall affaires are subject; as they teach moderation, and admonish 30 the transitorie Gods of Kingdomes, not to authorize, by wicked precedents, the cuill that may fall on their owne posteritie: so doe they necessarily make vs vnderstand, how happie that Countrie is, which hath obtained a King able to conceine

Chap. 3. 5.4.

Now, concerning the Triumph of L. Amylius Paulus; it was in all points like vnto that of T. Quintius Flaminius: though farre more glorious, in regard of the Kings owne person, that was ledde along therein, as part of his owne spoyles; and in regard likewife both of the Conquest and of the Bootie. So great was the 40 quantitie of Gold and Silver carried by Paulus into the Roman Treasurie, that from thenceforth, vntill the civile Warres, which followed vpon the death of Iulius C.efar, the Estate had no need to burthen it selfe with anie Tribute. Yet was this noble Triumph likely to have beene hindered by the fouldiors; who grudged at their Generall, for not having dealt more bountifully with them. But the Princes of the Senate ouer-ruled the People and Souldiors herein, and brought them to reason by scuere exhortations. Thus Paulus enjoyed as much honour of his victorie as men could giue. Neuertheleffe, it pleased Gop to take away from him his two remayning fonnes, that were not given in adoption : of which, the one died fine dayes before the Triumph; the other, three dayes 50 after it. This loffe hee bore wifely : and told the People, That hee hoped to fee the Commonwealth flourish in a continuance of prosperitie; since the joy of his victoric was requited with his owne private calamitie, in flead of the publike.

About the finne time, Octavius the Admirall, who had brought Perfeus out of Samothrace; and Anicius the Prætor, who had conquered Illyria, and taken King Gentrus prisoner; made their seuerall triumphs. The glory of which magnificent spe-Etacles; together with the confluence of Embaffages from all parts; and Kings, cither visiting the Imperial Citie, or offering to visit her, and doe their duties in perfon , were enough to fay vnto Rome, Sume superbiam, Take vpon thee the Maiestic, that thy deferts have purchased.

m Y}$  this which we have alreadic fetdowne, is feene the beginning and end of the three first Monarchies of the world; whereof the Founders and Erectours thought, that they could neuer have ended. That of Rome which made the fourth, was also at this time almost at the highest. We have left it flourishing in the middle of the field; having rooted vp, or cut down, all that kept it from the eyes and admiration of the world. But after some continuance, it shall begin to lose the beauty it had, the stormes of ambition shal beat her great boughes and branches one against another; her leaves shall fall off, her limbes wither, and a rabble of barbarous Nations enter the field, and cut her downe.

Now these great Kings, and conquering Nations, have bin the subject of those ancient Histories, which have beene preserved, and yet remaine among vs; and 20 withall of so many tragicall Poets, as in the persons of powerfull Princes, and other mightie men haue complained against Infidelitie, Time, Destinie, and most of all against the Variable successe of worldly things, and Instabilitie of Fortune. To these vndertakings, the greatest Lords of the world have beene stirred vp, rather by the defire of Fame, which ploweth vp the Aire, and foweth in the Winde; than by the affection of bearing rule, which draweth after it fo much vexation, and fo many cares. And that this is true, the good aduice of Ciness to Pyrrhus proues. And certainly, as Fame hath often beene dangerous to the lining, fo is it to the dead of no vie at all; because separate from knowledge. Which were it otherwise, and the extreame ill bargaine of buying this lafting discourse, understood by them 30 which are diffolued; they themselves would then rather have wished, to have ftolne out of the world without noise; than to be put in minde, that they have purchased the report of their actions in the world, by rapine, oppression and crueltie, by gining in spoile the innocent and labouring soule to the idle and insolent, and by hauing emptied the Cities of the world of their ancient Inhabitants, and filled them againe with fo many and fo variable forts of forrowes.

Since the fall of the Roman Empire (omitting that of the Germaines, which had neither greatnesse nor continuance) there hath beene no State fearefull in the East, but that of the Turke; nor in the Westany Prince that hath spred his wings farre ouer his nest, but the Spaniard; who since the time that Ferdinand expelled the 40 Moores out of Gransdo, have made many attempts to make themselves Masters of all Europe. And it is true, that by the treasures of both Indies, and by the many

Kingdomes which they possesse in Europe, they are at this day the most powerfull. But as the Turke is now counterpoiled by the Persian, so in stead of so many Millions as have beene spent by the English, French, and Neatherlands in a defensive war, and in diversions against them, it is easie to demonstrate, that with the charge of two hundred thousand pound continued but for two yeares or three at the most, they may not only be perswaded to live in peace, but all their swelling and overflowing ftreames may be brought backe into their naturall channels and old bankes. These two Nations, I say, are at this day the most eminent, and to be regarded; the one 50 feeking to roote out the Christian Religion altogether, the other the truth and sincere profession thereof, the one to joyne all Europe to Asia, the other the rest of all Europe to Spaine.

For the rest, if we seeke a reason of the succession and continuance of this boundleffe ambition in mortall men, we may adde to that which bath been already faid;

That the Kings and Princes of the world have alwayes laid before them the actions, but not the ends, of those great Ones which præceded them. They are alwayes transported with the glorie of the one, but they never minde the miserie of the other, till they finde the experience in themselves. They neglect the advice of GoD, while they enjoy life, or hope it; but they follow the counsell of Death, vpon his first approach. It is he that puts into man all the wisdome of the world, without speaking a word; which GoD with all the words of his Law, promifes, or threats, doth not infuse. Death which hateth and destroyeth man, is beleeued: Go p which hath made him and loues him, is alwayes deferred. I have confidered (faith SALOMON) all the workes that are under the Sunne, and behold, all is vanitie and vexation of fairit : but who beleeues it, till Death tells it vs. It was Death, which onening the conscience of Charles the fift, made him enjoyne his sonne Philip to restore Nauarre; and King Francisthe first of France, to command that justice should be done vpon the Murderers of the Protestants in Merindol and Cabrieres, which till then he neglected. It is therfore Death alone that can fuddenly make man to know himselfe. He tells the proud and insolent, that they are but Abiects, and humbles them at the inflant; makes them crie, complaine, and repent, yea, even to hate their forepassed happinesse. He takes the account of the rich, and proues him a beggers a naked begger, which hath interest in nothing, but in the grauell that filles his mouth. He holds a Glaffe before the eyes of the most beautifull, and makes them 20 fee therein, their deformitie and rottennesse; and they acknowledge it.

O cloquent, just and mightie Death! whom none could aduise, thou hast perswaded what none hath dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only hast cast out of the world and despised : thou hast drawne together all the farre firetched greatnesse, all the pride, crueltie, and ambition of man, and couered it all ouer with these two narrow words, His incet.

Lastly, whereas this Booke, by the title it hath, calles it selfe, The first part of the Generall Historie of the World, implying a Second, and Third Volume; which I also intended, and have hewen out; besides many other discouragements, perfwading my filence; it hath pleased God to take that glorious Prince out of the world, to whom they were directed; whose vnspeakable and neuer enough lamented loffe, hath taught mee to fay with I o B, Versaest in Luctum Citha. ramea, & Organum meum in vocem

To the Reader.

He vie of Chronologicall Tables is needfull to all Histories, that reach to anie length of time; and most of all, to those that are most generall: fince they cannot, like Annales, yearely set downe all Occurrences not coherent. This here following, may ferue as an Index to the prefent Part of this Worke; pointing onto the severall matters, that having fallen out at one time, are farre distoyned in the Relation. Certainely it is not perfect : neither do: I thinke, that anie can be. For how socuer the yeares of the first Patriarchs may seeme to have beene well-neare compleat, yet in the raignes of the Kings of Iuda and Ifrael, wee finde manie fractions, and the last yeare, or yeares, of one King reckoned also as the formost of another. The same is most likely to have fallen out in manie other : though not fo precifely recorded. Hereto may be added the diverse and imperfect formes of the yeare, which were in vee among fundrie Nations: causing the * Summer Moneths, in processe of some Ages, to fall into the Winter; and so breeding ex- * See Lib.2. treame confusion in the reckoning of their times. Neither is it a small part of trouble, chap 3. 5.6. to chuse, out of so manie, and so utterly disagreeing computations, as have alreadie gotten authoritie, what may probably be held for truth . All this, and a great deale more, is to be alleazed, in excuse of such error as amore intentine and perfect Calculator shall happen to finde herein. It may serue to free the Booke, and likewise the Reader (if but of meane judgement ) from anie notorious Anachronicisme; which cught to suffice. The Booke indeed will need it, even in that regard; not onely for some errors of the Presse, in the numbring of yeares, but for some hastie mis-reckonings of mine owne; which I desire to have hereby reformed, in hope that the printing of this Table shall not want carefull deligence. The Reader, if he be not offended with the reft, shall finde reason to be pleased with this, as tending wholly to bis owne cafe.

The Titles over the Columnes, have reference to that which followes under them; as will readily be conceived. Where two Titles, or more, are over the head, as Russallar there doe the numbers underneath answere proportionably, the higher to the higher, the lower to the lower. For example: The walls of Icrusalem were finished in the 319. yeare from the building of Rome, and in the 314 from NABONASSAR. In like manner it is to be understood, That IEHOSOPHAT began his raigne in the 3774. of the IVLIAN Era, in the 3092 of the World, and in the 99 yeare of the Temple. This needes not more illustration; nor indeede so much, to those that are acquainted with workes of this kinde. To anoid prolixitie, I have forborne to infert those yeares, which I finde not figured with some regardable accident: as with the birth or death of some Patriarch; the beginning of some Kings Raigne; some change of Gouernment; some Battaile fought; or the like. So, of the 13. yeares wherein SYLVIVS CAPETYS raigned over the Latines, I note onely the first; that is, omitting all betweene the 4. of IEHOSOPHAT, wherein CAPETUS began, unto the 17, wherein SYLVIVS A-VENTINVS Succeeded, and wherein IEHORAM first raigned with IEHOSOPHAT his father. For I thought it vaine to have filled up a Page with 12. lines of idle cyphers; numbring forth 2.3.4.5. and fostill onwards, till I had come to the first of AVEN-TINVS, and 17. of IEHOSOPHAT. In fetting downe the Kings, there is noted ouer the head of cueric one, what place he held in order of Succession; as whether he were the firely second, fift, seventh, or so forth, in ranke, of those that raigned in his Countrey, without notable interruption: Before the name is the first yeare of his raigne; at the end, or foot of the name (as the space gives leave) is the whole number of yeares in which he raigned; in the spaces following underneath are those yeares of his, which were concurrent with the beginning of some other King, or with the yeare of anieremarkable accident. Where two numbers, or more, are found before one Kings name, there is it to be understood, that the Same yeare belonged, not onely to the King then beginning, but unto Some one, or more, of his fore goers: as the first year of IEHORAM King of Israel was the same with the second of his brother AHAZIA, and the 22 of his father AHAZIA, SAW WHO Three names are sound no nesseless, as in the 2071, seare of the World, ZIMRI, TIBNIAND OMRI: It is meant, that enerie one of them raigned in some part of the same year; which is reckoned the second of ELA, and the sixth of OMRI: Particularly, under the years of the Expyrian Kings are set down the years of the stope DYNASTIES, which it was thought meet to infert; as skewise, otherwhiles, the day of the moneth upon which NABONASSARS yeare began: which, how it varied from other years, may be found in the place last above cited.

Concerning the Æra, or accompt of yeres, from IPHITVS, who began the Olympiads, from Rome buttle, from NASOAR, and the like; as much as was thought convenient but beene fail, where due place was, in the Booke it selfe: so as it remains to mostly to more; that under the title of Olympiads is set downe fift the number of the Olympiad, and beneath it, the seare of that Olympiad, at that CXSV began his raigne in Persia.

Now, for that the yeares of the World, of the Olympiads, of Rome, of NABONAS-SAR, and other, had not beginning in one month, but some of them in March, some in April, Some about Midfummer, and Some at other times : the better to expresse their fenerall beginnings, some pamefull Chronologers have divided them proportionably in their severall Columnes; oppoling part of the one yeare to part of the other: not (as I have here done) cutting all overthwart with one fireight line, as if all had begun and ended at one time. But this labour haue I spared, as more trouble some than wfefull; since the more part would not have apprehended the meaning, and fince the learned might well be without it. It will onely be necafull to observe, that how soever the Era of the Olympiads be 24, yeares elder than that of Rome, and 29, than that of NABONASSAR, yet the raigne of some King may have begun at such a time of the yeare as did not sute with this difference. But hereof I take little regard. The more curious will easily finde my meaning : the vulgar will not finde the difficultie. One familiar example may explane all. Queene Elizabeth began her raigne the 17 of November, in the yeare of our LORD 1558: Shee was crowned; held a Parliament ; brake it up ; threw downe Images ; and reformed manie things in Religion; all in her first yeare: yet not all in that yeare 1558, but the greater part in the yeare following , whether we begin with the first of Lanuarie, or with the 25. of March. The like may be otherwhiles found in this Table; but fo, as the difference is neuer of a whole

The IVLIAN Period, which I have placed, as the greater number, our the yeares of the World, was deviled by that honorable and excellently learned I OSEPH SCALIDER; being accommodated to the IVLIAN yeares, now involvement of Servis Scalider, from the multiplication of 19.3%, and 15, that 16, of the Cycle of the Moone, the Cycle of the Sunne, and the yeares of an Indiction. Being divided by anie of the first interest the number of the present yeare; or if no fraction remaine, it shows the last yeare of that Cycle to be current. For example: in the 4498, of this Period, when was sought the great battaile of Canna, the Prime or Golden number was 14, the Cycle of the Sanne 18, and consequently the Dominical letter F. as may be found by dividing the same number of the IVLIAN Period, 4498, by 19, for the Prime, by 28, for the Cycle of the Sanne. This IVLIAN Period, 4498, by 19, for the Prime, by 28, for the Cycle of the World, of 82. Resides the former vyes, and other thence redounding, it is a better Character of a yeare, than anie other Aira (as From the beginning of the World, From the Floud, From the former vaccretaine position.

After a fluid not need to write, as touching the wfe or explication of thefe Tables. Neither was thus much requifite to fuch as are connerfant in workes of this kinde: it suffects if hereby all be made plaine enough to the only ar.
